A new staff of expert writers is being engaged for The Christian Herald Sunday School Department. Amos R. Wells, Frank L. Brown, Arthur H. Howland, Edwin Whittier Caswell, and, it is hoped, Frank E. Hoskin, will be contributors. Others will be announced later.

Says the walking delegate: "Every man at work on the same job must have the same pay, though one lifts ten thousand shovelfuls and another twenty thousand. Every man must work eight hours a day and no more; or, if he works overtime, he must be paid for the overtime at a higher rate." Says Christ: "Every man must have a chance to work. Every worker must have a living wage. The relation between employer and employee must not be reduced to the plane of mechanical arithmetic, but must be raised to the level of brotherhood. There must be room in that relationship for generosity on both sides, for overtime and overpay. And each must trust the other." All of that is in this intensely modern parable of the vineyard.

How far we are from Christ's ideal for labor and capital the miners' war in Colorado bears witness, and the terrible scenes in Lawrence, Mass., and all the other labor struggles that have proved our civilization so imperfectly Christian. Police, militia, national troops, pistol shots, rifle shots, dynamite explosions, hangings and electrocutions — these are our present-day continuations of that dispute over wages in the Palestinian vineyard! This is the Christian progress of nineteen hundred years!

Every person in our Sunday schools is a wage-earner or a wage-payer or is growing up to be one of the two. Most of us are both wage-earners and wage-payers. If we are wage-earners, this parable tells us to labor for the work's sake and not for the pay's sake. If we are wage-payers, the parable tells us to pay according to the need and not always merely according to the labor. Love for one's work will make an artist of any workman. Love for one's employees will transform a paymaster into a brother.

The great problems of our world just now are economic problems. Right here is the test of our Christianity. If the religion of the Carpenter does not contain the solution of these terrible labor difficulties, it is not the religion for the present world. But it does contain that solution.

THE DAY'S WORK

By Rev. Edwin Whittier Caswell

IN THE chapter preceding our lesson, after our Lord's discourse upon the danger of riches, as a comment on the rich young ruler Peter exclaimed, "Behold, we have forsaken all and followed thee. What shall we have therefore?" Christ's reply to Peter is this parable of the laborers, which condemns his mercenary spirit.

Bishop Joseph F. Berry, in one of his addresses before the Wyoming Conference, recently held at Binghamton, N. Y., began by saying, "Will it pay? Is there anything in it for us? This is the cry of commercialism, of politics, of many governments and of some churches. We should ask a different question—Is it right? Will it help others? Will it please Him?"

There is a wide difference between a holy and an unholy ambition. Salvation is a free gift, and we should trust our heavenly Father to administer our rewards according to his divine will and purpose. To seek selfishly after places and positions in Christ's kingdom is to become a mere hireling instead of a self-sacrificing follower of the Master. We should trust the Lord of the vineyard to do the best for us according to our merit and devotion. Our position may be the humblest, the most unpleasant and lowly, but, as he has called us and assigned us to certain places in the vineyard, he will attend to our honor, rank and happiness. Rather than manifesting a murmuring spirit, we should in honor prefer one another.

Selfish seeking engenders pride, envy, covetousness, and often ends in final downfall. Christ's humiliatio and suffering were the highest type service for mankind. So our syn pathy, kindness and helpfulne should lead us to work for others the best way. We should not be li the elder brother, who became jea ous because so much was made of t prodigal. We are all members of t body of Christ. "The eye cannot sa to the hand, 'I have no need of yo nor can the head say to the feet, have no need of you.'" any more tha the steeple of the church can say the foundation, "I have no need you." The great Householder has a signed each laborer to his special wo and position, and all are cherished b him.

Are you working for the glory of particular denomination, or churc or personality? Then you may b last in the procession of heroes. your devotion guarded by humility, is it clouded by pride? The harve truly is great but the wholly cons crated laborers are few.

An Indian who was a candidate fo the ministry and was asked before th presbytery the important questio "What is original sin?" answered tha he didn't know what other people might be, but he rather thought tha his was laziness. There are man who could truthfully give the sam reply regarding religious activities.

It is said that an empty heart, a empty hand and an unoccupied brai killed Napoleon. Are there not man followers of the Master slowly dyin of the disease called "Nothing to do" A clergyman was once told by hi physician that he must quit work i he would live. He asked, "How lon can I live without work?" "Six o seven years, doubtless," was the repl "How long can I live with work? "Not more than two or three years. "Well, then," said he, "give me thre years of work instead of six years o idleness."

The redeemed who are before th throne of God serve him night an day in his temple; angels are ceas less in their ministry. Therefore, w should go to work to-day in his vine yard; to-morrow may not be ours.

A general once remarked to an i quiring soldier, "Go in anywhere there is good fighting all along th line."

SUNDAY SCHOOL LEADERSHIP TRAINING

THE FIRST OF A SERIES OF TWENTY-SIX SPECIAL ARTICLES BY FRANK L. BROWN

General Secretary of the World's Sunday School Association

FOR years past we have been stressing the necessity for the training of the Sunday school teacher. And there was good reason for this, as the teacher comes closest to the pupil and the home.

But after the teacher is trained she finds that her work is hindered by officers of the school who don't know their part of the work as well as she knows hers. Disorder, bad grading, uninteresting exercises, add to her burden and she goes home many a Sunday with aching head and aching heart.

It is high time for the one million six hundred thousand Sunday school teachers of this country to strike for their rights and to demand that the Sunday school officer shall be trained for his special duties so that the teacher's work shall be done under best conditions.

And the Sunday school pupil has equal rights with the teacher in the training of the officers. It is he that is being exploited, experimented upon, and sometimes tortured by length, instead of strength, of exercises and by the failure of the officers to understand the pupil's vital needs and to adjust plans to those needs.

But it must be frankly confessed that there is no body of men in the country more anxious to make a success of their work than the great host of Sunday school officers, and this includes the officers of the rural school as well as the city school. If we shall include in the computation all of those in the management side of the Sunday school, comprising also the members of school committees who also need training for their special tasks, we shall probably find between two and three million of the choicest workers of our country in the leadership column.

These workers have had for the most part no opportunity for a knowledge of their special work before being called to leadership service. If we can bring to such leaders all over the country a little higher efficiency, if we can aid them to know a little better the best plans for each department of work, we shall be doing a real service for the whole Sunday school field.

It is the purpose of the method articles which shall appear in these columns on alternate weeks to be a practical training school in Sunday school efficiency, for the superintendent who is struggling with the problems of a difficult situation, for the pastor who needs the help of workers who know their task, and for the teacher, who as a member of a school committee wants to know how. The difficulty up to this time has been that there was no practical course for fitting these various officers and committees for their work and no method by which the great Sunday school army might recruit its future leaders from its own young people.

The modern Sunday school organization, too, comes to the pastor and superintendent, especially in the smaller community, and says: "Here is the standard of an up-to-date school. We look to you to develop your school on this plan." And the pastor and superintendent, who have all that they can do to keep the school going as it is with inadequate help and facilities, hold up their hands, aghast, and a superintendent's resignation possibly results. But there may be a reason and a help for the situation.

Certain it is that the Sunday school cannot stand pat under the new definitions of its place and purpose and possibilities. The Sunday school should seek to guide every pupil to his place in God's plan, in the church, home, community and world field. The public school has this as a partial purpose, but lacks the spiritual dynamic of the touch of soul upon soul, life upon life, that comes through the work of the Sunday school.

And we need a vision of the Sunda school. How big a world shall w build for in our Sunday school work How much of the throbbing physica mental, social and spiritual boyhoo and girlhood about us shall we cap ture for service to Christ and th world?

Is it true, as Charles G. Trumbul says, that "the function of the Sunda school is to grow souls, possessed b Christ's passion to win souls. I should be keyed to the purpose of giv ing the Gospel to every creature"?

And is the Sunday school "the Bibl teaching service of the church"? th whole church, mind you, and not tha fragment engaged in actual Sunda school service, but the fathers an mothers who often put personal eas above example, and who do little con secutive study of the Word of God.

And is the Sunday school "th world's greatest institution for popu larizing the world's greatest Book" Mr. Gladstone once said: "Talk abou the questions of the time! There is bu one question—how to bring the truth of God's Word into vital contact wit the minds and hearts of all classes o people."

And is the Sunday school "a organized and scientific effort fo

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Memorial Stones*

THE heroes of early Bible times had the habit of setting up stones, memorial stones or altars, to commemorate great events in their personal lives or in the story of their nation. Our Scripture lessons tell of two such altars. When Joshua led the people over Jordan he assigned twelve men, one from each tribe, to pick up twelve stones from the dry river bed over which they were passing in safety and build with them an altar at the threshold of the Promised Land. And this altar was to be a sign to the children of Israel and their descendants that God, after leading them out of Egypt and through the perils of the wilderness, had brought them safely to their new possessions. In the second lesson, for which, by the way, you had better read all the first fifteen verses of Gen. 35, Jacob is directed to go back to Bethel, where he had his first experience of meeting God and communing with him, in order that he might build a new monument to testify to the fact that God had been with him, continuing his blessings and fulfilling his promises.

It is a good thing for the Christian to go back occasionally to the place where he was converted. Many Christian workers have made pilgrimages to old churches or schoolhouses or some office or street in a distant city, in order that the memory of the blessing of God which found them there might become more distinct. And they have gone forth from these places with a new sense of God's presence and fresh assurances of victory.

We celebrated yesterday our national birthday. We all thought again of that great event in the world's history, that first great item of our national existence when the fearless men of the Continental Congress made a Declaration of Independence though their act made them guilty of the crime of treason and brought with it the danger of death. The fifty-six signers of that declaration have become our nation's heroes, and we know now that they were led to their daring deed by the Spirit of God. We recall the great words of that Declaration of Independence: "Life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." We see how events, since then, have indicated that our nation was to have a unique place in the task and opportunity of bringing a more abundant life, greater liberty and higher happiness to the representatives of many nations of the world. We see the oppressed and troubled people of other lands flocking here to share in our liberty and in our happiness. We find that our statesmen are setting new ideals of honor and service and helpfulness toward other nations. And we renew our faith in God and our pledge that the God of our fathers will be our God and the God of our children.

It would be foolish on this anniversary of our independence to fail to recognize how far short we still come of giving all a fair opportunity for true life, true liberty and true happiness. Shocking conditions still exist of oppression and injustice. So long as little children are, in some States, still allowed to labor during their tender years, so long as women are crushed with deadly burdens of poverty and toil, so long as millions of workmen are refused a fair share of the products of their toil, so long as thousands of men, able and willing to work, are by our present industrial system denied a chance to work, so long as dishonor and greed corrupt our commercial enterprises, our law-making bodies, our courts and our press, so long is there need of returning to the old altars erected in tribute to God and to his ideals of liberty, justice and neighborliness, and of making each new Independence Day a day of consecration to the tasks which yet remain before this land shall be what God has planned it.

The Friendship Verse*

THERE is something deeply and accurately scientific in comparing friendship with fragrance. It has been proved that odors have a powerful influence upon the memory, upon the emotions. A unique sensation of happiness steals over the mind in the presence of a delightful perfume; and very often these call up the richest experiences of home and love. Friendship should be like this. It is a matter of intense delight. A man's friends not only help him to be brave and honorable and successful, but they minister to his delight. "He rejoices" in the fragrance of their friendship. That is the statement of our Scripture verse, that the sweetness of soul communion with one's friend rejoices the heart like the fragrance of perfume. Look up and relate the stories of David and Jonathan and Damon and Pythias.

Real heart friendships are the kind to be coveted; not friendships of convenience, not friendships of profit, but friendships whose communions of heart with heart are delightful. And these are, after all, the most helpful and the most profitable. For to spread this atmosphere of true friendship is the chief element of our life work. We are to bring about that time of which Burns sang:

> When man to man the world o'er
> Shall brithers be, and a' that.

You can tell what kind of a heart you have from the kind of people your friends are. If you like people who are pure, and honorable, and thoughtful, earnest and kindly, it means that you are on the right road. Are you choosing the best kind of friends—friends that will help you to make life fragrant and beautiful for others? And are you giving your life in friendly service and intercourse with others, helping them forward and upward to the best things?

Do not let the lesson close without an earnest and grateful reference to the soul's Great Friend. That was Christ's chief wish for all his followers—that they might be his friends. "Henceforth I call you not servants," he said to his disciples, "but I have called you friends." Have you let the ineffable sweetness of his friendship purify and strengthen and perfume your life?

Our Covers a Picture Gallery

I AM much pleased with your paper. I want to tell you how I get a little more out of it for the children than do the average. I take nearly all of the cover pictures and paste them together vertically, two and three in a strip, and fasten them to the picture mold around my little motherless boys' sleeping room. They always please them, and they ask questions about them until I find myself quite a story-teller. "Dreaming of Her Boy Across the Sea" and the marine scenes I have grouped and they form a basis for a story they will not forget. You have given us such a wealth of landscapes that I hope you will not forget the farm animals, especially the horse. Children are so interested in pictures of animals and in the animals themselves, especially before the children can read. I believe you would do well to mention this use of cover pictures, as many file them away, never thinking of the lesson or story that may be brought out for the children. Even though only room for say four or six pictures could be had, it would be worth while.

A PITIFUL CRY FROM CHINA

"SHE is a sweet child of about twelve, obedient and willing to work. It seems so hard to have to send her back to a life of beggary and shame." This horrifying statement stands out in a long letter from the Chinkiang Industrial Orphanage, China, which tells many interesting things about the busy life of the orphans. It was almost like coming upon a venomous snake while strolling through flowering fields, to read this letter and come upon those words. "Five of our brightest boys are now in Bible school, training for Christian work," writes our correspondent. "They have been proved for years in their Christian life. Three of our best girls are also in training. Twenty-seven large boys are learning trades, printing, engineering, and others. They all attend services here on Sundays; twenty of them live with a home missionary. . . . Four hours of the orphanage are given to study and four to manual labor; the boys help in farm work, the girls in making clothing and even shoes. This, of course, keeps down expenses and prepares the boys and girls for useful lives. . . . It is because the children are practically our own and free from heathen influences that it is comparatively easy to train them for Christian work. The hope of Christianity in China lies more in the children now being trained in Christian institutions. . . . The history of some of our children illustrates the Scripture passage, 'The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty.' Chang De Lin, only fifteen years old, has a face of aged hardship and suffering. Her parents died when she was little, leaving her to a dissolute brother, for whose support she worked in a factory fifteen hours a day picking cocoons from boiling water, her fingers becoming parboiled, then returned 'home' to cook and slave. Eventually she would have entered a shameful life. But she is now with us, and is one of the happiest and brightest in the Sunday school class. . . . Wang Ko Nu was left an orphan at three years of age, and was bought by a mother-in-law who deserted her in the stress of famine. We had her for a little while, then through lack of means had to send her back, but the barrow-man threw her into the street, where she fought with the pigs for her food. She was discovered and returned to the orphanage, and we endeavored to purchase her freedom, but are still without the surplus of $20 necessary, and she is being claimed by the woman mentioned. She is a sweet child of about twelve, obedient and willing to work. It seems so hard to have to send her back to a life of beggary and shame."

BUSY HOURS AT COMPASSION ORPHANAGE, NINGPO, CHINA

Is it necessary to say more? Here in a few sentences extracted from this letter we have the picture of practically all the orphanages in which CHRISTIAN HERALD readers are interested. Lives rescued from evil surroundings, from misery and shame, now filled with the sunshine of Christian love and the ambition to be pure and useful, yet always in some degree of peril of removal from the orphanage care through failure of support by the only persons vitally interested in their welfare, Christian people of other lands. It is an unthinkable thing that brave little Wang Ko Nu shall be abandoned by a Christian institution to the designs of an evil woman, for the lack of $20 in American money. Despite the generous response to our appeals in behalf of the thousand and five orphans whose support we have undertaken in the name of the Christian Herald Family, there is still a considerable proportion of the quarterly amount necessary to be made up; but we feel assured that, when our readers learn this, they will generously respond. There is more than one Wang Ko Nu dependent upon our making the full quarterly remittance. Who will come to the rescue? Who will do something to help hold these deserving children within Christian influence until they are capable of self-support, when, in all probability, most of them will be out-and-out disciples of Jesus Christ? Remember what our correspondent said: "The hope of Christianity in China lies in the children now being trained in Christian institutions."

All gifts are welcome, and are devoted fully to this work. Twenty dollars provides the entire care and education of one child for a year. If you feel you cannot have the privilege of giving one child a whole year's opportunity, do not hesitate to make whatever contribution you can toward that end.

Address all gifts and letters, China Orphan Fund, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

A LITTLE ANGEL OF THE MOUNTAINS

BY CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY

CHAPTER X

THE boy and the man talked very little together as they wandered home through the night; and in their speech there had been a deliberate avoidance of the topic which was uppermost in their hearts. Instinct told the lad that it would be better not to discuss the matter further, and Parson Bill was equally reticent. He felt not a little ashamed of his impulsive action. Had he to figure in such a scene again, he might have pursued another course; but it was too late now. He gritted his teeth, and in spite of the derision so ruthlessly heaped upon him, and of which he knew he would receive more, made up his mind that he would stick it out. It was fortunate that no longer time than one night intervened between his determination and the time for his carrying it out. As the hour approached, his task became more and more difficult to him.

Such a piece of news as the scene in The Red Dog was too delectable to be kept secret, and every man in the town had heard it before sunrise. It would have been an object of interest, that new Sunday school, even if Parson Bill had not announced himself as an attendant and supporter, but the interest would have been by no means so general or so intense. It was a matter of course that women and children should patronize religion, but that a man should do so, especially a man in Cañon Creek, was most extraordinary. And yet, although no one exactly realized it, the determination of Parson Bill was already influential. The most devoted patrons of The Black Pup and The Red Dog found another interest in life. They had something else to talk about than drink and play. The Black Pup had kept open much longer than The Red Dog, but it, too, had closed at an unusually early hour.

The men decided that they wanted to be on hand to see the fun, and they determined to get some sleep, so as to be reasonably fresh for the fray. The two saloonkeepers were somewhat perturbed, but they took matters philosophically, saying to each other that they must expect such transactions and disturbances, and confident that a few days would see them running in full blast again, and with all their old patronage. The proprietors were not without their share of human curiosity, also. Indeed, they were rather better in some ways than the miners, for their business made it necessary for them to drink but little and to gamble not at all. There was a rivalry between them, but on occasion they could get together, and they decided, after an informal consultation, that out of respect to the Sunday school they would close from nine o'clock until half after ten, which was the period set apart for religious purposes, they had ascertained. This proved an exceedingly popular move on their part. Cañon Creek felt vaguely satisfied with the stirrings of reform.

Olaf had been very much excited over the whole series of events, and it had been a long time before he had fallen sound asleep. He had awakened early, washed himself with unusual care and effectiveness, put on his very dilapidated and ragged clothes with, for the first time, keen pangs of humiliation and shame, and had made himself as ready for the service as was possible under the local conditions prevalent.

Parson Bill had arisen with him and had also made his toilet, with unusual care but in a moody and unbroken silence. The invitation for breakfast was extended to him, but the man instantly declined it. The loyal little boy pleaded to stay with his old friend, but the man bade him go to his new ones.

"You won't stay away from Sunday

Baby's Teething

Freed from Pain! No Drugs! No Dope!

THE Jolly Face makes baby think it's a toy. It weighs only 1¼ ounces, is only 4 inches long, and is easily grasped by the tiniest hands. All babies like to bite on their toys. So baby bites on the long funny rubber nose. And that's just what we want him to do. Inside the "toy" is an aluminum reservoir for cracked ice, and from this reservoir iced water circulates with a pump-like action through the rubber nose. Thus when baby bites on the nose his poor, hot, aching gums are gently cooled—all the nasty inflammation and pain is checked—there's peace and content for baby, and rest for mother.

Koolbite Teething Reliever

Endorsed by Doctors, Dentists, Druggists and Nurses as Safe, Sanitary and Scientific. Thousands in use

Keeps baby's hands warm. The mouthpiece, of purest rubber, is easily sterilized, and has the toughness needed to help baby force his erupting teeth through his gums. No ice or water can enter baby's mouth. No leaking. No muss.

PRICE, $1, ALL PARTS COMPLETE. Would you begrudge a dollar to stop your baby's suffering? Ask your druggist for Koolbite to-day. Why let baby suffer a minute longer than you can help?

If your druggist can't supply you, mail us a dollar direct. Your money refunded if trial doesn't prove Koolbite's worth. Descriptive circular free.

me of the more early risers among cy passed the time of day with him.

As the boy approached the goal of s hopes, his pace slackened. It was long time since he had been in the ciety of women, and he could hardly member any association with such etty little girls as Jennie and Annie orrison. Perhaps, at the last mine, he might have hung back and aited for Parson Bill, but Mrs. Morson, divining what would be the men-l attitude of the young man, was atching for him. He caught sight her just as the last remnant of his urage had oozed away, and he had opped, staring. It was too late to ck out. She came toward him, took s hand, remarking appreciatively on its cleanliness as compared Poor Olaf blushed scarlet when he as presented to the group of inates; to wit, Mr. Morrison and the different breakfast from the affairs

n fact, it seemed to the boy that he ad never in all his life had such a eakfast as that, although the fare as of the simplest.
Mr. Morrison asked the grace, while laf thought with a pang of shame the many, many meals he had taken nd enjoyed without that reverent reliminary. His place was next to Irs. Morrison and between her and ennie, the older girl, a child of about is own age. They made him feel ery much at home, and as the meal rogressed his shyness wore off. He as an intelligent lad, he could talk ell for a boy of his years. They drew im out with questions about his life nd career, and manifested the deep-st interest in his graphic recital of tory.

"You poor child," said Mrs. Morri-on tenderly, at last, "I'll be a mother you myself, since you have no nother."
"Yes," said Jennie, "and we'll be is sisters."
"We've never had a really truly rother of our own," chimed in little nnie, "and we have always wanted ne so badly."
"I'm not fit to be a brother to such ice girls," said the lad, his heart hrobbing with delight, nevertheless.
"Oh, yes, you are," said Mr. Morison warmly. "I think a boy who had he courage to testify against that esperado, like you did, deserves a edal. I've heard about it from the nen here. It was a brave thing for little boy to do."
"I was awfully afraid to do it, but he Indians had been kind to me, and had to do it, sir."
"By the way," asked Mrs. Morri-on, "what has become of the other ndian?"
"I see him once in a while. He brings me things—a bow and arrow, moccasins, a little war bonnet, things he makes."
"And what of the murderer?" asked his host.
"I don't know anything about him, sir."
"Has he ever been back here?" questioned Mr. Morrison further.
"They do say that he has been seen around these parts. He has a good claim up on the mountain which is pretty rich. He can't work it without coming down here, and Parson Bill said that he heard he had been making threats that he would come back here and clean out the town."
"Mercy!" cried Jennie, "I hope he won't shoot you."
"I hope so, too," said the boy.
Truth to tell, he had more or less forgotten Mr. Jackson and the episode. He could not know how angry that gentleman had been, and how he had continued brooding over his situation until he had become obsessed of an evil idea and purpose, of which poor little Olaf Tryggvesson was one object.
"I guess you have no cause for alarm," said the father of the family reassuringly.
"The men would protect me, I know," said little Olaf.
"Yes, I am sure they would," commented Mrs. Morrison, "and God will protect you, too."
That had not occurred to the boy, but the assurance was most agreeable to his soul.
In such pleasant conversation the breakfast hour soon passed. The girls assisted their mother to clear away the things and to wash the dishes and to put the room to rights, while Mr. Morrison got out his Bible, Sunday school cards, and service leaflets, supplied by the bishop, and made ready for the service.
Among the other belongings which the Morrisons had dragged across the prairie and through the mountain passes on their two wagons was a little portable melodeon. This was set up and found to be in fair working condition.
"We might have the service in here," said Mr. Morrison to Olaf, who had attached himself to the man since there was nothing else for him to do, "but it is so bright and pleasant outside. There is a lovely spot by the brook under the trees yonder, and I thought I would have it there. Besides, this is a small room, and if any one should wish to come and join in, he would be freer to do it in the open air than in the cabin."
"Yes, sir, of course he would," said the boy. "Did I tell you that Parson Bill, my friend, said he was coming?"
Now Mrs. Morrison had very carefully refrained from asking Olaf of the result of his mission. She had reasoned that he would prefer to tell it in his own way and in his own time, and she did not wish to spoil the surprise by anticipating it or by injudicious questioning. She had her reward in the pride and joy of the boy when the announcement was made.
"I am glad to hear it, Olaf," she said, pausing in her work. "Sometimes one man may start a whole community in the right direction. Did you tell him what time the service would be?"
"Yes'm, most partic'lar, at nine o'clock," answered the boy.
"It's approaching that time now," said Mr. Morrison. "Olaf, if you will carry the Bible and prayer book leaflets and this bundle of lesson cards, I'll take the melodeon and we'll go out there and fix things for the service."
The lesson cards were of a date weeks back, but they would serve admirably. In fact, they would scarcely be needed at all if the congregation consisted of the two little girls and the boy; but with a hope that perhaps others might come and find them

10% More for Your Money

Quaker Oats is now put up also in a 25-cent size, nearly three times as large as the 10-cent size. By saving in packing it offers you 10 per cent more for your money. See how long it lasts.

Serve Quaker In Big Dishes

If You Would Know Its Vim-Producing Power

Quaker Oats is the utmost in energy food. It should multiply vim, create bubbling vitality, make one "feel his oats."

But a little dish, once daily, doesn't go far enough. Active, growing children need three times what most children get.

Serve Quaker in big dishes. Make it the morning meal. Then you will know the fullness of its vim-producing power.

And millions of grown-ups need a month of such breakfasts —to put them at their best. Nobody doubts the energy that's there, but few folks get enough.

Quaker Oats

The Luscious Energy Food

Quaker Oats forms a luscious dish because it is made of just the rich, plump grains. It is made to tempt children to eat an abundance. And they will if you put it before them.

We pick out for Quaker just the cream of the oats. We get but ten pounds from a bushel. Yet Quaker Oats, with all this flavor and aroma, costs no extra price.

Bear this in mind — you who want children to get the full benefit. Get them the luscious flakes which have won the world to Quaker.

A hundred nations send here now to get delicious Quaker Oats. All because of this flavor, which has taught millions of children to love this food of foods.

It is always there, and always will be, when you order Quaker.

Serve Quaker Oats in large dishes. Small servings are not sufficient to show in full its vim-producing power.

MONT-LAWN READY TO OPEN

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR

I FELT a wave of heat creep over the city—burning heat with the stifling quality that kills. Looking out of the window of my office in the Bible House, I saw a small boy sitting on the corner, pale and exhausted. I heard the noise of tiny feet in the hall. Going to the door I saw a little girl trotting in the direction of the main office.

"Is dis de CHRISTIAN HER'LD?" she asked me.

DID SOME ONE SAY "MONT-LAWN"?

Glancing at the calendar on my desk, there, in bold black letters, I saw "June" staring at me. So I realize that summer has come, with its closing schools and languid children; its merciless sun and sweltering breezes; its baking pavements and growing death-rate. And then I remember, with a start, that Mont-Lawn, the Children's Paradise, is ready to open its gates for the beginning of the twenty-first season. Faraway from the dust of the city at Nyack-on-the-Hudson, carpenters are hammering, and lawn-mowers are clicking, and caretakers are making dainty white beds and laying out small dresses, and ordering provisions for the army of little ones that are about to set out on their way to the Children's Home.

It's a fairy-tale, the story of Cinderella told all over again, that is unfolded hundreds of times every season at the Children's Home. Cinderella is Little-Miss-City-Girl-From-the-Slums. And the cruel stepmother is Mrs. Summertime and the step-sisters are named "Heat" and "Not-Enough-Air." As for the fairy godmother! Well, we hate to make you feel in any way conceited, but you, friends of children, rolled into one composite, smiling magic personality, will just have to be the Fairy Godmother! Mont-Lawn is the party where the little Cinderella meets Prince Charming, and in this fairy tale come true, Prince Charming is named "Health."

Cinderella in the real written-years-ago story, as you know, was an attractive, golden-haired person with big eyes and red lips, who dwelt in the chimney corner of a nice, comfortable house. After seeing her beautiful picture in my green-and-gold fairy book, I enthroned her on a pedestal and worshiped her as the queen of Fairyland.

"For," I said, in my childish heart, "it's no wonder she had a fairy godmother who gave her dresses spun out of moonbeams, and a prince to marry. She was so pretty!"

And she was pretty, beyond a doubt. My green-and-gold book used up two large pages telling about her. But our Little-Miss-City-Girl-From-the-Slums is hardly ever as pretty as Cinderella. It is hard to think of her in the same paragraph; for her face is pale and thin, and her mouth is pink instead of red, and her big eyes are hollows filled with the wistfulness of dreams.

Very often the children from the city streets have never seen a blade of fresh, green grass, or a little wild flower. Some of them have never seen more sky than the tiny bit that shines between housetops that are high and dingy and shut out the light. So, when the Fairy Godmother comes to them with the magic word "country," they do not know what she means. A great many children think that the country is a strange kind of food, or house, or maybe even some mild form of punishment.

The Fairy Godmother took Cinderella to the party in a pumpkin coach, drawn by four white mice, and Cinderella thought that it was very odd and wonderful indeed. But the little children from the city think that the beautiful trip to Mont-Lawn is more wonderful than that. The special trolley, the long train, the cool ferry, and the big stages that take them through a heaven of white, starry flowers and sapphire blue skies, and mountains, and green trees, are all new and wonderful pleasures to their starved little hearts.

Cinderella, sitting in the dusty, but withal rather comfortable, ashes of her chimney corner, thought that magic existed in the wonderland that lay between the green-and-gold covers of the book. But the little children of our work-a-day world do not know what magic is. If they did, they would probably think that the fairy queen was conveying them to her summer palace in taking them to beautiful Mont-Lawn.

Yesterday, as I was looking through a large, finely illustrated book, I saw a pitiful picture sandwiched in between two pages. It was called "Some Shadows of Toil," and it showed rough sketches of six childish heads. As I looked at the drawn, saddened faces, I felt the tears crowding to my eyes. For every day I see them in the city—gasping for a breath of air, looking for a clean spot to rest or a cool thing to eat—hunting for a place to play!

Friends of children, Fairy Godmothers and Godfathers, there is very little that you do not know about the Children's Home. Year after year you have heard about the glorious country, and the charming houses, and the latest improvements. You know, too, that year after year the children come, weak and wan and pale, and go away chubby and strong and sunburned. And you know, friends of Mont-Lawn, who makes the children strong and well.

The same kind of children are coming again this year, worn out, dying perhaps, from the city heat, and we love to believe that the same friends are going to help them into fairyland.

In the city there are children
Gasping for the want of air,
Dying for the food we owe them,
Asking for our help and care.
Shall we listen to their pleading
Coming to us soft and low?
Yes. Remember that the Saviour
Blessed the children long ago.

In the city there are children
Weak and wan and deathly pale,
No one cares how much they suffer,
No one listens to their wail.
Shall we help them, friendly people?
Yes. The Saviour meek and mild,
Who has died to save us sorrow,
Was himself a little child.

AMONG THE DENOMINATIONS

A GENERAL ADVANCE movement along evangelistic lines has just been inaugurated by leading Baptists throughout the country. The polity of the Baptist denomination recognizes the individual church as the unit of organization, each church being an independent body. The co-operative fellowship of the denomination is the "association," comprising a group of churches within certain districts. There are more than five hundred of these associations in the country, which have in the past been recognized as brotherhood assemblies for mutual sympathy, advice and encouragement, but without legislative authority. Five lines of effort have been agreed upon: "Associations are hereafter to open evangelistic campaigns within their respective borders. Social unions are to be formed. Laymen are to be enlisted and trained. Lawyers, bankers and business men in general are to be taught in laymen's training classes to give missionary and inspirational addresses. Better business methods in church work are to be introduced and practically applied. Pastorless churches are to be cared for by trained laymen. Institutes on education are to be held, with reading and study courses on improved methods of Sunday school work. Incidentally all city, home, and foreign missionary causes are to be systematically studied and helped, and especially emphasis is to be given to city welfare and social service activities."

—THE DOMESTIC and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church received for its work at home and abroad during the past fiscal year on the apportionment, $1,019,087.05 from 5,888 parishes and missions representing 917,000 communicants. Of this amount the children of the Sunday schools gave $175,734.71 toward the work, 3,911 out of a total of 5,053 Sunday schools co-operating.

—REV. DR. R. H. MCKIM, rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, D. C., and for a number of years president of the House of Deputies of the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, has just completed the twenty-fifth year of his ministry at Washington. During this period the records show 3,200 baptisms; 2,268 confirmations; 955 couples married; 1,848 funeral services conducted and $1,134,283 raised in contributions.

—WITHIN THE diocese of New York, the Right Rev. David H. Greer, D.D., bishop, there are 257 congregations representing 79,209 communicants, under the pastoral care of 431 clergymen. These congregations, besides meeting their parochial expenses, such as salaries, repairs, heating, etc., are called upon to raise certain outside obligations in the form of assessments upon each congregation. For diocesan purposes the assessment is $71,000; for general missions $266,389. The total amount of contributions for all purposes amounted to $2,807,769.80 in 1913.

—A NUMBER OF changes have taken place in the missionary districts of the Episcopal Church. Bishop Graves of Kearney has resigned, and his place is filled by the consecration of the Right Rev. D. V. George Allen Beecher and the name of the district changed from Kearney to Western Nebraska. Bishop Mann, for twelve years bishop of North Dakota, is now bishop of Southern Florida, and the Rev. John P. Tyler has been consecrated as bishop of North Dakota. The Rev. Charles B. Colmore of the Cuban Mission has been consecrated as bishop of Porto Rico with jurisdiction in Haiti. The Rev. F. B. Howden, of Washington, D. C., has been recently consecrated as bishop of New Mexico.

—ACCORDING TO a recent article in the New York Times, the past spring has been a hard season for missions. The writer says: "The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, handling $1,885,000 a year, and one of the largest, began last year with a deficit of $65,300 and fell short $226,800 more, making a total present deficit of $292,150. The Episcopal General Mission Board, handling $1,600,000 a year, authorized a statement that a deficit of $300,000 is imminent. The board began last year $197,000 behind. Baptists have had an almost similar experience. The home society began the year $31,000 behind, and ended it with $72,000 deficit. Presbyterians, South, handling about $80,000 a year, came out nearly even, and Congregationalists in their home work are probably the only ones closing the year without debt. The Reformed Church boards, both Dutch and German, came out about even."

—SPECIAL INTEREST is attached to the recent meeting of the Evangelical Lutheran Synod, since it marked the 75th anniversary of the landing of the Saxon immigrants who later were responsible for the synod's organization. In 1839, four of the five vessels which late in the previous year had been chartered by about 750 Saxons—who hoped to find in America a place where they could worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences—landed at New Orleans. The fifth was lost at sea. Some of these Lutheran pilgrims settled in St. Louis, Mo., while others bought tracts of land in Perry County, Mo. In spite of many vicissitudes and bitter trials, Lutheranism in Missouri prospered, and in the course of time the idea ripened in the minds of the leaders of these Saxons, to combine the scattered Lutheran pastors and congregations all over the country, who were at one with them in doctrine and practice, into one synodical body. The organization was effected in Chicago in 1847, twelve pastors and sixteen congregations signing the constitution.

—THE AMERICAN BAPTIST Publication Society has just issued the Year-Book of the denomination for 1914. In the United States there are 51,997 Baptist churches, a gain during the year of 1,809. There are 39,109 ordained ministers, a gain of eighty-two over the preceding year. There were 281,671 baptisms, or 2,524 fewer than in the preceding year. The total membership of regular Baptist churches now reaches 5,799,253, an increase of 269,680 over the preceding year. One of the most interesting features of the statistical table is that while 143,088 church letters were granted during the year, 154,656 letters were received by the churches. That is, 11,568 people hunted up their old church letters and on them united with some church. One of the sad things about the statistical table is that it declares that 94,460 were erased or excluded from the membership of the church, and this was more than one-third of the number received by baptism. The total amount given for foreign missions was $1,206,202, for home missions $959,557, for State missions $993,803, for Bible work $112,246. This makes a total of gifts for the missionary interests of the denomination of $3,271,808, which is but little more than fifty cents per member for all missionary objects combined. The total contributions for all purposes amounted to $27,549,711.

THIS WEEK'S COVER

OUR cover this week is reproduced from an autochrome plate which registers the exact colors of nature. It was taken by Mr. Earl Harrison, who went up to Mont-Lawn especially to make this picture, and the reproduction is made directly from the plate.

It is very difficult for one who has never been at Mont-Lawn to get any idea of the wonderful riot of color in which the place abounds.

For those who are interested in photography and wish to know how it is possible to register upon a sensitized plate the exact shade and tones of color, the following is a brief explanation:

Interposed between the sensitive coating and the glass is a thin layer of transparent microscopic starch grains, dyed orange-red, green and violet, spread without overlapping, and mixed in such proportion that the layer appears colorless when examined by transmitted light, and absorbs but a small percentage of the light received. The sensitive coating is extremely thin, and made of a special fine-grained panchromatic emulsion.

When such a plate is exposed in the camera, the glass side toward the lens, the light, before reaching the sensitive coating, passes through the colored starch grains, which act individually as minute screens, each absorbing all colors but its own. A microscopical selection takes place, and after development there is found under each grain a corresponding black spot (reduced silver) of a density proportionate to the amount of color received and transmitted by this particular grain. Were the plates fixed at this stage, the picture would show only the colors complementary to those of the original, since the true colors are masked by the black spots beneath the grains. But when the reduced silver is dissolved in permanganate solution the opaque spot under each grain becomes transparent and transmits colored light precisely of the same hue as the light transmitted by the grain when the plate was exposed in the camera; in other words, the color is reconstructed just as it was decomposed during exposure.

A special yellow screen must be fitted to the lens in order to equalize the action of the light and compensate for the predominate actinism of the violet and blue rays, to which the panchromatic emulsion is most sensitive.

"My Chef in the Cupboard"

A million women or more—who know Van Camp's—keep a master chef in their cupboards.

That is, they keep there his matchless dish—ready for instant serving. It is Van Camp's Pork and Beans.

They have dinners and luncheons on call.

They have a delicacy which everyone likes—an entirely new idea in baked beans. And not a soul at their tables would go back to the old kind—either home-baked or factory-baked.

VAN CAMP'S
PORK & BEANS BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE

Also Baked Without the Sauce

10, 15, and 20 Cents Per Can

These beans come to you whole, nut-like and mellow. None are hard, none are crisped, none are broken. That's because they are baked in steam ovens.

They come with a zestful sauce baked in—a sauce made of whole ripe tomatoes.

Men like them—like their mealiness and tang. They like them so well that thousands of restaurants now buy Van Camp's to please men.

The dish is unique and unmatchable. Nothing like it was ever baked outside of these kitchens.

Now—in hot weather—is when this dish is most welcome. Tell your grocer to send it—to send Van Camp's—and learn how our chefs have perfected baked beans. 'Twill be a revelation.

Buy a can of Van Camp's Beans to try. If you do not find them the best you ever ate, your grocer will refund your money.

CATHOLICS TO BOYCOTT THE FAIR

A PRESUMPTUOUS THREAT, FOLLOWING THE CHURCH'S FAILURE TO BRING ABOUT COMMISSIONER NATHAN'S REJECTION

ITALY'S commissioner to the Panama-Pacific Exposition, Signor Ernesto Nathan, ex-mayor of Rome, has arrived in San Francisco, where he has been accorded a warm welcome by the exposition officials and by prominent Italian-American citizens. Many hundred Italians greeted the popular former executive of the capital city of their native land with "vivas," and crowded about him to grasp his hand. There were in the gathering Italians who were members of the Chamber of Commerce, bank presidents, educators, consular officials, heads of various Italian organizations, merchants and representatives of the Italian press in California, and all vied with each other in paying the cordial tribute of esteem to one of the foremost spirits in "the new Italy" of to-day. There was a still more notable demonstration when, two days later, on June 2, Commissioner Nathan publicly accepted the deed to Italy's site at the exposition grounds "in the name of the King of Italy and of the affection my country has for America." It was a gathering international in character. All the exposition officials were present, and the saluting guns, the music, and the addresses all attested the warm friendship existing between the two countries and the gratification at the choice of Signor Nathan as commissioner.

After the ceremony the commissioner was entertained as the guest of the exposition officials at a luncheon. There was an automobile parade through streets picturesquely decorated with American and Italian flags, and in the evening a brilliant reception in honor of the new commissioner.

Such was the welcome which California, in its own behalf and in behalf of the American people, extended to the distinguished foreigner who had been appointed by Italy and accepted by our government at Washington and by the exposition authorities as possessing in the highest degree the qualities suited to such a position. As mayor of Rome, Sig. Nathan conducted his administration with honor and ability, winning the friendship and hearty goodwill of the Italian people as a whole. He was the champion of United Italy in the fight to free the country from Vaticanism, and his eloquence and fearless advocacy of all that related to the public welfare, and especially his well-known liberal views in favor of absolute religious freedom and equality, made him a popular idol.

But there was one element in Rome which did not like the progressive mayor and which cordially hated him for the hold he had upon the hearts of the people. The Roman Church regarded him as an enemy. He believed in free speech, in religious tolerance, and Rome disbelieves in both. In recent years, the power and influence of the Vatican have greatly declined in Rome, and an administration such as that of Mayor Nathan was naturally opposed to the Clerical party, which was simply the Catholic Church in politics. "Against this party," he says, "I waged war—not against the Catholic Church as a church. I am and always have been an enemy of political parties that are based on religion." He did not hesitate, when occasion arose, to speak out his opinions boldly, for in the Rome of to-day there is but scant recognition of the church's temporal authority. At the very seat of her former greatness, her old power has passed away, until, as Rev. Dr. Robertson of Venice has aptly observed, "Rome has now become the most anti-Roman Catholic and anti-Vatican city in all Europe."

It would be altogether too mild an expression to say that the Vatican felt hurt when the king appointed Sig. Nathan as commissioner to the exposition. It was deeply offended—mortally wounded. Vain to protest at home, it sought to accomplish its purpose abroad and to influence the government at Washington to reject the appointment. It poured its protests against Nathan in a steady stream on the surprised officials in Washington demanding his rejection, but they were unheeded. It would indeed have been an extraordinary thing for the government of a nation which places all religions on an equal footing to have heeded such a plea. Besides, Commissioner Nathan was a representative man of unimpeachable character and the choice of his sovereign. Then it bombarded the exposition commissioners, but they saw no reason for such opposition, which they regarded as altogether foreign to the American spirit.

Under the circumstances, Rome now conceived a plan to which Catholic strategy is not a stranger. The Catholic Church in America resolved to boycott the exposition! The boycott is Rome's favorite weapon—the bludgeon of her choice, always ready for service. It is announced in the New York Times of June 8 that the Catholic Laymen's League for Retreats and Social Studies has passed a resolution directing the boycott. The movement is now fairly under way. Leading Catholic clerics are quoted as warmly endorsing it, and it is claimed that the Knights of Columbus and the American Federation of Catholic Societies will co-operate. The Catholic boycott will simply stimulate liberty-loving Americans to patronize the exposition in overwhelming numbers as a fitting rebuke to the Roman Church for its intolerant and presumptuous attempt to coerce the American Government into rejecting Italy's choice for commissioner.

useful, Mr. Morrison had sorted them out and brought them along. They contained a short passage of Scripture, an exposition thereof, and other material to enable one to understand it. The service leaflets were filled with old familiar hymns, in addition to the regular service of the church.

The two selected a level spot under the trees, and placed the melodeon hard by a large boulder that rose from the ground high enough for Mr. Morrison to lay his Bible on when he had finished reading it. The preparations had scarcely been concluded when Mrs. Morrison and the girls came out. Mrs. Morrison carried a chair from the cabin, which she placed in front of the little organ.

"I always begin the service of God a little," said Mr. Morrison, looking at his watch. "Your friend—"

"Here he comes," said Olaf, jumping up and down with excitement. "I'm so glad."

"So am I," said Mrs. Morrison, staring at the approaching figure.

Parson Bill was having the hardest time of his life. The citizens of the little mining town were congregated in the street, staring at him wondering and amazed. Parson Bill held his head high and looked at no man as he ran the gauntlet of their gaze. His face had been very red at first, but now was as pale as a sunburned, wind-tanned face could be. He kept his lips pressed tightly together, and never in all his life had his heart beat as it did then. Save for very shame's

Why Man of To-day Is Only 50 Per Cent. Efficient

By WALTER GRIFFITH

IF one were to form an opinion from the number of helpful, inspiring and informing articles one sees in the public press and magazines, the purpose of which is to increase our efficiency, he must believe that the entire American Nation is striving for such an end—

And this is so.

The American Man because the race is swifter every day; competition is keener and the stronger the man the greater his capacity to win. The stronger the man the stronger his will and brain, and the greater his ability to match wits and win. The greater his confidence in himself, the greater the confidence of other people in him; the keener his wit and the clearer his brain.

The American Woman because she must be competent to rear and manage the family and home, and take all the thought and responsibility from the shoulders of the man whose present-day business burdens are all that he can carry.

Now, what are we doing to secure that efficiency? Much mentally, some of us much physically, but what is the trouble?

We are not really efficient more than half the time. Half the time blue and worried all the time nervous—some of the time really incapacitated by illness.

There is a reason for this—a practical reason, one that has been known to physicians for quite a period and will be known to the entire World ere long.

That reason is that the human system does not, and will not, rid itself of all the waste which it accumulates under our present mode of living. No matter how regular we are, the food we eat and the sedentary lives we live (even though we do get some exercise) make it impossible; just as impossible as it is for the grate of a stove to rid itself of clinkers.

And the waste does to us exactly what the clinkers do to the stove: make the fire burn low and inefficiently until enough clinkers have accumulated, and then prevent its burning at all.

It has been our habit, after this waste has reduced our efficiency about 75 per cent., to drug ourselves; or, after we have become 100 per cent. inefficient through illness, to still further attempt to rid ourselves of it in the same way—by drugging.

If a clock is not cleaned once in a while it clogs up and stops; the same way with an engine because of the residue which it, itself, accumulates. To clean the clock, you would not put acid on the parts, though you could probably find one that would do the work, nor to clean the engine would you force a cleaner through it that would injure its parts; yet that is the process you employ when you drug the system to rid it of waste.

You would clean your clock and engine with a harmless cleanser that Nature has provided, and you can do exactly the same for yourself, as I will demonstrate before I conclude.

The reason that a physician's first step in illness is to purge the system is that no medicine can take effect nor can the system work properly while the colon (large intestine) is clogged up. If the colon were not clogged up the chances are 10 to 1 that you would not have been ill at all.

It may take some time for the clogging process to reach the stage where it produces real illness, but, no matter how long it takes, while it is going on the functions are not working so as to keep us up to "concert pitch." Our livers are sluggish, we are dull and heavy—slight or severe headaches come on—our sleep does not rest us—in short, we are about 50 per cent. efficient.

And if this condition progresses to where real illness develops, it is impossible to tell what form that illness will take, because—The blood is constantly circulating through the colon and, taking up by absorption the poisons in the waste which it contains, it distributes them throughout the system and weakens it so that we are subject to whatever disease is most prevalent.

The nature of the illness depends on our own little weaknesses and what we are the least able to resist.

These facts are all scientifically correct in every particular, and it has often surprised me that they are not more generally known and appreciated. All we have to do is to consider the treatment that we have received in illness to realize fully how it developed, and the methods used to remove it.

So you see that not only is accumulated waste directly and constantly pulling down our efficiency by making our blood poor and our intellect dull—our spirits low and our ambitions weak, but it is responsible through its weakening and infecting processes for a list of illnesses that if catalogued here would seem almost unbelievable.

It is the direct and immediate cause of that very expensive and dangerous complaint appendicitis.

If we can successfully eliminate the waste all our functions work properly and in accord—there are no poisons being taken up by the blood, so it is pure and imparts strength to every part of the body instead of weakness—there is nothing to clog up the system and make us bilious, dull and nervously fearful.

With everything working in perfect accord and without obstruction, our brains are clear, our entire physical being is competent to respond quickly to every requirement, and we are 100 per cent. efficient.

Now this waste that I speak of cannot be thoroughly removed by drugs, but even if it could the effect of these drugs on the functions is very unnatural, and if continued becomes a periodical necessity.

Note the opinions on drugging of two most eminent physicians:

Prof. Alonzo Clark, M.D., of the New York College of Physicians and Surgeons, says: "All of our curative agents are poisons, and as a consequence, every dose diminishes the patient's vitality."

Prof. Joseph M. Smith, M.D., of the same school, says: "All medicines which enter the circulation poison the blood in the same manner as do the poisons that produce disease."

Now, the internal organism can be kept as sweet and pure and clean as the external and by the same natural, sane method—bathing. By the proper system warm water can be introduced so that the colon is perfectly cleansed and kept pure.

There is no violence in this process—it seems to be just as normal and natural as washing one's hands.

Physicians are taking it up more widely and generally every day, and it seems as though every one should be informed thoroughly on a practice which, though so rational and simple, is revolutionary in its accomplishments.

This is rather a delicate subject to write of exhaustively in the public press, but Charles A. Tyrrell, M. D., has prepared an interesting treatise on "Why Man of To-day Is Only 50 per cent. Efficient," which treats the subject very exhaustively, and which he will send without cost to any one addressing him at 134 West 65th Street, New York, and mentioning that they have read this article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Personally, I am enthusiastic on Internal Bathing because I have seen what it has done in illness as well as in health, and I believe that every person who wishes to keep in as near a perfect condition as is humanly possible should at least be informed on this subject: he will also probably learn something about himself which he has never known through reading the little book to which I refer.—Advertisement.

THY WILL

Reeve A. Silk — Harriet Hyatt Silk

Moderato
1. We now come, through faith, to wor-ship Thee, our God, our Sa-vior King;
2. Lord, we pray Thy will be done, now, In our lives, as done in Heav'n;
3. Grant to us, Thy Ho-ly Spir-it In Thy full in-dwelling pow'r;
4. May our hearts o'er flow to oth-ers, With Thy love and grace Divine;
To Thy will, we now sur-ren-der; To Thy throne, our lives, we bring.
To Thy will, we now sur-ren-der; Cleanse our hearts from earth-ly leav'n.
To Thy will, we now sur-ren-der; Gifts for ser-vice, free-ly show'r.
To Thy will, we now sur-ren-der; May we, Lord, be whol-ly Thine.
CHORUS
All to Thee, In full sur-ren-der; Christ in Thee is all the pow'r:
Grant, O! grant! we pray Lord Je-sus Strength from Thee, for ev-e-ry hour.

sake, he would have turned and fled incontinently. The thoughts in his brain were not in consonance with the sweetness, the calm, and the peace of that Sunday morning.

The men who stared at him were more or less silent, although he did hear titters and catch a jeer now and then. But all sorts of emotions were expressed on their countenances, and Parson Bill would have liked nothing better than to have turned and hammered the smiles and sneers off of the faces nearest him with his fists. His hands sought his holster where his weapon hung. He had come armed as a matter of course, and it was with difficulty that he kept himself under control.

Yet the terrible strain was good for Parson Bill. If he was to be purified after such a life as his had been, it must be by fire, and even purifying fire burns. It does not lose its characteristics because of its end. In a very un-Christian mood, therefore, but with a dogged determination for which he should receive credit, Parson Bill finally presented himself before the others.

"This is Parson Bill, my best friend, Mrs. Morrison," said Olaf, doing the honors with native politeness.

"Pleased to see you, ma'am."

"I'm so glad to meet you, Mr. Parson Bill," she responded genially. "This is my husband, Mr. Morrison, and these are my daughters, Jennie and Annie," she continued.

"Glad to make your acquaintance, sir, and young ladies," said Parson Bill, bowing very stiffly.

Mr. Morrison was a thin, delicate-looking man, but Parson Bill was accustomed to read those with whom he came in contact; and he saw that in spite of his ill health and frail physique, Mr. Morrison was nevertheless a real man, and he respected him accordingly.

"We were waiting for you," said Mrs. Morrison, "and if you will come closer, we will begin."

"If you please, ma'am," said Bill, twirling his big Stetson hat in his hands in his great embarrassment, "I come yere 'cause I said I would, but I ain't feelin' any too religious, and if you don't mind, I'll set down yere." He pointed to a boulder some little distance away.

"Take any place you like," said Mr. Morrison kindly. "Now we'll begin this Sunday school."

"Wait! wait!" exclaimed Olaf excitedly. "Look, look!"

ANSWERS TO FINANCIAL QUERIES

MRS. C. B. B., CONNECTICUT. Don't sell your Travelers' Insurance stock despite the high price. It is not impossible that a substantial extra dividend will be declared. 100 per cent. extra was paid in 1913.

MRS. A. J. B., OHIO. We get no reply to our letters to the Ginseng Company. Hence we assume the promoters have nothing to say regarding the value of the shares. The company is not known in Wall Street.

G. B. D., VIRGINIA. Some public utility collateral bond issues are entirely sound, while others, seemingly just as sound, are not so safe—and some are not safe at all. Not knowing the issue you have in mind we cannot judge.

J. W., TEXAS. We cannot help in the matter of raising the $3,000 loan which you seek to obtain on your church property at less than the prevailing 8 per cent. rate. You will probably have to pay the rate demanded by the Fort Worth firm.

D. P. M., NEW YORK. (1) Braden Copper has nearly doubled its production over last year, but the shares must be considered speculative. (2) Huntington Land and Improvement Collateral Trust bonds pay 6 per cent., and are well thought of.

D. E. C., INDIANA. The shares of the International Steam Pump Company are not recommended as a "safe investment." Stick to recognized investment issues. Keep away from uncertainties. Buy good $100 bonds of railroads or public utilities.

J. A. O., PENNSYLVANIA. You are entirely right about the Pennsylvania Railroad Employees' Savings Fund. The fund is governed by Pennsylvania State laws, and is supervised by the great railway corporation itself. All station agents in the State are empowered to receive deposits from employees of the great system.

DR. C. C., MINNESOTA. Duluth, Missabe and Northern Railway Company general mortgage 5 per cent. gold bonds, which you have under consideration for your investment, are believed to be well secured as to principal and interest. We have no hesitancy in commending your choice and the selection of your bankers.

MISS "PRUDENCE," FLORIDA. We regret you have invested in the stock of the coal company. Such ventures are necessarily very risky. You should not seek to obtain 8 per cent. We are always glad to advise our readers who will accept 6 per cent. or less, but we will absolutely not recommend a security which promises a higher return.

MRS. E. C. W., CALIFORNIA. (1) Your Rio Grande Junction first 5 per cent. bond (1939) and Rio Grande Western first 4 per cent. bond (1939) are good securities, and, in our opinion, should be held. (2) New York, Susquehanna and Western terminal first gold 5 per cent. bond (1943) are quoted 106-110, but seldom change hands. (3) All listed on New York Stock Exchange.

"THREE SISTERS," PENNSYLVANIA. The subsidiary properties owned by the American Water Works and Guarantee Company were bought in at reorganization sale at Pittsburg, April 15, by the new American Water Works and Electric Company. There are now three classes of stock: first preferred, participating preferred and common. The new stock is quoted in market reports daily.

REV. A. M. P., OHIO. We commend your proposed course. Do so by all means. After you obtain your $6,000 invest it in good bonds. We would call your attention to Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway 4½ per cent. general and refunding mortgage gold bonds, which may be obtained at 895 from banking firms whose announcements appear on this page. The investment will net 4.66 per cent.

D. D. M., NEW JERSEY. (1) You did right in demanding payment. You will receive your money. (2) The extension of the deposited Missouri Pacific $20,000,000 three-year five per cent. notes for one year merely puts off the inevitable settlement, plus one per cent. additional interest burden. The Gould estate advanced $4,725,000 to unassenting noteholders. Just what will become of the Missouri Pacific stock—which the late Russell Sage had such faith in that he was quoted as saying, a number of years before his death, it would eventually sell at $200—is impossible to say with any degree of certainty.

W. D. H., NEW YORK. The item in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of May 27, which reads, "All Texas land, except around the Gulf coast, requires irrigation," we are informed, is an error. The land embraced in all that section of the State east of a line drawn north and south from a point about one hundred miles west of Fort Worth requires no irrigation, and abundant crops are produced, we are told.

"INVESTOR," NEW HAMPSHIRE. One of the most attractive 5 per cent. investments for $500 we have had brought to our notice recently are the Portsmouth (N. H.) Gas Company first mortgage bonds. The earnings of the company are reported at a rate nearly three times the interest charges on outstanding bonds. A banking firm is offering these bonds at a price that will yield the investor 5.15 per cent.

W. E. C., MAINE. In view of the uncertainty of the continuance of the 10 per cent. dividends, Lehigh Valley Railroad stock can hardly be recommended as a purchase. The road did not earn its dividend for the first seven months of the fiscal year. But, in justice to the road, it is remarked that May earnings were greater than the same month a year ago, when the road was earning between 13 and 14 per cent. on the stock.

S. P., OHIO. (1) We regard the new State of Mississippi serial 4 per cent. gold bonds one of the most attractive municipal issues recently offered to the public. You might buy one $500 bond and two of the $100 denomination. (2) So far as we can learn the State of Mississippi has repudiated but two bond issues, the Planters' Bank bonds, issued in 1833, and the Union Bank bonds, issued in 1838, amounting altogether to $7,000,000. These issues were repudiated in 1842.

"BEGINNER," GEORGIA. There are abundant opportunities for sound investment of amounts as small as one hundred dollars. Many of the $1,000 bonds come also in $100 denomination and the biggest banking houses treat a $100 investor as courteously as the investor of large amounts. The Springfield (Ohio) Railway Company first mortgage 5 per cent. serial bonds may be secured in $100 pieces. This issue is recommended to both small and large investors by prominent bankers to yield 5.40 per cent.

C. E. M., MISSOURI. (1) United States Public Service Co. collateral lien gold notes (1918) are regarded as an excellent 6 per cent. investment. (2) Don't be frightened at talk of "trouble" with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and don't sell your 4 per cent. gold bond, for any "trouble" the road may run into will in no way affect the soundness of your investment. (3) The Twin State Gas and Electric Company three-year secured gold notes represent an attractive 6 per cent. investment.

MRS. E. P. D., RHODE ISLAND. New Haven Railroad stock is far removed from "a woman's investment of $3,000." While in time the stock may sell above its present price, the outlook is not very encouraging. No dividends are now paid, and years may elapse before payments will be resumed. The road is almost crushed by its debts. The company faces an almost certainty of dismemberment and drastic reorganization. Keep out of such a highly speculative venture. Buy, instead, three good bonds. Bonds prices and yields are now very attractive.

MRS. C. E. M. The two following bonds are suggested as fully meeting your requirements for a safe and fairly profitable investment:

$1,000 Rio Grande Junction Railway First Mortgage 5 per cent. bond.

$1,000 Detroit and Toledo Shore Line Railroad Company First Mortgage 4 per cent. gold bond.

The security back of these mortgages is considered ample. The first-named road reports earnings of more than twice the annual interest charges, and the latter road is earning six times the annual interest charges.

IS less than six months since the CHRISTIAN HERALD Prayer League was organized, and its members already number nearly thousand. Many more would been enrolled if they had not ected to forward their names and dresses instead of sending merely initials. Their requests have, of e, been printed, but it has been ssible to enroll them as members e League.

you not wish to join this mighty of people who believe in prayer who are receiving evidences of ower in their daily lives? All is necessary is to send your name address. The membership of the er League is not limited to those are subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN LD. Any one is at liberty to send equest for prayer, or an acknowlgment of prayers answered. Beappearing in THE CHRISTIAN LD the requests are also sent to Bowery Mission, where they are subjects of special prayer at the ings of the Mission Brotherhood. so, do you not know of friends might be glad to join in this felship of prayer? If you will send e names and addresses of any such friends we will forward to them an application for enrolment.

Membership cards are about to be issued to all those already enrolled in the Prayer League. And from this date every one sending a request for prayer, an acknowledgment of answered prayer or a request to be enrolled in the League will receive one of these membership cards.

If you are already a member of the Prayer League do not fail to send in to-day the names and addresses of others who you think would like to be enrolled, and if you have not yet sent in your own application for enrolment do so at once.

While no pledge is given, members of the Prayer League are expected to make the noon hour a time every day of special prayer for all the other members of the League, particularly that the prayers published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may be answered, and that Christ's kingdom throughout the world may be in every way advanced. Even if it is not possible to retire to solitude the heart can be lifted in silent prayer and every heart will be blessed in realizing that hundreds of others are uniting in the noonday petition.

A-R-E SIX'S

The 6% Bonds of the American Real Estate Company are based upon its extensive ownership of real estate in the Boroughs of Manhattan and The Bronx in New York City and in the City of Yonkers adjoining New York City.

For over twenty-six years these bonds have been favorably known to thousands of individual investors as A-R-E SIX'S, and it may be to your advantage before placing July funds to know about the American Real Estate Company, its bonds, and the successful business back of its bonds.

A-R-E SIX'S are not mortgage bonds,—they are debenture bonds, the direct contract obligations of the American Real Estate Company, issued in two forms, as follows:

6% COUPON BONDS

In denominations of $100, $200, $500, $1000 and upward, interest payable semi-annually by coupons attached, and principal maturing in ten years.

6% ACCUMULATIVE BONDS

Maturing in ten, fifteen or twenty years, for $1000 and upward, purchasable by installments. The installments bear interest at 6%, which is compounded annually, accumulated and paid with the total installments at maturity.

Questions and Answers

M. M., Danbury, Conn. The old Bible continues to be the "biggest seller" of all the books the world has ever known. In an official statement, just published, it is shown that during the last twelve months ending May 6 the British and Foreign Bible Society has printed and circulated 1,006,281 complete Bibles, 1,275,040 Testaments and 6,676,912 portions and Gospels, while the American Bible Society in the same period has printed and circulated 5,251,176 volumes of the Scriptures (complete and portions), the grand total being 14,209,799. This is an increase of nearly 2,000,000 copies over the preceding year. But even this vast number does not represent the total Bible production by any means. Outside of the two Bible Societies, there are the great German Bible Societies and those of Holland, France and Russia, besides a large number of publishing houses which issue thousands of Bibles and Gospels yearly. If all of these were taken into account, their product would probably swell the grand total to something like 18,000,000 copies. The Word of God is now printed in six hundred languages and dialects and every year is increasing the list of those far-off races to which the Bible is now available.

E. C. S., Maysville, N. C. 1. Cardiff is the leading commercial city of Wales. 2. The name of the Samaritan village referred to in Luke 9: 52 is nowhere mentioned in Scripture. 3. In I Peter 4: 18, the "ungodly" are those who had no regard for God, a negative description of the unbeliever, while the "sinner" is the man who was in actual sin—a positive case—one who had at once forgotten God and who loved sin. 4. The name of the Queen of Sheba is pronounced "Bal-kis" in two syllables. The Arabs have preserved her name as Bilkis and Bal-Kamah.

A. G. D., Greenville, Ohio. 1. The passage in Gal. 3: 27 reads, in the Greek, "for as many of you as have been baptized have clothed yourselves with Christ." The meaning is that the ordinance, in its true interpretation, is not a mere empty sign but "a means of spiritual transference from a state of legal condemnation to that of living union with Christ and of sonship with him in relation to God" (Rom. 13: 14). 2. Commentators clear up the seeming discrepancy between Acts 9: 7 and Acts 22: 9 by pointing out that while those that were with Paul heard the sound of a voice, they did not hear the articulated words. Thus we might hear the sound of a speaker's voice, if we stood on the fringe of a big audience at some distance, yet comprehending nothing of what was said.

J. A. U., Cartersville, Ill. Kindly explain just what "Home Rule" signifies, and what kind of government will it give Ireland?

Home Rule means that Ireland will be governed by an Irish Parliament, sitting at Dublin, rather than by a British Parliament sitting at London. Ireland will then be like Canada or Australia, having a government of its own, yet connected with the British Empire and to some extent subject to the London Parliament through the secretary of state.

Mrs. W. A. L., Tate, Tenn. The letter to J. K., in the Mail-Bag of April 22, describes my condition almost exactly. I don't doubt your answer, but my trouble is this: I know I have "come," but can't believe Jesus has pardoned my sins, and can't see how I can believe it unless I could feel it. I have prayed for assurance of my acceptance, but have none, only Jesus' word that he will in no wise cast out those who come. I know it is wrong to doubt, but I seem powerless to help it, and I am afraid to work for Jesus unless I get the assurance that he accepts me as his own.

If you will study carefully the words of your own letter you will find the answer to your question plainly revealed there. "I have prayed for assurance of my acceptance, but have none but Jesus' word." When you wrote those words you had no conception how really terrible they would look in type. You cannot mean to take this attitude. You are being grieved and tormented, and have not accepted the Father's human and comforting suggestion: "Come now and let us reason together." You have Jesus' own word that he accepts you. You yourself say that you have it. "What more can he say than to you he hath said?" How would your husband feel if you should say: "I have no other assurance that this is true but your word?" How does Christ feel when you treat his own word so lightly? If you waited for your feelings you would be trusting not Christ, but your feelings. They fluctuate, but Christ never changes. Begin to sing: "On Christ, the solid rock, I stand," and you will find your feelings

FOURTH OF JULY

Have you a Flag?

THIS is to announce that we have secured a new flag for our readers, of the same size (6 feet long by 4 feet wide) as the flag we have been using. It is made by the Dunkards of Pennsylvania, and you may be sure that it is well made. The stripes are double-stitched to one another. This is really one of the biggest values in flags we have been able to offer. You should have one for the Fourth.

With this Flag goes FREE a Beautiful Portfolio (11x16 inches, in Colors) of the Panama Canal.

Here is your chance to own a large American Flag, like the one shown in this picture. Not a little hand-flag, but a large-sized "Old Glory," six feet long by four feet wide—bigger than the top of your dining-room table! Real red, white and blue, and guaranteed not to fade, run or shrink, no matter what the weather. Here is your chance to possess of the Panama Canal, the eighth wonder of the world, containing

1.—Full descriptive text of the history of the Panama Canal.
2.—Photographs of all the most important and interesting points along the new waterway.
3.—Colored maps showing the topography of the Canal Zone.
4.—Diagrams showing the great changes in routes of ocean transportation.
5.—A map of the United States in colors.
6.—A map of the world in colors, illustrating the greater means of communication by reason of the Canal.
7.—Eight photographs depicting the main buildings, grounds, and bird's-eye view of the great Panama-Pacific International Exposition.

This remarkable Portfolio will give you a comprehensive idea of just what the Panama Canal looks like and what its completion means to the United States and to the world at large.

This Portfolio will answer for you almost any question you may wish to ask concerning the Panama Canal, and as this "short passage to the Indies" will be opened for traffic before very long, you will need an American Flag to celebrate the event.

[☞ The pole is not included in this offer.]

Compare the size of the flag with the height of the children.

A Flag for ALL Holidays

You will need the flag for every holiday for years to come, and you can use it constantly for decorative purposes in public and private sociables, in the schoolhouse, in the church, and, best of all, in the home. You will be able to celebrate the Fourth properly with this Flag.

ALL for only $2.00

OLD AT TWENTY

Return of Youth with Proper Food.

Many persons who eat plenty never seem to be properly nourished.

That's because the food is not digested and absorbed. Much that is eaten is never taken up by the system as real food, and so the tissues simply starve and the individual may, as in a recent case, look and feel old in what should be the bloom of life, youth.

"At twenty I was prematurely old. The health and vigor and brightness of youth had been, as it seemed, stolen from me. I went to work in the morning with slow steps and a dull head.

"My work through the day was unsatisfactory, for my breakfast lay in my stomach like a hard lump. I was peevish and the gas in my stomach was very annoying. After supper I usually went to bed to toss half the night from sheer nervousness.

"This was all from indigestion—caused by wrong eating.

"Finally I tried Grape-Nuts and I cannot describe the full benefits received from the food. It gave me back my health. It has completely restored good digestion and my ailments have disappeared. I steadily improved and am now strong and in perfect health."

DO YOU KNOW YOUR BIBLE?

KEEP your eyes open for a new announcement about the Bible questions. Special arrangements will be made for rewarding all who answer correctly all the questions of the last six lists irrespective of their record on the first six lists. New competitors can enter. The year's contest will go on as at first announced, and special prizes will be given to those making the best record for the year. But new competitors and old will all be included in the new offer to be made next month by which a reward will be promised to all those making a perfect record for the last half of the year.

The questions for the past six months have been about Old Testament characters. Beginning with July the questions for the rest of the year will be on New Testament characters.

New Questions, List No. 6

1. How did Daniel happen to be living at Babylon?
2. How there did he first show the strength and purity of his character?
3. (a) Who was king of Babylon at the beginning of Daniel's residence there? (b) Who succeeded him? (c) Who succeeded the second king, and under what circumstances did he obtain the throne?
4. Describe two occasions on which Daniel appeared before the first king; one on which he appeared to the second king; and two on which the third king came to him.
5. On what conditions did Daniel declare that a calamity threatening the first king could be averted?
6. State three expressions made by the first king recognizing the God of Israel.
7. What statement did the third king make to Daniel about his God, and what decree did he later make concerning God?
8. To what other prophet and to what special prediction that he made does Daniel refer?
9. What angel appeared twice to Daniel with special messages concerning the future?
10. What striking phrase, three times repeated, indicates at once the singular charm of Daniel and his true piety?

Honor Roll and answers to list No. 5 will appear next week.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

religious education" so that we shall know how to use the material of the Book so that the pupil shall be led to find Christ and to know his place in the world?

If these definitions are to form the plan and purpose of the Sunday school then every earnest Sunday school worker will lay hold upon every thread of help to grow increasingly efficient in working with Christ in shaping character "for service in the extension of the kingdom."

In the next Training article we shall indicate a plan for discovering and training Sunday school leadership.

In addition to these Special Method articles which will appear in alternate weeks of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, questions are cordially invited upon the pressing personal problems of officers and teachers. These will be answered as far as possible in this column and should be addressed to Frank L. Brown, care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

FOR this Gold Medal represents the Grand Prix of the jury of the International Congress of Medicine—the world's greatest medical gathering. Convening once in four years, the Congress assembles the foremost physicians of every country of the globe, and its deliberations bear the stamp of final authority. So when under the auspices of such a tribunal, to Sanatogen alone among the many foods and tonics exhibited, is awarded the Grand Prix—there should be no question of Sanatogen's standing as the best and most dependable food tonic.

More than 21,000 physicians have already signified in writing their personal faith in Sanatogen. But this award symbolizes the world-wide, professional recognition of Sanatogen as a rational FOOD-tonic that feeds and rebuilds impoverished cell and tissue, helping digestion and recalling the strength and vigor of youth.

Sanatogen is sold by druggists everywhere in 3 sizes, from $1.00 up.

Send for "Nerve Health Regained"—A handsomely illustrated booklet. The basic facts of health, the scientific "HOW" and "WHY" of Sanatogen, told here from the physician's point of view, are as remarkable as they are convincing.

IN CENTRAL PARK

NOT until we prepare for a trip do we realize how necessary to our comfort and convenience are certain everyday articles whose use in the home is a matter of course.

Next to individual toilet utensils, the most intimate thing of all is Ivory Soap. Used the year around, it becomes so familiar that only when there is a possibility of being deprived of it do we fully appreciate its virtues.

Then when we look ahead to the possible discomforts of travel and foresee the substitutes which will be offered on trains and in hotels we hasten to slip in a cake of this favorite cleanser.

For while there are hundreds of soaps, each claiming to be ideal in every way, there is, after all, but one Ivory.

THE GOSPEL OUTDOOR CAMPAIGN

SAID the Preacher: All is vanity. But he was wrong. Yet excusable. For who to-day, looking out upon the turmoil of life, the struggle for place and power, the competition for applause, the clamor for a hearing, the effort to keep alive, the song of pleasure and the shout of war, would not exclaim: All is vanity! There is one who would not—the street preacher. He has evidence to the contrary. Then there still are men and women who are not bound hand and foot to Mammon? Are you? No? Well, then you answer your own question. You are one who is not, at any rate. And there are thousands upon thousands who are not bound—wholly; only a hand or a foot. And they would be free—like you. They hate their over-lord; they hate the struggle for a hearing, the fight to live, the clamor for place and power. They would be free to serve a God of peace and love and quietness and rest. But knowing not how, they struggle on in the throng, till they hear a voice sounding over the heads of a group of people, saying: "And the truth shall make you free!" So then, they pause. They listen. They accept. And the truth of Christ sets them free. So all is not vanity, for it is not vanity to stand where the crowd flows by and to cry aloud: "Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters." For there are many, many thirsting human hearts in the great cities. The street preachers know it. They have seen them drink of that life-giving stream. All is not vanity. Christ is still real. The need of him is still real. His power to rescue is still real. The need to send out preachers is still real. . . . Is your zeal for the salvation of God's wanderers still real?

WITH THE EVANGELISTIC COMMITTEE

HE GENERALLY spent his Sundays playing golf, only occasionally attending the church of which he was a member. Passing through Madison Square one noonday, this business man paused through curiosity to listen to a street preacher. To his surprise, he found himself held by the common sense of the stirring appeal made by the evangelist. His heart was touched, his sense of moral responsibility was awakened, and he rededicated his life to the service of God. People of all descriptions pass through those two great breathing-places in the center of Manhattan, Madison and Union Squares, and those who listen to song and exhortation include every imaginable type: runaway girls, profligate men, mothers with babies, old men leaning on canes, well-dressed young fellows "seeing New York" (three of whom at one meeting confessed that they had never read the Bible), shopgirls with daily trimmed and betilted hats, prosperous men of affairs, and the destitute, discouraged victim of adversity or sin. All have one common need, the need of a Saviour, and hundreds accept Christ here in the public square, while the cars and trucks rattle by, and the street's voices break upon the singer and cornet. A man who had stayed six weeks on the road to a reformed life was just pondering how he should get through the day, and was almost ready to yield to temptation, when he heard the voice of the Wall Street preacher saying: "If you think you can't hold out in the Christian life, just ask God to help you through the next five minutes, then ask him again for the next five minutes, and so live near to God and with his help five minutes at a time." Of course it was just the prescription the man needed. He joined the group daily thereafter, and has been able to continue in the straight and narrow way.

NOON MEETING AT THE CORNER OF WALL AND BROAD STREETS

The Evangelistic Committee of New York City naturally comes in touch with English-speaking people first and foremost, while it extends its work to meet the needs of ten other nationalities. During the summer of 1913, there were six tents for English services—three in Manhattan and three in the Bronx—and this summer there will be as many, possibly more. In the course of a notable service last year there were addresses in English, Hungarian, Polish and Yiddish, and a talk by a missionary recently returned from Africa. A girls' club in one tent comprised Bohemians, Hungarians, Jews and Irish. A boys' club in another tent included representatives of five nationalities. When these lads were taken for a day's outing, they were found to be cigarette smokers, beer drinkers, and "toters of guns." To win "gangs" of boys—and of girls—has been one of the happy experiences of the workers for the Evangelistic Committee. Personal talks on hygiene, on smoking, drinking, cleanliness of body and mind, and on patriotism and civic honor, have accompanied religious instruction and spiritual uplift.

As to the lasting results, there is Mike, for instance, who in one of the early years of the work, when the committee's tent invaded his neighborhood and aroused his antagonism, threw bags of water from the roof of his tenement home over the heads of the speakers and singers. He is now a constant attendant at the Union Square noon meetings, and his family are all in the church. In 1911, a tent worker visited a family living in wretched circumstances in a cellar. The little daughter was converted in the tent, and is now a church member and an active Christian Endeavorer. The family has risen from its pitiful condition, having a comfortable home with peace and happiness instead of squalor and brawls. In many a Western and Southern town, there are missionaries and others doing Christian work, who first accepted Christ in a tent or at an open-air meeting in New York City. In foreign lands, there are others spreading the good tidings first learned at these informal evangelistic services.

In New York City there are over 3,400,000 adults and over 873,000 boys and girls of school age who do not attend church or Sunday school—Catholic, Protestant, or Jew—regularly. Infidels, atheists, anarchists, drunkards, gamblers, thieves, libertines, harlots, divorcees, gangsters, gunmen and murderers result from such non-religious life.

In 1913, the Evangelistic Committee conducted 2,593 meetings in 149 centers, in eleven languages, with an aggregate attendance of 680,345 at an expenditure of $28,154.85, which is about four cents per capita. These meetings held in tents, shops, halls, parks, and on the streets, resulted in the forming of churches, missions, Sunday schools, Bible classes, men's clubs, boys' clubs, girls' clubs, King's Daughters' circles, and in the development of missionaries and pastors. The work is supported entirely by voluntary contributions, and no collections ever taken in the meetings. Rev. Dr. Arthur J. Smith is superintendent; John Nicolson, treasurer, 541 Lexington Avenue, New York.

WORK OF THE NATIONAL BIBLE INSTITUTE

SEVEN years ago two young men walked through the heart of New York City. They watched the tide of humanity that ceaselessly flows to and fro in its streets. They noted the incoming multitude of foreigners, the increasing tendency to moral laxness, the absorption of men in business, politics, and sports to the exclusion of spiritual matters. A vision of the struggle among the unsaved masses of the metropolis broke upon them, and there was born a purpose that through seven years of organized development and material progress has never been lost: constant, daily effort to evangelize the needy millions of New York.

It takes courage these days to stick to an idea through thick and thin: it takes tremendous faith. But we grow to the strength of our largest thoughts. Those two young men, Don O. Shelton, the president of the National Bible Institute, and H. Willis Reed, for several years the Institute's secretary, had caught the thrill of a martial note, had received marching orders. They recognized that thousands outside the membership of the Christian Church were not even being touched by direct Gospel influences. Out on the street corners, by the side of the parks, into the thickest of the crowd, they went for their field of action. It was a case of "go after them." Since that early ministry of 1907 the National Bible Institute has been going after them persistently. Outdoor evangelistic meetings, indoor Gospel services, Bible classes, mission conferences, mission halls, anything, everything, whereby could be carried out their impelling motive, viz.: Aggressive evangelism every day in the year. The work attracted public notice. Business men approved its practical methods and definite aim. Churchmen watched, co-operated, and were satisfied with results.

But through all the developing immensity of the work and the urgency of the demand for immediacy, one principle has ever been kept prominently to the front: to be instant in season and out, preaching the Word only, sticking inflexibly to that one thing—aggressive evangelism every day in the year.

MIDNIGHT STREET MEETING, NEW YORK EVANGELISTIC COMMITTEE

Social-betterment plans, human-welfare projects, a hundred and one sche invited co-operation; the National Bible Institute, recognizing that these their place, held steadily to the belief that its mission was to present no o remedy or hope for wretchedness and sin, but "Christ and him crucified."

Some five thousand of these outdoor services were held from 1907 to 1 reaching over 500,000 people. No general laying his plans for battle is n judicious in the selection of leaders, clearer sighted in choosing point attack, than are these warriors of the Cross in their raids against sin Satan. The best business men of the city are found on their list of speak The busiest centers of trade and traffic are their common preaching grou As much interest is evinced in the salvation of the smallest bootblack in crowd as in the eternal welfare of man from Fifth Avenue. None are lowly to be touched; none too high be reached; none too good not to needy; this is the Gospel they pror gate. From April to October they at it. The prospect never gets dark, the weather never too hot effort, the conflict never too fierce discouraging. "Aggressive evan ism every day in the year"—and t stick everlastingly to it.

The outdoor services are now in swing. Meetings are scattered f the Battery on the extreme south Manhattan to the Bronx on the treme north. An innovation this y in the Institute's outdoor work is Children's Services, with songs illustrated sermons. On a recent S day afternoon about thirty child mainly Italians, marched with fl flying to Central Park, and formin group at the curbstone for half hour sang Gospel songs under leadership of a worker from the tional Bible Institute. These children's outdoor services will be held every S day, from four to four-thirty, in various parts of the city. Children f the various missions conducted by the National Bible Institute will sing, an short illustrated sermon will be given by popular speakers.

A certain firm advertises a "remedy with a mission." The National Bi Institute is a "Mission with a Remedy." There are multitudes in New Y who never darken a church door. There are thousands who do not know story of Jesus in all its beauty and power. The evangelizing of these shepherded masses, over one-half the city's population, is the stupendous t the Institute has set itself for every day in the year. It is not a summer ca paign. It is not a winter revival. It is a steady, persistent reaching tow one goal, spurred on by the confident belief of every worker on the staff t the Gospel is the supreme need of man.

SIGNS OF PEACE IN MEXICO

THE trend of events during the current week has been toward the early termination of the Peace Mediation Board at Niagara Falls, Ont. Their one serious difficulty is the selection of a provisional president. The Mexican delegates on June 18 gave out to the press their objections to the selection of a Constitutionalist for that post. The gist of their statements is that under the conditions prevailing in Mexico a Constitutionalist would so manipulate the election as to continue that faction in power, regardless of the will of the people, and thus invite continued unrest. And for the United States to insist upon a Constitutionalist as provisional president is tantamount to conniving at just such a proceeding. The Mexicans having taken this unusual course, the American delegates replied also through the press, repudiating the intimation of unfair motives, and reasserting that the sole wish of the United States is to secure the election of a permanent government in a manner so free from objection that it will be accepted with confidence by all parties.

The Constitutionalist forces sustained a repulse at the town of Zacatecas, under General Natera, whose appointment as commander of a division was so resented by Villa that he resigned as military chief and announced his intention of becoming governor of the State of Chihuahua. It is stated that he had even taken drastic steps to seize the reins of the government of that State, and had imprisoned Carranza officials. Carranza, finding the officers of the army loyal to Villa, and Villa disposed to a reconciliation on condition that Carranza should retain control of civil and foreign affairs and Villa of military matters, gave way. At last reports, Villa was on his way to recover the ground lost at Zacatecas.

Other news about Mexico is of secondary importance, excepting possibly that the Federals about Vera Cruz are said to be advancing their lines around the city and assuming a defiant attitude toward the American forces. There is still an optimistic feeling that the settlement of Mexico will be accomplished through the efforts of the Peace Board, with the co-operation of Carranza and Villa.

CITIZENS OR ALIENS?

BY FRANCES A. KELLOR

F THE little Greek bootblack after five or ten years with his kit saves up money enough to start a barber shop; or if Giuseppe Sermolino, who was so skilful in reviving the wilted let- at the little stand around the corner, opens up, day, a fruit shop de luxe with every architec- al detail of apple and orange pyramids and fancy cker box structures consistently carried out; or sidor Moscowitz, who struggled so convulsively h his English when at ten years he began his t year in an American school, goes on to the school and then to the university, and appears day as an eager Ph.D. or a lawyer, we set down se not unfamiliar histories as just so many more ances of the opportunities this country offers to immigrant. The little Greek and Italian and are to be congratulated on their good luck.

t some point in their career, rather remarkable must indeed have been upon the side of these essful ones. For not all the little Greeks and ians and Jews and Armenians and Hungarians Russians that pass through Ellis Island follow ascending current. Some of those, most of se, that came to New York one winter perhaps years ago and got a job in the sweat-shop are in the sweat-shop; some of them are still, year er year, answering the same call for seasonal k in the isolated labor camp or in the cannery.

Upon what things does the immigrant's chance to ceed depend? How much does he owe to America, how much does he owe to luck or to his indom- ble energy and persistence? Just what does erica offer him, how does she use what he brings , and how available to the average immigrant her institutions and her "opportunities"?

ll the experiments, studies and investigations de by the North American Civic League for Im- grants to answer these questions—studies of the nigrant in relation to labor, to education, to legal tection, to social ideals—led to the same general conclusion: America allows the immigrant to Americanize himself—if he can. She allows him to become assimilated—if he will do all the assimilat- ing.

He has not been able to do it. And because he has not, the North American Civic League aims to show those agencies, whether Federal, State, or private, that can help him to adjust himself to American life, the directions in which this help is most needed and the ways in which it may best be supplied.

In studying, with this purpose, the immigrant's route in America, the league found much to deal with at the very landing-place. In the year 1910, investigators for the league discovered that a band of thugs in the form of licensed and unlicensed runners and porters and hackmen (often with a license but without a hack!) had all kinds of ways of getting the immigrant's money away from him before he reached the house of his friends. Under the pretext of "guiding" him to his destination in the city, or of having his foreign money exchanged for him, or of selling him a job, or of fitting him out with American clothes, these rascals reaped a rich daily harvest. One Barney Goldman boasted that he "cleaned up" $1,000 a week. The league, finding the prosecution of individual offenders slow and ineffectual, decided to combat the exploiters by competing with them, and in 1910 organized the Immigrant Guide and Transfer, which for sums ranging from twenty-five cents to one dollar delivers immigrants to any place in Greater New York, protects them on the way, and leaves them only after they have been receipted for by their friends. During the past year the "I. G. and T." safely delivered 51,730 immigrants.

When the immigrant has safely arrived, he wants a job, and a place in which to live. He needs help in getting both. At present he takes the first job he hears about—most often in the sweat-shops of the port of entry, or in nearby construction camps. He knows of no other chance, and he fears to go exploring. The league is interested in making it possible and easy for farmer immigrants to find work out on the land, where they are needed and where they can make a living—and a home.

An important part of the work of the league has been its experiments in education of various sorts. It has co-operated with the regular public school systems in certain cities and towns in regard to the education of the children and to the education of immigrant adults, especially in English and civics. It has established camp schools in isolated communities; and it has carried on social welfare work in providing opportunities for recreation in camps, in establishing milk stations and in providing, by means of friendly visiting, some form of "domestic education" for immigrant women. Experiments in domestic education were carefully organized in Rochester, Buffalo, Mineville and Barren Island, a dreary island which forms the dumping-place for New York's refuse. The immigrant woman from Southern Europe with her ignorance of American food, stoves, weather and what not, cannot, except by a miracle, "Americanize" herself without the help of her neighbors.

Before American law, the immigrant is helpless; he does not know how to avail himself even of the rights that he has. His particular ignorance and disability require particular legal aid. The league has been of service in procuring him their protection against the unchartered immigrant banks, against unregulated employment agencies, and against the ubiquitous notary public who accepts his deposits, sells his home in the old country for him, and rarely remits the proceeds. The league also helps the immigrant to obtain his naturalization papers. The aim is to show American communities to which the immigrant goes that if we let him come in, we need to have a policy toward him when he gets here.

manner in which the automobile has been made ehicle of warfare. One of the most picturesque hts was that of a leading general of the Con- utionalists—General Panfilo Natera—starting in an automobile to take command of the troops t soon were to be engaged in battle. He was ompanied by his armed escort, all mounted.

After the Constitutionalists got control of the tes of northern Mexico they made earnest ef- ts to secure the reopening of the mines and elters which were owned by foreigners. The eign owners, however, had suffered such heavy es, and were so uncertain of the future, that y were slow in responding to the invitation to their plants at work again. They may have no fear of the Federals regaining possession the territory and of further destruction of prop- y, which was bound to result if the war was re- ved, yet they had not enough confidence in the ure to start in again. War taxes are still very vy, and few owners could operate profitably l pay these taxes. In consequence of these con- ions, the industrial revival in Mexico is going e slow.

The land question, as everybody knows, had much to do with the last revolution. It was not the sole cause, and all the revolutionists were not patriots going to war in order to break up an oppressive land monopoly. Many of them were simply bandits and robbers, who went into the revolution because of the chance it gave them to plunder and despoil. Nevertheless, I think it may be said that fully one-half the revolutionists were sincere in their purpose of securing land for the people. The people in this instance are the peons, and the peons are, for the most part, Indians.

It is to the credit of the Constitutionalists that wherever they obtained control of a state, they started in at once to make good their promises of land reform. In some states, as with Villa at Chihuahua, the lands of the great owners were confiscated outright, but in other states, while possession was taken, and in some instances partition of the land actually made, the hope of compensation was not denied the landlords. In some states, too, the big landowners came forward voluntarily and suggested plans for subdividing and partitioning their lands.

The Mexican peon never has had a chance to become a landowner, so no one can say whether or not he will become a successful small farmer. But the experiment has got to be tried. The wants of the peon are so simple that some persons believe that, when he once gets his land, he will not cultivate it to the extent to which it should be cultivated. Corn and beans are the chief crops. Ninety-five per cent. of the total of the whole Mexican population may be said to rely on corn as the staff of life. Cultivating corn in the primitive way is a very simple matter, but it does not secure anything like the full productiveness of the land. The Mexican peon still clings to the old-fashioned wooden-pronged plow, which merely scratches the surface of the soil. It requires the use of only one hand. Progressive landowners have found it extremely difficult to get the peons to use a two-handled modern plow of the simplest pattern. Perhaps, when he has land for himself, the peon will become more progressive. Anyhow, he must be given the chance to try what he can do with the land.

TRYING THE SPIRITS

*A SERMON BY BISHOP W. A. QUAYLE

TEXT: "Try the spirits whether they are of God." I John 4: 1

THIS advice has all the appearance of coming from the lips of a man of age and experience. It has the tang of age upon it, even as the tips of the cedar branches have the tang of many storms and many winters in the taste. Some things age gets and some things youth lacks. Age loses a great deal and age gains a great deal. God has put a goodly proportionateness between the two extremes of life. Some things are to be said for youth, some things are to be said for maturity, and some for extreme age. God won't allow any hour of life to monopolize all its sunshine and all its laughter.

Now, John was so old a man that when he looked at youth he could not see it at all. It was like the sail that had disappeared below the blue horizon. Sixty years was so far past him that he could not see even the white spires of the village church of it. Threescore years and ten were gone so far past him he could not even see the cloud of smoke that gathered over the roofs of the houses at eventide when supper was getting ready. Fourscore years were so far past him that he had forgotten when his birthday was at eighty. Fourscore and ten years, and he looks back at it and he says, "When was I ninety?" Ninety-five years go past, and underneath the snows ninety-five winters lie quiescent. He is verging on the end, but he is not querulous nor puerile, not peevish nor angry, not narrow nor biased; his brain is strong, his thought is keen, his life is fervent as the noon under the tropic skies. He views the past. He has rid himself of every bias, he has flung his life and everything at the foot of the Cross of the Son of God; and here he is, white but not wintry, aged but not old, decrepit yet youthful.

The Standard of Testing

I do not detect in John over-conservatism; I don't find him with his back to our faces; I don't find that he is against things that are renovative and regenerative. I don't detect that in him. I don't discover it in his Gospel, or in his Book of Revelation, or in his letters of tenderest friendship. I don't discover it in all of these, only he is saying, "Brothers, sisters, my little children, will you listen to me? I have come a long way, and I have studied the way I have come, and out of my journey some things I have brought, and this is what I will give you as a word of advice: have a little care. Don't be too voracious. Don't receive everything because it is new. Don't run after every shadow. Don't take every hand. Don't listen to every voice that comes. Don't think everything that professes inspiration is inspired. Don't think every leader that professes leadership is an evangelist with a new mercy and a new gospel." He said, "I have lived long enough to have found out that many a man comes proclaiming himself to be Christ, and lo, he leads his followers into delusion and death. I have seen men come together in armies, fight a futile battle, and fall in futile fashion. Have a care," he says; "try these spirits. There is an alembic into which accusations and professions are to be put. Don't be too eager, don't be over-conservative. Be duly eager; be duly conservative."

If you have studied his life, you must have found this out, that he was not hostile to new things because they were new. He was an apostle of the Cross, and the Cross was new. He was a believer in Christ, and Christ was an innovation. He was a believer in Redemption, and Redemption's story had only recently been told, with graphic touches and bleeding heart and breaking spirits. He was a proclaimer of the cross of Christ, and that was a mine that had only recently been found. He believed in the new, he received it; only he said, "Don't let all new things bewilder you, don't let all glitter confound you, don't think every light is a star, don't think everything that glitters is gold, don't think every bauble offered you is a gem."

Wisdom is not of the moderns or ancients, but belongs to people who have penetrative vision. And John says: "Try these spirits whether they be of God." This word "spirits" has a curious history. It meant in the original, the wind, because the wind was an invisible thing that was discoverable and feelable. Then it came to pass by that transference so common in language, that the word "spirit" came to be applied to the spirit of the soul, because the soul of man was invisible. Then, by transference of ideas, it came to pass that this word "spirit" meant whatever lay at the heart of a thing. So in our time we talk about the "spirit of the century"; the "spirit of invention," the "spirit of discovery," "the spirit of literature," the "spirit of the age." What I understand John to mean by his advice is this: "Try these spirits, try them." Put them into your alembic. Get your acid tests ready. Try to discover what sort of an alliance you are about to make. Have a care about that. When we are young, we are very apt to enter into mésalliances with a multitude of spirits. I think there isn't a man who cannot remember his college attitude and his college aspect. He was open to influences that came to him and lightly smote him with strong palms like a huge man shaking a little boy's hand. I remember—I hope the memory may never shift from me—I can remember in college how many "isms" I got, and I don't think I got any more than others, but this "ism" and that "ism," and the other "ism," I acquired.

Now, the test John applies to spirits is to determine "whether they be of God." God is the only fact that does not waste. The stars wither up like withering leaves. The worlds grow cold and shake their heat from their sandals with the cooling of the ages. Try the spirits, whether they be of God. And mark this: things that are not of God, they can not tarry. The things of God will be renewed every spring like the foliage, every autumn like the harvest, every summer like the purple grapes, every night like the noble clusters of stars: but things that are not of God, "they have their day and cease to be; they are but broken lights, and thou, O God, art more than they."

Is "Evolution" of God?

Try the spirit, whether it be of God, of what I will call "the spirit of the age in religious matters." The spirit of the eighteenth century was the spirit of deism, which meant this: that there might be a God, and probably there was a God, but you could not know it, for he could not reveal himself to man; therefore, there was no theology but natural theology, and no revelation save revelation in nature. That was deism. That spirit has been tried, and it has been declared not to be of God, and can not stand.

When my young manhood began, we were in the era of the Darwinian rule. We were in the era which James Lane Allen has characterized in The Reign of Law, and the best chapter in the book is where he tells about hemp fields. We had been taught that nature was under absolute rule; that there were screws and ratchets and wheels within wheels, and wheels without, and these things answered for everything, and there was no provocation for a God, and there was no justification of a God.

It is stated that the Darwinian movement, or the evolutionary movement (because they mean about the same thing), stood for Theism. I deny it, root and branch. I don't say that Theism has not assumed regnancy in the Darwinian movement, and I don't deny that it has; but I do deny that Darwin meant by his evolutionary theory to enhance the notion of God, and to enthrone him. He did not mean to enthrone him or to dethrone him, and it is folly for anybody acquainted with science to affirm so foolish a story. The truth is, Charles Darwin began his life as a believer in God, and ended his life as an agnostic, practically. Anybody can read it. It is apparent to us all. I saw that Charles Darwin no more meant to enhance the notion of God, or to enthrone God, than he meant to abolish him; only this theory came to the point of the abolition of God, just as the theories of natural science came to the elimination of esthetic things under absolute rule, so that he cared neither for t glories of the morning, nor the gracious, unspea able beauties of nature. I don't say evolution h dethroned God, but I do say that evolution has n abandoned God, because God would not be aba doned. Evolution has not dethroned God, becau God was seated too firmly on his throne to be d throned. And he sits on the circles of the earth, he hath done since the morning stars swept th music along the skies; he sits on the circles of t earth now, as he will after the deluge of the yea shall sweep out all the stars, and as he shall forever.

But, mark you, this word says, try the spirit science whether it be of God. Don't go around f lowing every voice that says it is scientific. Try If a thing is not of God, be sure it won't stan Anything that tries to abolish God from life wo stand. Remember that the test, supreme and i fallible, is, if the thing can adjust itself to t thought of God, it may get on well. The pla truth is that evolution is in no sense hostile to t thought of God. It may be God's method of "crea ing the world and the worlds." That is probab true. Haeckel knew what he meant when he tri to abolish God from the world. He knew that h meant to sweep out the last vestige of the poss bility of the need of God from the earth, an "spontaneous generation" was propounded. An now we know that out of no life, no life spring but out of life, life springs. "Spontaneous ge eration" has gone, and the sound of it has died o on the air.

Is Your Religion of God?

Try the spirit of the age in religion, in the matt of agnosticism. Herbert Spencer was the repr sentative of agnosticism. He tells us that on scientific facts are provable. He affirms that spiri ual phenomena are not provable. Anything tha can not be proved is not to be retained. The on thing to be retained is science. Religion is n science; therefore he relegated it to obscurity, an "God," he says, "is unknowable." I hope all I nee say concerning Herbert Spencer's theory is, that h lived long enough to outlive his own theory, and is a significant thing that, tried by John's test, won't stand.

Try this spirit whether it be of God. Have yo hungry hearts, do you want rest, have you an burdens you don't know how to bear, have you an heartaches you can not well take care of; do yo drink gall even when the cup of water is presente to your lips, and it is only water that can cool thos parched lips? God knows I am of that sort. An what I say is that any theory that relegates Go to the "unknowable," and puts him out of m reach, and places my prayer so that it smoke against the sky like a puff of my breath on th frozen air and then dissolves; any theory that put me in my dusty way of earth where I can get n water; any theory of philosophy, science or rel gion which relegates God to remote distances, I te you, it is not of God! I need him here and now I cannot get through this day without him, and please God, I won't try. I need him on my left han where I may lean on him when sudden weaknes comes across me. I need him on my right hand, s I can clutch him like a column when sudden new of disaster comes to me. I need him when sin walk through the open chambers of my heart, an clang through my rooms like troops with nake swords that crash against the walls the time the pass, and, please God, I will hold to him. I wil make my prayer to him, and in him will I put m trust, and by his grace I shall endure. Don't yo think I am telling you God's truth when I say tha any theory that relegates God to obscurity is no of God? We have all got to live (I do not say w have all got to die, we know that), but, men an women, we have all got to live! How are you goin to do it? We can not, decently, purely, sweetly make life's touches for God thrill the world as a musician thrills his silent instrument, unless w have got the great God for a strong tower.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, July 5. Matthew 7: 15. "Beware of false prophets, which come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves." Even when lies and deceptions come as the barefaced contradiction of facts and reality, which they are, we have a hard task in running them down and nailing them. But when they come surrounded by the glamour of sanctity; when they are holy lies and pious frauds, the best-intentioned people may be deceived by them. A false prophet may borrow the language of angels and archangels, and wear the badge of discipleship. His talk and manners may be as soft as lamb's wool, but he hides a pernicious intent beneath it. He comes to destroy. He declares, God has said thus and so, but God has not said so at all. He twists the Word of God to suit his purpose as the devil did in paradise. God has not sent him. He simply comes—comes by his own initiative. His commission is not issued by Him who is the way and the truth and the life, but by the father of lies. Beware of such! Prove the spirits whether they are of God; for many false prophets are gone out into the world. Some contradict the Scriptures outright, some add to them, some detract from them. Their teaching aims at the destruction of souls.

MONDAY, July 6. Matthew 7: 16-20. "Ye shall know them by their fruits. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles? Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit. Every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire. Wherefore by their fruits ye shall know them." The quality of some things is known by us a priori, that is, by direct perception or intuitive knowledge, as the light of the sun; that of others, a posteriori, that is, by test and experience and patient research. An iron bar charged with electricity is a harmless-looking object; but touch it and find out what it does. So are false prophets known by the effects their prophesying or preaching produces. When we observe how their teaching destroys the authority of the Holy Scriptures, the divine nature of the Redeemer, the saving power of the Word and the sacraments; when it takes away either the binding force of the law or the liberty of the Gospel; when it loads the conscience with burdens that God wants no man to bear and robs the soul of that comfort and peace with which Christ wants to fill it; when it hushes the accusing voice in us by denying sin and guilt and punishment, or disturbs the rest of the justified in Jesus by denying that we are saved by grace alone—we have in all these things indubitable evidences of an evil cause which cannot but produce just such disastrous effects. The blooming thornbush may be a beautiful sight, and the thistle at flowering time a gaudy spectacle. But wait till the prickly and stinging fruit appears, and you will change your opinion about their usefulness. Carry false teachings to their logical conclusions, and you will know their terrible inwardness. The Lord has already passed judgment on them.

TUESDAY, July 7. Luke 6: 45. "A good man out of the good treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is good; and an evil man out of the evil treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is evil: for of the abundance of the heart his mouth speaketh." As elsewhere, our Lord here traces things to their origin. Every form of religious deception indicates an evil heart. It is the evil growth from an evil root. In a true Christian, reverence for the Bible, love of the Redeemer, joy and peace in the Holy Ghost, eagerness in the pursuit of holiness, calmness and patience in affliction, resignation in the hour of death, are not external forms put on as a person would put on an ornament; but they are the genuine manifestations of a life that is throbbing in the whole person. When a Christian speaks of these things he speaks the profoundest convictions of his innermost soul. He could not do otherwise. In like manner, the insincere man, the hypocrite, the false prophet, the deceiver, reveals in his despicable practices what is in his heart. He may disguise his malice ever so much, but in the end he is discovered. And he cannot but think, speak, and act as he does, while the evil heart in him remains unchanged. The turn for the better is not come until he has learned to pray: "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me."

WEDNESDAY, July 8. Matthew 7: 21 and Luke 6: 46. "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." "And why call ye me, Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" "Words, words, words!" cries Hamlet wearied and disgusted. Lip-professions, often very fervid and eloquent, are heard also in the church. But the professions lack the backing of appropriate actions. Watch men, as our Lord observed the Pharisees, and you will find occasion to say of some as he did: "They say, but they do not." And yet these people are satisfied with their verbose Christianity. They imagine themselves already in the kingdom, because they have learned to repeat the formula of admission. Here is the Lord's opinion of them. He declares them outside of the kingdom of heaven. The true members of the kingdom also say "Lord" to Jesus. They profess their faith in his divine Sonship, and declare themselves his purchased possession, his servants. This faith they show by their works. They do not earn their membership in the kingdom by tneir works, but they manifest their membership by their works.

THURSDAY, July 9. Matthew 7: 22, 23. "Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity." Jesus had just spoken of himself as the Son of the Father and the Lord of men; now he refers to himself as their future Judge. These lip-worshipers will carry to the last tribunal their claim that they are his people. They will come asking a reward for their wordy faith. But do they not point to works? Prophesying, casting out devils, performing miracles? Yes, and Christ does not deny the fact. But he, who by his omniscience knows all men, denies that he knows these people as he knows them that are his, them that he has from eternity embraced with his affectionate knowledge, making them heirs of salvation. It is possible that wholly unspiritual men may perform truly spiritual acts and thereby deceive men; but they cannot deceive the Searcher of hearts, who has read every vain motive that incited them to their acts.

FRIDAY, July 10. Matthew 7: 24, 25. "Therefore whosoever heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them, I will liken him unto a wise man, which built his house upon a rock. And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell not: for it was founded upon a rock." The parable of the builders concludes the Sermon on the Mount. Many words, each one of them charged with sublime meaning, had been spoken by the Lord; a rich compendium of heavenly truths had been handed to his hearers. Those who have heard with a determination to faithfully enact the import of those words the Lord now compares to experienced master-builders. They look first to the foundation before they begin to set up their structure. It was teaching of the highest authority that they had received from Jesus. Here was rock bottom for men's faith to rest on. Jesus praises them and assures them that their house of faith will stand the test of terrible tempests of affliction. Fierce blasts of contradiction will hurl themselves against them, torrents of abuse will rush upon them and try to drown and sweep out of existence their profession of Jesus their Lord. It shall all be of no avail. The storms will blow over, the freshets will subside and ebb away, and in the end the faith of the disciples will stand unshaken. Luther sang, in the midst of his conflicts with Rome: "When their worst is done, yet have they nothing won. The kingdom ours remaineth."

SATURDAY, July 11. Matthew 7: 26, 27. "And every one that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man, which built his house upon the sand. And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell: and great was the fall of it." There are foolish builders of spiritual houses for their soul. The wise Greeks, to whom Christ crucified was foolishness; the haughty Jews, to whom the thorn-crowned and bleeding Man of sorrows was an offense; all the men of all ages who seek for spiritual truth higher than, and outside of, that which Jesus proclaimed; those who seek for better righteousness than that which Jesus wrought by his obedience and sacrifice, and those who choose other patterns of holiness than that which the living and dying of Jesus presents, select for their faith a foundation that will prove an awful cheat at the first accusation which the law of God raises against them. They will find that their hopes are castles in Spain and their assurances ropes of sand. Oh, what a collapse of cunningly thought-out systems of wisdom and of famous codes of ethics have we witnessed in our own lifetime! Why, all around us structures of these foolish builders are everywhere collapsing and toppling about their heads. One little word of God overthrows them. Let us take a warning. "On Christ, the solid rock, I stand; all other ground is sinking sand."

GOSPEL BREVITIES FROM VARIOUS POINTS

—THE SUMMER BIBLE SCHOOL in connection with the Chautauqua program at Winona Lake, Ind., July 6 to August 20, 1914, will be in charge of the Extension Department of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago. The work in the Bible school is instructive, inspiring, constructive and conservative, and sane and scholarly. Three sessions are held daily, and the program will be comprehensive and varied. A leaflet of information can be obtained from the secretary of the Extension Department, 153-163 Institute Place, Chicago; and a booklet about Winona Lake and its attractions for the season of 1914 can be obtained by writing to Rev. Solomon C. Dickey, Winona Lake, Ind.

—EVANGELIST WILLIAM H. FRIDAY, JR., song writer, has recently spoken at the First Baptist Church, Long Island City, First Presbyterian Church, Ridgefield Park, N. J., the Methodist Church, Suffern, N. J.; Bushwick Avenue Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn; the Jerry McAuley Cremorne Mission, New York City, and elsewhere. He is arranging his itinerary for the fall and winter. Pastors can address him at 456 McDonough Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

—THERE HAS RECENTLY been held in Atlanta, Ga., a Negro Christian Student Convention, composed of representative negro students from all parts of the United States, especially the South, in conference with leaders of the white and black races, presided over by John R. Mott. Mr. Mott correctly characterized it as "one of the most important conferences in the history of our religion." The rising generation of negroes cannot be approached in the old way; that the young people from the negro schools will be satisfied, as one of the Southern white speakers expressed it, "by nothing short of the best for the negro." Many young people pledged themselves publicly, and doubtless many others privately, to some useful work for mankind, as missionaries at home or abroad. There were no "Jim Crow" or segregation regulations in the conduct of the whole convention.

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

PRESIDENT OTTO KOENIG | MANAGING EDITOR GEO. H. SANDISON | SECRETARY THEODORE WATERS

A Broader Patriotism

ONE hundred and thirty-eight years of Independence! What has been our greatest gain in these almost sevenscore years? There have been gains of wealth and power, of learning and of art, of territory and honor, but what gain is the greatest of all?

We offer this in answer—a gain that stands out as the distinctive possession of the United States among the nations of the world—the gain of having come to understand that a nation's place in the world is the place of service to all other nations.

It appears difficult for the nations of Europe to grasp this conception of a nation's duty. They understand the Christian teaching that one citizen must serve another and that all citizens must serve the state. But that one nation should serve another is apparently inconceivable. International law has so far been chiefly detail rules for the game of war. And war, to other nations, means a struggle for more land. They cannot understand that a war should end without new territory coming to the victor. We are stating and insisting and meaning that in the present argument with Mexico we do not want land. We want liberty—liberty for the Mexicans, as we wanted it for the Cubans. We could have kept Cuba, but we did not. We took the Philippines to train their people for liberty, and our statesmen are now scheduling plans for their independence. There have been blots on our shield, such as the first Mexican War and many of the details of our treatment of the Indians. But how far we have grown toward the ideal of international altruism may be seen from these words of President Wilson, spoken at the recent Flag Day exercises in Washington:

This flag, he said, "is henceforth to stand for self-possession, for dignity, for the assertion of the right of one nation to serve the other nations of the world—an emblem that will not condescend to be used for purposes of aggression and self-aggrandizement—that is too great to be debased by selfishness; that has vindicated its right to be honored by all the nations of the world and feared by none who do righteousness."

"Too great to be debased by selfishness!" Here is a new ideal for the nations. We do not love our own land less but more, when we join our voices to those who are urging her to tasks of unselfish service, for there the truest honor lies. Nor are we building upon the clouds in seeking these high ideals. We are building upon the rock, the rock of His words who said: "Whosoever will be great among you shall be your minister, and whosoever of you will be the chiefest shall be servant of all."

The Carnegie Foundation Attacked

WHEN a college unites with the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, does it surrender its independence and barter its birthright of religious education for a foundation pension? This is the question that is now being hotly discussed by educators in many States as it has been brought sharply to the front by President Thomas W. Churchill of the New York Board of Education. Specifically, Mr. Churchill thus charges:

> I deem it my duty to enter a protest against the standardization which the foundation attempts to obtain and against its interference with religious education. It soon became apparent that the foundation was in reality a corporation to buy the control of such colleges as were willing to sell their birthright and carry on college teaching and management according to the patterns prescribed by it. The foundation has deliberately and conspicuously made a mark of the religious colleges, particularly of the small institutions which in their own field carried on a splendid work with limited equipment but a splendid spirit. One after another many religious colleges have been reduced by great wealth to give up the independence that should be found in a college if nowhere else, and to forsake the faith of their founders.

If President Churchill stood alone in his criticism of the foundation, his protest might be passed over on the ground of prejudice. But he does not stand alone. Professor Maynard L. Daggy of Seattle, speaking before a chautauqua at Reno, Nev., openly charged that the foundation is trying to control higher education throughout the country by dictating the appointment of college presidents. Its ideals of education, he declared, are for the few rather than for the masses—"an education of the aristocracy." The presidents chosen by the foundation would have the power, if so disposed, "to throttle the utterances of faculties, unless they were along certain approved lines not particularly connected with the public welfare." President Welsh, of Ohio Wesleyan University, says: "I do not like anything that tends to interfere with independence. I don't like such pension funds that might weaken the church."

It is only just to Mr. Carnegie, who is abroad at present, to give the other side. His foundation does not lack for defenders. President Hibben of Princeton, Dean Williams of Johns Hopkins, President Miller of Heidelberg University, Ohio, and President Thwing of Western Reserve University, are among those who believe that the foundation is exercising a beneficial and elevating influence on American education. Dr. Clyde Furst, secretary of the foundation, points out that its charter does not permit it to take the denominational colleges into its pension scheme, not because of any question of religion, but as a matter of administrative expediency. He denies that the foundation is at variance with any of the churches, or that the trustees object to putting religious colleges on the pension list, although denominational colleges, as such, are excluded by the charter.

It should be possible to get at the facts. If the Carnegie Foundation is really a menace to the colleges, the whole country should know it. If there is some subtle scheme afoot to destroy the freedom of our colleges in the choice of their religious training, that, too, ought to be known. We cannot believe all that is charged; but even if a part of the accusations be authenticated, it would give the American public a new angle on the principles of the organization founded by the old ironmaster. We want no exclusive system of "aristocratic education," nor do we want any interference with the complete liberty of our colleges, denominational or undenominational, to follow the best methods available in the training of cur youth.

RECENT ocean tragedies have drawn public attention anew to the urgent need of ampler provision for the preservation of life at sea. It was expected that the treaty projected as the outcome of the International Convention for the Safety of Life at Sea would have been negotiated without delay, and that travelers would have had the benefit of the increased safeguards proposed to be established. But even the most desirable reforms are tardy in the realization. At the present moment, a lively discussion is going on in England regarding the Empress of Ireland disaster and a variety of ingenious contrivances are suggested for use sea-going passenger steamers. One of these is life-raft composed practically of the entire upp part of the quarter-deck, which can be quick detached from its mountings, and which wou easily accommodate both passengers and cre Another is a series of rafts, smaller and mo mobile, formed of the deck superstructures of t cabins and so arranged that they can be quick released and launched on two sides of the vess simultaneously. Joseph Conrad, the well-know author, who has made a life study of the sea, mak a strong plea for an equipment of cork fenders all passenger lines. He believes that their prom use would have averted the disastrous collisic between the Empress and the Storstad, and a tho sand lives might have been saved. It is true th the transportation lines do not sell safety, but comfortable passage, with good accommodation If Mr. Conrad's plan is a practical one—and h twenty years' sea-going experience should help make it so—cork bolsters or their equivalent ma yet become a part of every steamship's equipmen to be kept in position for instant use.

The Soul in the Work

"BLESSED is he who has found his work," wrot Carlyle. "Two men I honor: the toilwor craftsman who conquers the earth and makes he man's, and him who is seen toiling for the spiritu ally indispensable; not daily bread, but the brea of Life. Unspeakably touching is it when I fin both dignities united. All true work is religion. The old philosopher held that the world is a work shop and that, dependent on our hearts being in ou task and on our desire to rise to the dignity of i and fulfil it in the highest sense, would be our valu to our fellow men and the appreciation of posterity But one may be a good worker, rendering the whol race service, and yet cherish no dream of presen reward or post-obit appreciation. Like John La Farge, the great mural painter who died a few days ago, one may put his soul in his work and labo for the pure love of art for art's sake. La Farge like all true artists, was an idealist. To him n work which was not creative, harmonious, beautiful had a value. His versatile genius wrought with equal facility on canvas, on glass or in bronze. Had he desired wealth, he could easily have amassed a fortune; but his art was enough. The creative spirit could not be harnessed with the love of mere gain, and he died a poor man, yet rich in the appreciation of all who love the truly beautiful in art.

Back to Duty

BACK from the great Chicago convention the four thousand delegates are on their way to take up again the routine work of Sunday school life in the cities and villages of the United States and Canada. Think of seventeen million people, little and big, enrolled in the Sunday schools of North America! We cannot care too deeply nor plan too skilfully for their training.

These millions of Sunday school pupils will, before we realize it, be doing the work and speaking the words and thinking the thoughts that will make American and Canadian life. Their teachers may well resolve to master the highest principles for their instruction and labor with the utmost effort and enthusiasm for their welfare.

The convention just closed was noble and inspiring. The pageants, the exhibits, the reports, the addresses, the plans for the future—all are a challenge to do finer and more fruitful work during the years ahead. But grander than anything else about it could possibly be was the convention's motto: "Jesus Shall Reign." Methods and energy and enthusiasm will count for little unless during the work that follows this keynote shall be remembered and retained. Jesus shall reign. In hearts, young and old, in our own lives and in all the lives we touch, in communities, in nations—let us make it true: "Jesus shall reign."

"THE FANGS OF THE LION"

From the Washington, D. C., Herald, June 16

A HINT from Governor Glynn, of New York, that the Catholic Church will be subjected to persecution until its adherents "band together and show, instead of the teeth of the lamb, the fangs of the lion," was the only serious expression last night, at the smoker of alumni of Georgetown University, who are celebrating the 125th anniversary of the founding of the institution. Governor Glynn delivered the principal address.

THE BIBLE AND NEWSPAPER

CONDUCTED BY FERDINAND C. IGLEHART D. D.

Fairbanks on Lincoln's Childhood

THE Republican editors of Indiana in their summer convention took a train at Evansville and went to the site of the farm where Lincoln lived from the time he was nine rs old till he was twenty-one, and the grave of ncy Hanks Lincoln. Among the addresses that e made was one by ex-Vice-President Fairks, in which he said: "Here lived in days of his youth one who was provitially called to preserve a nation and ease from bondage the souls and bodies of ace. Near by on yonder knoll rest the es of Nancy Hanks Lincoln, who gave th to a son who was destined to stand ong the world's greatest statesmen and efactors. Here, among the primeval ests, far removed from the centers of poical and commercial power, her son, with richer dowry than a mother's love, grew manhood; here he lived amid a modest l kindly folk, surrounded by homely and ere conditions, which after all are the best rsery of the finest fiber of the republic. I ve always felt that the apparently unfendly environment was indeed the best, l that an all-wise Creator designed it so to fashion the character of the youth in plastic days, in order that he could the ter interpret the needs and aspirations of humanity." This tribute to the influence this humble home, and especially that of Christian mother, on Lincoln's life and stiny is beautiful and healthful. The last ng that Lincoln did before the oxen pulled ay the wagon containing all the family's ongings for the new home in Illinois was go to the grave of his mother to think and and say good-by. In after life he said: ll I am I owe to my sainted mother." Paul phasizes the value of home and mother luence on character in his reference to the ining of Timothy.

When I call to remembrance the unfeigned faith that in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice; and I am persuaded that in thee also. (II Tim. 1: 5.)

Electricity Direct from Coal

IT IS universally admitted that when electricity can be produced cheaply enough it ll supplant all other forms of motor power. looks now as though the process of making cheaply were in sight, and though some ars may be required to adjust the mechann to the newly discovered thought, many od judges, including such an authority as homas Edison, are reported to have exessed their faith in the plan to derive elecicity from ordinary coal so cheaply as to ake its well-nigh universal use possible. he new method would eliminate boiler, ene and dynamo in the transformation of the at produced by burning coal into elecical power. By the present method of manfacturing electricity, in which three middle ocesses must be used, a large percentage the original power is lost, which in the w method proposed will be preserved. Over hundred expert electricians have been workg in their laboratories to find a cheap way making the subtle current, and they genally admit that the heat generated by the rning of coal will produce the current for onomical commercial purposes. Water, ght, heat, electricity are some of the inrumentalities through which the Almighty presses his power. Christ is divine, with minion over the forces of body and mind.

And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power given unto me in heaven and in earth. (Matt. 28: 18.)

Three Baseball Fatalities

THREE baseball players were killed in games on one day recently. All were killed by balls rown by the pitcher and striking the man at the t. Everything was in fun and no injury was inded, and there was deepest sorrow at the accints. These tragedies and similar ones call for eater caution. There cannot be fun enough gotten to a year to atone for the loss of one precious fe. By Jewish law cities of refuge were furnished for the protection of those taking life by accident,

That the slayer might flee thither, which should kill his neighbor unawares, and hated him not in times past. (Deut. 4: 42.)

Interesting Story About Insects

MR. DAVID FAIRCHILD, who has hunted the world over for plants of economic value, and introduced them into this country, has communicated some interesting facts about insects to our National Geographical Society, which has in turn given them to the public. He says the champion aeronaut is the king grasshopper, which has the ability to jump one hundred times its length, and can sail for a thousand miles before the wind. The cricket is described as a powerful singer, its shrill note sometimes being heard a mile away. The males alone are musical, and the females listen to their melodious wooings with ears which are on their fore-legs. Being so musical it would hardly be expected that they would be such fighters among themselves as they are, or cannibals, eating each other when there is not enough other food at hand. The ants are described as communists, because the individual interest is merged in the community. Theirs is a female rights colony. The workers are females, the soldiers are females, the nurses are females, and there is one queen mother for them all, who lays all the eggs for the colony. The males are but mates for the young queens.

Go to the ant, thou sluggard, consider her ways, and be wise: which having no guide, overseer, or ruler, provideth her meat in the summer, and gathereth her food in the harvest. (Prov. 6: 6-8.)

MILITANTS ATTACK CORONATION CHAIR

"WILD women," British suffragettes, entered Westminster Abbey on June 11, while the House of Commons was discussing ways and means for their subjection to law, and attempted to destroy the historic coronation chair, which contains the still more ancient Stone of Scone. Fortunately their bomb, filled with iron nuts, though it exploded under the chair, failed to more than slightly damage these famous objects. The explosion, however, set off another, for the people appear to look upon this greatest of all the militant outrages as passing popular endurance, and a veritable explosion of public denunciation occurred. The coronation chair is perhaps the most remarkable relic in the world. It was made in the year 1300 for Edward I. The seat is the famous Lia Fail, the Stone of Destiny, the same stone, the legend avers, upon which Jacob rested his head at Bethel, and which was carried by Pharaoh's daughter to Spain, whence it was borne to Ireland, and then to Iona. On this stone for four centuries Scotland's kings were crowned, till Edward I carried it off to Westminster. There is nothing legendary or destructible about the stone spoken of in the Scriptures, where Christ is thus referred to by the prophet: "Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious cornerstone, a sure foundation." (Isa. 28: 16.)

Bird Killed at Crossing

BIRDS often die by violence. The fox and the cat creep up on them from below, the hawk sweeps down upon them from above, the hunter fells them with his shot, the wires on which they try to rest electrocute them. A bird in Indianapolis, Ind., met its death the other day in a peculiar manner. It was of the woodpecker family. It had been feeding on the north side of Washington Street, and seeing the cherries and mulberries on the trees of an artist a little distance away, it concluded to fly over and get its fill. A west-bound car was passing, and the bird planned to fly a few feet above the ground just in front of the car, and did. But it did not see a swiftly moving east-bound car, which struck it and threw it dead by the roadside. How many precious human lives have been sacrificed in the same manner! How many moral and spiritual dangers there are about us also! What especial caution is required to escape all these! In a material as well as spiritual sense the caution with reference to the coming of the Son of man is appropriate:

Take ye heed, watch and pray. (Mark 13: 33.)

Her Ashes by Stevenson

IN FULFILMENT of her last wish, the ashes of Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson will be placed beside the body of her husband on the summit of Mount Vaca, Samoa. Before the door of the tomb will be inscribed the last stanza of Stevenson's verse to his wife:

Teacher, leader, comrade, wife,
Fellow-farer, true through life;
Heart whole, and soul free,
The august Father gave to me.

To this tomb there will be no means of access except a rough mountain path. How befitting was Stevenson's burial-place among the scenes of the far-off isles he loved so much, knew so well, and described so perfectly! How beautiful it was that his wife should wish her ashes to rest beside his dust! Grant would not consent to be buried at Riverside, New York City, until there was a solemn promise made that a vacant place for the body of his wife by his side should be left. Amid all the pomp of royalty, Queen Victoria was laid to rest by the side of Albert. What was said of Saul and Jonathan can be said of Stevenson and his wife:

They were lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in their death they were not divided. (II Sam. 1: 23.)

The Fortune of a Recluse

AN OLD man died in Texas, the other day, who for many years had led the life of a recluse, on a dietary schedule averaging forty-five cents per day. The walls of his room were covered with cheap prints, newspaper clippings and calendars. He was regarded by his neighbors as an eccentric of slender means. After his death, deeds were found to a fortune in real estate. His property was scattered in more than a dozen States. It is estimated that his total wealth, real and personal, will aggregate $12,000,000. Diligent search failed to discover a will of any sort and a number of relatives are flocking to claim the property. What rich opportunities this man missed for doing good in his lifetime with the great wealth at his command! Had he regarded his possessions in the light of a stewardship, he might have become a benefactor to many. Those that trust in material wealth have this warning:

Not to set their hope on the uncertainty of riches, but on God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy. (I Tim. 6: 17, R. V.)

ABOUT this time last year The Christian Herald Family hands and hearts in a concerted effort to bring in members. As a result, nearly 40,000 new, earnest w were enlisted in the cause.

Think of it!—40,000 new homes—probably 200,000 souls, f the weekly influence of the Sermons, the Daily Meditation Prayer League, the Sunday School Lessons, the news of the cor of the world for Christ—40,000 homes where such influence never before have been felt!

That was something to have accomplished. Six months o THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is the most convincing argument you can offer a person, outside of the Bible and the church themselves. Let us do it again! Everybody; even those who were brought in last year. But let us not stop at 40,000. Let us make it a hundred thousand this year!

Let every member of the Family strive to bring in at least one friend. That friend will thank you for it. Let those who can influence more than one resolve to do so. It should be very easy. The special price puts the paper within reach of the poorest if you will bring it to their attention. It enables every one who desires to extend the work of evangelization to make a present of the paper to friends, who will be reminded of this kindness every week for 6 months, and who may themselves become permanent members of the Family.

We rely upon your co-operation. We know you will give it just as you did last year. This is the season when the great, wide, outdoor Gospel Campaign begins—the summer spiritual harvest, in which you should share. You could not be engaged in better work than helping to extend the influence of The Christian Herald Family. Whether you live in Maine or in California, in Florida or in Saskatchewan, mention this wonderful opportunity to your friends and neighbors. Ask them to subscribe, or, failing in that, make them a present of 6 months' membership.

A VISIT TO THE EAST SIDE

BY MARGARET L. SANGSTER, JR.

THE sun beat down fiercely on my head, and the dampness of the streets rose to my nostrils until I involuntarily held my head a bit higher in the hope that some cool breeze might be coming toward me. Dust and tin cans and dirty water lay on the sidewalk, and the roads were filled with refuse and mud. I shuddered at the sight, and wished hard that I could be back again in the trolley car that ran, clanging and bumping, a few blocks away. While in the trolley I had labeled it a decidedly unpleasant place; but now it seemed a haven of refuge.

I crossed a dingy square and entered a dingier side street—a street full of terrible buildings, high and blind-looking with their narrow windows. Blazing summer heat a tattoo on the roadway. Sinister, quick-moving shadows lurked in the doorways. Down the street, a crowd of children, five deep, were drawn up in a circle about some object in the street. In the innocence of my heart I thought that it might be an organ-grinder, or a hokey-pokey wagon, or perhaps a peanut vender. I hurried to the interesting place and saw a group of pale youngsters bending over a dead horse and poking him with thin, inquiring forefingers.

"A p'liceman's gone to get it sent away," a sharp-faced little girl told me. "It ain't healthy that they should leave dead things here."

With a shudder I passed on. But my mind was no longer full of innocent childish pleasures. I was thinking of the tragedy of a childhood in the slums, and wondering what some of the little ones would think if they were suddenly transplanted to the cool, sweet country, with plenty to eat and fresh milk to drink, and clean clothes to wear. At the thought of milk I shuddered again, for I remembered the flies that had been buzzing over the horse and thought of the thin, pale babies, with their mussy milk bottles, that were lying on every step. I had an idea where those flies would go next.

Then I walked down a narrower street, a street with push-carts lined up against the curb, and houses crowding out into the sidewalk. Curious eyes followed me and I heard remarks in a foreign tongue that made me feel self-conscious, although I could not understand them. It was only after I had pushed through the darkness and come out on a less crowded thoroughfare that I saw ahead of me the oasis in that desert of sorrow and squalor—the Church of the Sea and the Land. I opened the door softly and walked into the quaint old place, with its massive pews and its ancient slave gallery over the organ. From the heat and dust of the city street I was crowded back to "befo' de war" times, and as I looked at the narrow paned windows and the old-fashioned pulpit, I found myself glancing apprehensively over my shoulder for the ringleted beauties of the sixties.

There is a courtyard by the church, and there some children were snatching at the birthright that poverty and rigid city laws were keeping away from them—they were playing!

I stood and watched them—running and jumping, one group throwing a ball, and three shy little girls admiring a gaudy paper fan, the brightest bit of color in the dull landscape. As I watched, a little child came and stood in front of me, balancing herself gravely on one torn shoe.

"What y' doin' down here?" she asked shyly, head on one side, eyes downcast.

"Why—" I was rather at a loss for words before such a direct question. "Why, I came down to see you, and the church, and perhaps—" I stopped.

"Oh!" the child regarded me with a shade of disappointment in her big eyes. "I t'ought p'raps you was one of the ladies what takes kids to de country."

I was quiet. I did not want to make her too expectant—because so many plans die in the making; but I hope that she will go to the country, and I am sure that some friend of ours will be the means of sending her.

I heard a sound behind me and, turning, I looked deep into a pair of eyes, so blue that I found myself wondering irreverently whether they reflected color from the sky. A glance toward heaven, however, reassured me, for the city sky that hangs over the tenement houses is at best a dull, heavy-looking surface that looks as if it is made of tears and disappointments. But I came back to earth sharply and looked at the owner of the eyes.

He was a little boy—a tiny little boy. He stood there, dressed in blue overalls and small stubby shoes. In the crook of one bare arm he carried a book, and with solemn glances he studied me.

"Hello!" he said softly. And then, as I asked him his name, he murmured "Davie."

"What is the story, Davie?" I asked next. And he held out the book that he carried.

"Elementary Nature Study," I read to myself. And then suddenly, blindingly, I saw the pathos of the thing; while the courtyard swam hazily through a mist of tears.

Nature study! Out home the birds are singing, and the grass and the flowers are growing. Up at our Children's Home in Nyack the river is rushing by, and the tall field daisies are telling secrets to the bees, and the mountains are showing up deep purple against the setting sun. But Nature Study, the music and happiness of God's out-of-doors world, on the East Side!

High tenements, shutting out God's sunlight, and heat without a breath of coolness to give a bit of life; sick babies sobbing their hearts out, and dead horses!

Oh, friends of mine, I have the picture of it all in my mind today, and in my heart. Shut your eyes and perhaps you will see it—the playing children, the little boy who loved nature, and the little girl who wanted to go to the country. But as you think of it, remember that, through your help, some of the children will wander away from the heat and dirt until they have reached the Paradise on the Hudson—Mont-Lawn.

DAVIE AND HIS BOOK

THE THREE LITTLE GIRLS

A LITTLE ANGEL OF THE MOUNTAINS

BY CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY

CHAPTER XI

AROUND the corner came the citizens of Canon Creek—the most decent ones in the front, the others straggling behind. Those in the front rank showed determined faces such as they might have worn if they were charging a battery (or artillery); those in the rear took the situation more lightly. Parson Bill leaped to his feet, whipped out his gun, and before any one could stop him began:

"If you men have come to bust up this Sunday school, I want you to know that I'm on the Lord's side and the kid's and the lady's, for to-day, anyway, an' if any man opens his head, I'll let daylight through it, so help me."

"I don't think they mean any harm," said Mrs. Morrison hurriedly, interposing to keep the peace. "You can put your weapon back, I am sure."

"You're right, ma'am," said Old Four Eyes deferentially, "although we all honors Parson Bill for having offered to defend you all. We've come here to attend services, provided we're welcome."

"Which you surely are," said Mr. Morrison.

"Sides which, the saloons is shut up an' no liquor can be bought until the service is over, an' we all ain't got no other place to go noways," he added with rather disconcerting honesty.

"We are very glad indeed to have you here, all of you," said Mrs. Morrison, raising her voice and extending her hands in welcome.

"If you will come closer and—" began her husband.

"I suggests," said Old Four Eyes, "that you all lets us do as we pleases. Them as wants to git up front will do it; them as wants to stay back will set down where they are."

"Very good," said Mrs. Morrison, smiling at the rather quaint old man. "Just please yourselves. We had a Sunday school back in western Kansas, where I came from, and we brought along some prayer book leaflets and hymn cards. The bishop visited us once in a while to help us and he supplied them. If you gentlemen don't mind, we will have these things distributed among you and those who wish can join in the singing and responses and help us out. But nobody is obliged to, of course."

"We'd be glad to receive anything you got, ma'am, an' jine in wherever we kin," said Old Four Eyes gallantly.

"You're right there," said the Doc. "As for me, I ain't sung no hymns since I was a child."

"Olaf, will you pass around these leaflets and cards among these gentlemen?" asked Mr. Morrison. "And when you have finished, we will begin."

The boy's task was soon over. Some of the miners declined the proffered leaflets and cards, but most of them took them.

"We will sing the hymn, 'Rock of Ages, Cleft for Me.' It seems appropriate out here in these great mountains," said Mr. Morrison. "Are you ready, Mary?" he added in a rather nervous tone aside to his wife.

"All ready," she said, sitting down to the organ and playing over the hymn.

The melodeon had a squeaky tone, but the woman's touch was sympathetic, and the miners thought they had never heard such music before. They crowded closer to the woman and the two girls and the little boy, and as the grand notes of the great hymn rose under the pines, Mrs. Morrison leading in her clear, sweet soprano voice, first one and then another joined in, and for the first time in its history, Canon Creek burst into songs of praise to its God! Not everybody sang, but everybody listened, and even the snickers and sneers on the outside subsided into silence.

The hymn over, it was necessary to begin the service. Mr. Morrison was accustomed to the set forms of service of the Episcopal Church, and these he could have read easily enough. But several considerations caused him to disregard the ordinary morning prayer. In the first place, probably few, it might even be none, of his congregation knew the service. They would not have been able to respond and participate in it intelligently. Prayers written and read would not have appealed to them. The complexity of the service would have puzzled them. He decided that in extreme simplicity was his only hope to move them.

Mr. Morrison, therefore, laid aside prayer book and leaflet, and for almost the first time in his life he made an extempore prayer. He did not pray very fluently, the audience was not sympathetic, his words came haltingly. Yet good sense governed him. He did not try to do anything but talk to God in a reverent way. He pointed out that they were a lonely band of men far away on the mountain top, removed from the pleasant

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

Three of Our 3,000 Islands Disappearing

THE Federal Geological Survey reports that Chesapeake Bay is swallowing three prosperous little islands, one already being deserted to its fate, one almost so and the third still supporting many farmers and fishermen. The islands are named Tilghman, 329 of whose original 2,015 acres are under water; James, with half of its thousand acres gone; and Sharp, which in 1848 contained 438 acres, but now has only 53. These islands are near the mouth of the Choptank River on the eastern shore of the bay. That is, they are there at present. The 7,997 apparently permanent islands belonging to the United States have a population of about 10,000,000, and their commerce exceeds $300,000,000 annually.

Dissension in Labor Federation

IN REVOLT against strike assessments and the union's card system, some 2,000 miners in the Butte, Mont., copper region engaged in serious rioting on and about June 14, dynamiting the safe of the Western Federation of Miners, and doing other damage. Alarmed by reports of the situation, Governor Stewart took steps to secure Federal aid in suppressing disorder, but later found Butte quiet and the trouble seemingly settled. There was no strike.

Almost Greatest Sea Tragedy

AN OCEAN disaster which might have equaled that of the Titanic or of the Empress of Ireland was barely averted early Saturday morning, June 13, when the Hamburg-American liner Pretoria collided with the American liner New York in a thick fog about two hundred miles east of the Nantucket lightship. The New York was on her eastern trip, and among her passengers were Rev. Francis E. Clark and his wife. Dr. Clark tells his experience elsewhere on this page. He headed a committee of 150 passengers who presented to Captain Roberts a testimonial expressing appreciation of the discipline shown by the officers and men when the issue was doubtful. The fog grew so thick—the bow could scarcely be seen from the bridge—that the New York was brought to a standstill, and within an hour the warning whistles of the Pretoria were heard. The vessels were unable to locate each other until the Pretoria struck the New York a glancing blow above the water-line fifty feet back of the bow, tearing through the side of the vessel for thirty feet. No panic developed. The wireless operators stood ready to call for help if need be. Examination of the ship disclosed no damage below the water-line, and the Pretoria resumed her course, as did also the New York. The latter arrived at her pier in Hoboken Saturday afternoon and landed her passengers as though nothing had happened, although having barely escaped destruction. Wednesday, June 17, the North German Lloyd liner Kaiser Wilhelm II, carrying nearly one thousand passengers, was only a short run out from Southampton, England, when, in a dense fog, the small grain steamer Incemore rammed a large hole below her water-line amidships, the Incemore's bow being completely stove in. The liner had closed all watertight doors when the fog settled, and was able to return safely to port. The smaller vessel also made port, but in almost a sinking condition. There was excitement, but no panic.

With Foreign Governments

THE French cabinet formed by Premier Ribot resigned within two days, owing to defeat of its first measure introduced in the Chamber, and René Viviani, who ten days before had declined the task, accepted the portfolio and formed a new cabinet, the sixtieth of the republic (1870). Viviani is fifty-two years old, an independent Socialist, an old friend of President Poncairé, but of different political views. He is now expected to take pronounced leadership in the complex politics of the day.

For a day and an hour Italy faced a social revolution in the general strike reported last week. Before the government could collect its wits, a number of towns of size had been seized by rioters and turned into miniature republics, homes and business places being sacked and communication with the outside world cut off. Even the cities suffered. A number of fatalities occurred, and property was greatly damaged. Once in motion, however, government troops soon quelled the uprisings, restored normal order, and ended the strike.

Prince William, ruler of Albania, is fighting for the throne that was practically forced upon him. Durazzo, the capital, has been vigorously attacked by Mussulman insurgents, who demand a ruler of their faith. William headed his troops and repulsed the invaders. There was heavy fighting. There are said to be about ten thousand organized troops opposed to three times that number of tribesmen. The great Powers are preparing to take a hand in the solution of the trouble.

In ordering that army men recruited in Alsace-Lorraine shall be assigned to service far removed from that province, Germany is understood to have again signified the intention to discourage all French residence in the conquered district, a purpose which was reported to have grown out of the Zabern incident of last year.

Greece appears to be inviting a new war with Turkey. There has been bad feeling between the two countries since the close of the Balkan War, reprisals for injuries sustained, each at the hands of the other, during that conflict having been going on here and there in both countries, resulting in much recrimination and some armed clashes. Now Greece, defying the displeasure of Europe, has seized the Turkish islands of Chios and Mitylene, which were left to later disposition by the Powers in their settlement of the Balkan peace, claiming that their overwhelmingly Greek population and ancient Greek nationality make them natural Greek possessions. The islands are of first importance to Turkey for defense of the Dardanelles. Actual preparations for war were reported June 14.

Denmark, Holland, Sweden and Switzerland, and possibly Belgium and Norway, are said to be discussing the terms of a defensive union for common action should any one of them be attacked by a great Power. The report does not indicate which of these countries stands in such dire peril.

Matters of State

USING the quill pen with which President Harrison signed the International Copyright Law, and President Taft the Pan-American Copyright Treaty, Lincoln Memorial Bill and the National Institute of Arts and Letters Act, President Wilson on June 15 signed the Panama Tolls Exemption Repeal Bill.

Unable to come to an agreement with the President on the question of government aid for farmers, the rural credit legislation, which has been under long consideration, has been dropped for the present.

The proposed treaties with Colombia and Nicaragua are undergoing almost hostile scrutiny by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, before whom Secretary Bryan appeared June 17 to urge favorable action. The entire correspondence leading up to the Colombia treaty, beginning with Roosevelt's administration, is to be demanded. No action on either is now expected at this session of Congress.

The Senate has before it a bill providing for Home Rule in Porto Rico, with American citizenship to the islanders, and proposing some new experiments in territorial government. In the fifteen years of American rule, Porto Rico public schools have increased from one to 1,200, with 175,000 pupils enrolled; sugar production from 65,000 tons to 365,000 yearly; the island's forty miles of good roads have grown to 1,000, and its foreign commerce from $20,000,000 to $100,000,000 a year.

Paris Partly Caves In

PHENOMENAL rains lasting for hours June 15 flooded Paris sewers and caused the caving in of streets, in several instances pedestrians and at least one taxicab with its occupants being carried down into the deep fissures, the death list being estimated at twenty. The fashionable quarter of the city was seamed with these chasms, hotels and other buildings on the very edges. Several bodies had not been recovered at last reports. There were many thrilling escapes from death. The scene of the principal damage was isolated from the curious public after the storm, by the police. Gas mains, electric wires and other utilities were temporarily out of commission.

Chicago's Bank Failures

SIX Chicago banks have closed their doors as the result of an investigation of the La Salle Street Trust and Savings Bank, of which ex-Senator William Lorimer is president and C. B. Munday vice-president. Three of the banks are affiliated with the La Salle. Preliminary reports of their conditions indicate loss to depositors running into the millions. Distressing scenes have occurred before the doors of these institutions. Criminal prosecution of the two men named is said to have been decided on by the State bank examiner and the attorney-general.

FOR THOSE IN PERIL ON THE SEA

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., Founder Christian Endeavor

I HAVE often wondered how people would act, how I myself would feel, in the event of a disaster at sea. I had the opportunity of finding out, the other night, when, in the darkest hour just before the dawn, in a dense fog, the ship on which I had sailed from Southampton, the New York, was rammed by the Pretoria, four hundred miles from New York.

I was awakened by the stopping of our engines and the violent churning of the screw as the ship backed water. Then, out of the impenetrable darkness was heard the hoarse shriek of another foghorn than our own, which, at intervals of a minute, had been bellowing for hours. I knew that another vessel was approaching, and every minute drawing nearer.

Then came a shock, sharp though not very violent, and I knew we had been struck. Sailors and stewards rushed past to take up their station at the boats, and two or three minutes later the huge bulk of the Pretoria, towering far above our craft, glided by so near that I could touch her with my hand, while she tore away part of our bulwarks in passing.

Then the passengers began to pour up from their cabins in scanty attire, many with life-preservers buckled on. There were no hysterics, and surprisingly little evident excitement, but all quietly awaited the end which we thought so near, until, in a few minutes, the officers reported that the hole in our side was above the water-line. It was big enough, however, to admit two or three trolley cars abreast, and a huge anchor of the Pretoria, weighing five tons, was found imbedded in our bow, while the iron plates of our ship were twisted up like shavings.

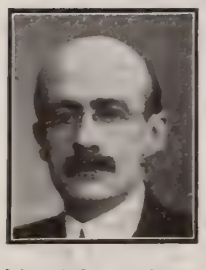
For nearly twenty-four hours more the fog continued with brief intermissions, and this evidently got on the nerves of the passengers even more than the shock of the first moment of the collision. Some tried to throw off their nervousness by singing ragtime tunes, others by playing cards, and not a few, I am glad to say, by looking to a higher Power, and remembering that the Father in heaven ruled the waves.

It was a time when many hearts were tender, and any appeal to their gratitude and reverence went home. Sunday morning, the next day after the accident, just before reaching port, I asked permission of the purser to hold a thanksgiving service, which was readily granted. I never knew an audience to be more responsive. There were few dry eyes in the crowded music-room as we voiced our gratitude in song and prayer and brief words of thanksgiving. Tears streamed down the faces of many strong men, and the impressive service will never be forgotten by any who attended.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

The Gains of Service

By Arthur H. Howland



WHAT did Jesus mean by saying, when James and John asked to be given the seats of highest honor in his kingdom—"It is not mine to give"? Is it true that he could not decide who should sit at his right and left hand in the glory of his kingdom? Yes, it is true. The places are there, but not even he can assign them. They must be won.

Those seats, he proceeded to explain, are waiting for the two people who help the greatest number of other people. That is the great law of the kingdom. You see, it works like this: Every time you help anybody that fact is a reward in itself. Nobody can undo the fact that you did help him. That is eternal currency added to your heavenly wealth. Every life you make glad, every hour you make glad for another, every soul you win for the kingdom makes a condition of affairs in the other world that will count for your blessing forever. Furthermore, we may get the habit of helpfulness, and the skill and power of helpfulness, so that we shall be efficient helpers in heaven. So those who have helped the most people here and thus become most able to go on helping others will have these highest places in heaven.

But we must remember that we have not at hand the means of computing the helpfulness, either of ourselves or of others. Many an obscure soul has, by faithfulness and sacrifice and self-forgetful service, really accomplished more than those whose work is spectacular and well-known. Back of probably every great forward movement is some unknown saint whose beauty of character, depth of sacrifice and strength of faith led another more gifted soul to receive the power that stirred the times.

We have almost forgotten what that word "minister" means. It means servant. And this view of the ministry ought to be impressed upon the young men who are planning to take up that work. Not to be educated up away from the people, but to be trained down to learn how the masses live and think and feel and work; not to think of getting high honors and comfortable homes and big salaries, but to long to bring justice and comfort and gladness to other hearts and homes; not to preach profound sermons and write learned papers, but to snatch men away from sin and hold them to lives of righteousness; "not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many"—that is what it really means to be a minister. And the really greatest minister is the one who really becomes "the servant of all."

But Christ's law applies to all his followers, not only the ordained ministers, but to all the people, young and old, of his flock. Not to exercise authority, not to "lord it over" the rest. That is not Christ's way. That is the way of the Gentiles, the people who do not know our God. But to serve all, to help all, to give to all—that is Christ's plan, and the way up to those chief seats is down through humility and loving, self-sacrificing helpfulness.

If this plan of Jesus were new to us we should be struck by its beauty and its truth. We have heard it so often that to talk about it now strikes us as an almost tedious repetition of an unpleasant truth, known well enough, but too unpleasant to be put into definite and active service. But stop and listen! Suppose you had never heard it before. Suppose your heart was sore from the disappointments of trying to find happiness and power and success in the ways of the world. Wouldn't this idea strike you as beautiful, and strong, and true, and delightful? To make other people glad! What could be finer and more enduring than that? To have the whole world spread out before you, and to be told that you are free to go out and help all the people you can reach, and that the more you can help the happier and wealthier you will be throughout eternity! That is a plan worthy of the heart and mind of Jesus. He showed it was a good plan by adopting it himself. Shall we not follow him in it and win a high place with him, by living for others in his name?

One word more. The secret is love. If we love self most we shall live for self and so lose everything. If we love others we shall help them. But the surest way, indeed the only way, is to love Christ ardently. He can so change our hearts by his power, so cleanse them by his blood, that we shall love him most of all and desire to serve him in every way. Then we hear him telling us that if we want to serve him we may do so by serving others. So as we really forget self and think only of him and of ways for helping those for whom he died, we shall, though we may seem to be going downward into obscurity, and poverty and suffering, be really going upward toward heavenly and eternal wealth and honors.

THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON for Sunday, July 12, 1914. Greatness Through Service. Mark 10: 32-45. GOLDEN TEXT: "The Son of man also came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many." Mark 10: 45.

The Way to Greatness

By Amos R. Wells

CHRIST'S purpose in his life, the purpose of the worldling in his life, the purpose of the Christian in his life—all these are set forth clearly in a single scene, one of the most interesting and instructive of the entire New Testament.

Our Lord was on his way to Jerusalem, there to die for the sins of the world. He tried to tell his diciples what would happen, as ever since the Holy Spirit has tried to make the world understand what did happen. "That is why I came to earth," he said; "not for men to serve me, but that I might serve men; and not in light matters, but in their greatest need. I did not come to receive, but to give; yes, to give my utmost, my very life. And I shall so give it that men may be freed." This is what our Saviour tried to make the slow-minded disciples understand.

Peter the Great left Russia in the hands of temporary rulers and set out to learn for himself the arts of civilization which his nation so sadly needed to learn. He traveled as an inferior officer, and he even, at Amsterdam and Saardam in Holland, worked for some time as a common shipbuilder, that he might learn that important trade. Then he took all this knowledge back for the enlightenment of his country. This illustrates, only on a scale infinitely lower, what our Lord did for us when he laid aside his glory that he might bring us light and life.

But the disciples could not understand it. They were "amazed" as they saw him walking so confidently to Jerusalem, where they knew danger and death awaited him. They were afraid to follow him on his perilous path. How far they were from following him in his glorious thought was made plain by James and John, cousins of Jesus, who approached him with their mother, Mary's sister Salome. They said to each other, "He will soon manifest his glory. That is the only way to account for this ma ness of going to Jerusalem. He mu intend now to set up his kingdom his supernatural power." So th asked that he would make them l prime ministers, one on either side him on his coming throne.

Was ever a truer example of t worldly life? They wanted to be ne Christ, to be sure, but because to near him was to be on a thro Ignoring the eternal part of his m sion, they leaped at the tempor They were like the small boy w asked his mother, "Can any Americ boy be President when he grows up And when she too freely answer "Yes," the lad eagerly inquired, "B I don't have to be President, do I, I'd rather be first baseman?"

That is it: no one has to be king he would rather be plowman; a John and James, blind to the true ro alty of the Christ life, were for snatc ing at the tinsel of empty pride a shifting power. How the request mu have saddened the heart of the Ma ter!

Reader, the one thing for eve Christian to win, first and foremo is the passionate desire to be li Christ. Henry Drummond wrote: "' become like Christ is the only thing the world worth caring for, the thi before which every ambition is foll and lower achievements vain." D Cadman compares the complex web our life—its grief, its pain, its joy its toil, its ambitions—to the ma strands of the Brooklyn bridge cable "But all those twisted wires are gat ered into one great heart of mason at either end, and there buried out sight and in security, and we cross t stream safely." So let all our hop and plans and purposes be gathere up into the mighty heart of Jesus, a we shall cross the gulf of time safety.

Dr. Junker, the Russian explorer Africa, was at one time in the heart the great continent, and his way o to the coast was blocked in every d rection. At last he persuaded son Arab traders to take him out as the slave, making a contract whereby firm in Zanzibar was bound to pa them $1,500 for him when they hande him over.

That is the only way for us to g safely out of the wilderness of th life: we must become Christ's slave owning his lordship and humbly doi his will. Phillips Brooks asked, "D you doubt one instant that his com mand is for you openly to own him a declare that you are his servant befo all the world? And have you done it?

If we are Christ's slaves, no servic of our fellow men is too small for u as no service is too small for him.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS' ROUND TABLE

CAN YOU SUGGEST an interesting missionary service for Junior scholars?—G. B.

One of the most interesting missionary afternoons I know of was the result of the work of a Junior teacher, a seventeen-year-old girl. She was entrusted with a class of live-wire, ten-year-old Junior boys, as her first assignment. She had tact enough to know that the interest of perpetual-motion digits of that age could never be secured simply by Sunday teaching. So one afternoon a week, a Friday, she met the boys at her home after school hours. She had procured a well-illustrated story of the life of John Paton, the missionary to the New Hebrides. This thrilling story of hairbreadth escapes from the threatening natives was read by the boys in turn to the others, a chapter a week. The other boys listened. Then the teacher would ask one of the boys, without previous notice, to rehearse the story of that chapter, and it was done always with a fidelity to the facts that showed how intently the reading was listened to. And this reading was followed each week by games or something good to eat, for at that age the stomach seems a direct road to a boy's heart.

Week by week the boys were absorbing not simply the vivid details of the story, but something of the heroic, faith-filled life of John Paton, and getting their impulses for missionary giving, and, it may be, for missionary living, later on.

After the book had been completed, a map of the New Hebrides was drawn. The class occupied an honored seat on the platform on missionary afternoons. One of the boys explained the map and then several of the class told the story of John Paton and his wonderful work to a gaping crowd of Juniors. Neither boys, teachers, nor department soon forget that day.

There are scores of thrilling stories of Uganda, Korea, China and India that could be read by Junior and Intermediate boys and girls in the same way, and would make an equally interesting program for the Sunday school or the Epworth League, Christian Endeavor, etc. For a list of such books get Missionary Leaflet No. 2, International Sunday School Association, Chicago.

—DO YOU BELIEVE teachers should stay with the department in a graded school or go forward at promotion time with their pupils?—J. H. W.

If the work of the Sunday school teacher was that of the education of the head alone the plan of holding the teacher to the grade would have many arguments in its favor. But the presentation of the facts of the Bible simply lays the foundation for soul growth and for the higher appeals in the realm of character and conduct. And the mightiest factor in developing motives for character and soul growth is the love and Christian personality of the teacher. The special relationship of the teacher to the pupils of a particular class must therefore be given consideration, and especially where the motive for attendance of the pupils after twelve years of age is more often the personal attachment to the teacher than the quality of the teaching or the attractiveness of the school exercises.

In general I should say that in the Beginners' and Primary grades and in the first few Junior years, where the habit of Sunday school attendance is strong and the parental "go" usually effective, the teacher should stay with the department and the pupil go forward. A for the special reason too that the intuiti and skill for teaching younger children is n easily furnished by new teachers. But in t promotion from the Junior to the Interm diate and from the Intermediate to the Seni Departments I favor keeping teacher and cla together whenever there is a strong attac ment between teacher and pupils, and wh the teacher's ability and personality will m the requirements of the new period of th pupil's life.

Then, too, the promotion of teachers is ne essary in order to make opportunity in th lower grades for the use of the young peop graduated from the teachers' training cours These young people should get their first se vice as teachers and helpers in the Primary Junior Departments, for which they are b age naturally better fitted than the Inte mediate and Senior Departments. While th use as teachers of young people in the upp teens is being experimented with in the Inte mediate Department in some places and ha been found quite successful, the young peop themselves if they follow their own choice w usually select the Beginners', Primary or Junio Departments for their first work.

The story of the first annual convention of the International Union of Gospel Missions, held in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, May 13-17, was given in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, June 10. This new organization, although practically in its infancy, holds promise of becoming one of the strongest and most useful of our great religious societies. The present membership exceeds one hundred and twenty-five. Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, president (eighth from right, front row), and many of the delegates to the convention are shown in this photograph.

A LITTLE ANGEL OF THE MOUNTAINS

urroundings and the good influences f other days. He indicated how much hey needed help, he expressed confi- lence that such help would be given. He asked the divine blessing upon heir labors and upon their enjoy- nents and especially upon the ser- vice that morning, and he concluded n the name of Him who had been nan's fellow workman and of whose greatest glory it was said he was at nce the Saviour and the Servant of nankind. First one hat and then an- ther had come off as the simple words ad fallen from the man's lips, until inally the whole assemblage stood areheaded until the prayer was con- luded.

"Now," said Mr. Morrison, "you nay all sit down. I'm going to read n the Bible the same lesson that is n the cards. It happens to be the story of the Good Samaritan."

Mr. Morrison was not without tact. He knew that the appointed lesson for hat particular Sunday was the story f the Prodigal Son. He thought it probable that if they had ever at- tended services they had heard it, and he accordingly chose the story of the Good Samaritan instead. He wanted to emphasize the spirit of helpfulness, which was sadly lacking in that moun- tain mining town. For the ideal there was every man for himself, to which might have been added, and the devil for them all.

When he finished the lesson, Mr. Morrison gave place to his wife. For one thing, the physical effort and ner- vous mental strain had been great for a man in his condition, and he was thoroughly weary. For another, he realized that she was a better teacher than he.

It was a hard position for the wom- an, but she had met hard positions before. It seemed to her a part of duty to meet this demand now. She stepped forward quietly, clasped her hands together, and began to tell the men what the story meant to her. She first emphasized the lesson that the first immortal Teller of the tale intended to convey — the lesson of helpfulness. She pointed Him out as a man and brother indeed, to whom the young and the old, the high and the low, the good and the bad, might freely appeal. Her words, faltering and hesitant at first, came clearly at the last and with a mighty rush, as she saw in the wistful and awe- stricken faces before her the effect she was producing.

"Oh," she said at last, "if you would only help each other to be good men. If you would only turn to Him for help to help each other to be good men, you could make Cañon Creek what it ought to be in all the beauty of these ever- lasting hills, the nearest spot on earth to heaven."

Mr. Morrison followed his wife's words with other prayers, familiar collects from the ancient service, in which he was, of course, more fluent if not more fervent. He, too, had caught the spirit of the hour. When he concluded, Jennie and Annie, the mother playing and starting them, sang a hymn together, all joining in the chorus.

"That's all, gentlemen," said Mr. Morrison, as the childish trebles and the roaring chorus died away in a silence broken only by the sough of the wind sifting gently through the tall pines. "We are proud and pleased and thankful to God that you came to our Sunday school. We will have it every Sunday morning, God willing, at this hour, and you are all welcome. If it rains—"

"If it rains," said the proprietor of The Black Pup promptly, to the great astonishment of everybody, including his rival of The Red Dog, who felt he had lost a great opportunity himself, "you kin have it in my place of busi- ness. I'll take down the pictures an' cover up the bottles an'—"

"Thank you very much," said Mr. Morrison. "We may avail ourselves of your offer. It may be that when the restaurant is finished we can have it there. You are always free to come. Mrs. Morrison and I came here to live, and while we are going to keep a res- taurant and sell the best food we can to make our living, we want to know you as friends as well as patrons. The house will be open to you, and, as I said before, that is all."

"Beggin' your pardon, Mr. Preacher Man," said Old Four Eyes, "but with your permission, I got somethin' to say."

"Certainly," said Mr. Morrison; "anything you like."

"I ain't any too familiar with church," continued the old man apolo- getically, "but I jest remembers a mighty important part of what they used to call divine worship when I was a small boy down South, which it seems to me we've kinder over- looked an' forgot."

"This is my first attempt at con- ducting such a service as this alone, gentlemen, and I have no doubt that I have failed in a great many ways. You will have to excuse me for my shortcomings," said Mr. Morrison. "What is lacking?"

"'Tain't nothin' for which no apol- ogies should be made, sir, but it strikes me that we all ain't took up no collection yet."

"Well, what do you want the money for?" asked Mrs. Morrison.

"For this here church of yourn, to build a proper meetin' house for the camp," replied Old Four Eyes.

"I think Old Four Eyes has a mighty good idea," said the Doc. "I moves that we all passes around the hat immejit, an' that we gives what- ever we gits therein to Mr. Morrison for to build us a church."

"All them that's in favor of takin' up a collection for re-ligious purposes will say 'aye,'" said Old Four Eyes.

A perfect roar of approval came from the miners.

"I appoints Parson Bill, who led us yere, to pass the hat," he continued.

"If I pass the hat," said Parson Bill, rising, "you all has got to come across handsome. I don't stand for mere shoutin' in religion." He took up his hat and extended it to the nearest man, who dropped a coin in it which the collector examined care- fully. "That ain't enough for you, Faro Jim. I heard that you cleaned out two or three men last night. Jest double your ante or quit," continued Parson Bill sternly.

Faro Jim stared at him in great astonishment.

"I'm hanged if I don't go you," he said at last. "In fact, I'll raise you two an' call the next gent," he said, putting his hand in his pocket and producing a handful of coins and gold dust. "That is for me an' for some of the fellers I left jest a leetle short after the game last night."

"Hooray for Faro Jim," exclaimed the next man, cheerfully dropping a chunk of silver in the hat.

Parson Bill went his way, forcing every one to give freely. He knew every one in the camp, he knew the financial condition of all, and he cer- tainly got more out of them in his rough-and-ready way than any one else could. Old Four Eyes made a wise choice. The hat was filled with nuggets, little bags of gold dust, bills, and coins when Parson Bill brought it back and presented it to Mr. Morrison, who solemnly accepted it with a little prayer of thanksgiving.

"That's all, gents," said Old Four Eyes; "you all kin now disperse."

"Wait, please," said Mr. Morrison. He whispered to his wife, who sat down at the organ again. "I wish to have this money counted by the col- lector and the gentleman with the spectacles—"

"Old Four Eyes you kin call me, same as the rest of the boys," inter- rupted the new leader of the camp.

"Well, by Parson Bill and Old Four Eyes. A portion of it shall be sent to the bishop to assist him in his work and the rest shall be spent to buy lumber and employ labor to put up a building when we have enough for the purpose. But before we separate I am going to ask you all to join in singing the Doxology."

When the last words of the great ascription of praise died away, some one stepped up on a boulder and waved his hands, and shouted,

"Which I ain't no speechmaker, but I moves that we all gives three cheers for Mr. Morrison an' his family."

"And I've got something to say," cut in the Doc, as the first call for cheers was responded to heartily. "An' that is, if Parson Bill hadn't had the nerve to come up yere to show us the way we'd never have come our- selves. I never seed nothin' in my life like him a-marchin' down the street to jine in a re-ligious meetin', so I suggests that we add three cheers for our old friend an' comrade, Parson Bill."

A half hour later found Cañon Creek lined up before the bars. Alas, that it should have to be chronicled, but the truth must be told. For a short time patronage was liberal and business prosperous, but somehow the situation was altered.

"I can't seem to relish my likker like I did," said Old Four Eyes, at last turning away. "I don't exactly know why, my conscience bein' clear and me havin' participated in the first real re-ligious movement that Cañon Creek's ever had. I'd ought to enjoy it more than ever, but, hang it all—"

He set down his glass only half emptied, a thing absolutely unique in his experience and wonderful in that mining town. Attended by some of the others who felt as he did, Old Four Eyes wandered slowly and dubi- ously out of the saloon, shaking his head over a problem that was almost too great for him to solve.

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

God in Music*

GOD has many languages. He speaks to us in his written Word; he speaks to us in history, in friendships, in the beauty of nature—in music. Music is one of the world's miracles. No one can explain what it is; no one can explain what it does for us.

We only know that certain vibrations produce corresponding vibrations of our ear-drums, which enable us to recognize differences of tone and pitch in sound; and that certain sequences of pitch and tone make what we call melodies and harmonies, and that these give us varying sensations, emotions, all the way from sadness to ecstasy.

God can talk to us by music with words or without them. Often a passage of music from orchestra or organ will bring us a message from God, just as a sunset may, or the view of a mountain, or the fragrance of a flower. A problem will be solved; a burden lifted, or new strength given for it; a new assurance granted of his love and beauty. It almost seems that God himself has touched us, and made us glad. But when the words of sacred hymns are added—who can estimate the number of blessings that have come thus to human hearts? Wanderers brought back; penitents pardoned; the sad made joyful; the perplexed enlightened; the weak strengthened; the blind of soul made to see; the tainted made pure.

Many a Christian experience dates from the hearing of a song. Many a Christian life traces its progress by a succession of holy and happy hymns.

If you have a voice, give it to Jesus. There is no sweeter, and scarcely a surer, way of winning souls. Make the music of your society and church truly spiritual, sung by people who love the Lord and who love to praise him. Get your heart in training now for a part in that great chorus which is to be sung in heaven, perhaps to the very tune we learned on earth: "He shall reign forever and ever, King of kings and Lord of lords. Hallelujah!"

I Will Follow Thee—But—*

WAS Jesus too stern in refusing to let the man he was calling go back to arrange for and attend his father's funeral? As we read the story we are apt to think so. But if you will read carefully the incident that follows you will understand the first. The two stories, told in our second Scripture reference, Luke 9: 59-62, are both about the same kind of a man—the man who will say, "Lord, I will follow thee, but—"

It was not the thing these men wanted to do that Jesus objected to, but the condition of their hearts and the strength of their wills. They had not yet settled it in their minds and souls that he must be absolutely and all the time—first.

Jesus always insisted upon that, not because he was jealous of the care his followers might have for other friends, but because he knew they could not serve their other friends truly, nor do well the work that needed to be done unless he came first in their affection and loyalty. In this sense Christ is like conscience. The man who makes compromises with his conscience, who refuses to make its demands first and final, is flabby and inefficient. So Christ must come first. We must follow him; follow him first; follow him now.

It has been suggested, and is almost undoubtedly true, that Jesus knew both of these men before. He knew their vacillating, compromising, procrastinating nature. And he put them to a special test. Other men might be trusted to go back home for an errand and return to him, but these men could not. If he let them go back that would be the last he would see of them or they of him. The time to insist upon their following him was now, when they were cut loose from the influences that would hold them back, and were under the immediate spell of his power and his call.

It might be mentioned also in passing, with reference to the first incident, that the Jewish idea of a funeral was then, and is now, very different from ours. I heard recently of a Jewish woman who died suddenly in the daytime and whose body was hurriedly removed and buried before her husband returned from work at night. I have been told that this is frequently done. Often the body of a dead friend is spirited away and other friends try to make the bereaved believe that their loved one is gone on an unexpected visit and will return. Always the burial must take place on the day of death. Death is to them a loathsome, ugly, accursed thing, and the signs of it are to be hidden as quickly as possible. So Jesus' word to this weak-willed follower meant much less in severity and privation than it would mean to people of Christian training to-day.

Loyalty—it is a great, a fundamental thing. Quick, unquestioning loyalty. This is the sort of followers Christ is looking for.

The word loyalty is, however, in some other connections often overworked. Loyalty among politicians means that a man must stand by his political associates and his party organization whatever they may do. Very often when the cry of disloyalty is raised against a politician it means that he has decided to go ahead on a new and hard path of honor. Social loyalty often means that one must stand by his friends, his "crowd," no matter what their conduct. This is false loyalty. A man must be loyal to truth, loyal to honor, loyal to justice; and when his friends waver, or halt, or turn aside, he must go on alone.

It is here that Christ rises above all men in sublime isolation. We make no conditions or compromises in our promise of allegiance to him. Whatever he tells us to do, no matter how surprising, how different, how difficult, we shall do it, instantly, confidently, gladly.

Where he leads me I will follow.
I'll go with him, with him, all the way.

And we know that he is leading us to splendid victory and to incalculable rewards.

In return for sending you an eight months' subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I have received a beautiful American flag, and the portfolio of the Panama Canal, and the Lady has received two issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which she appreciates very highly. The flag arrived at 10 A.M. on the morning of Memorial Day, and was flung out on the breeze before noon. It is a beauty, and I prize it very highly. Please accept my sincere thanks. JONATHAN DRAPER.

TRYING THE SPIRITS

I will let no man steal my God from me. I will test every man's theory by, "Does it leave me God?" I will ask what sort of a God he loves. If he offer me a divinity that hath not power to call to me and help me across the winter of my life and say, "Spring time is come," I will not have him. I will turn my back on him. I will not mean discourtesy, but I will mean needs. I know my needs. I know what my heart must have. I cannot live on stones, I must have bread. I can not drink air, I must have water; and I must have a God who hath the fountains out of which spring living waters and healing. I must have a God whose hand opens and manna falls. I must have a God who speaks and it is daylight. I must have a God who comes and walks with me like the light.

Am I appealing to sentiment? I am not! I am appealing to needs. "Try these spirits whether they be of God." I want every man and woman to try their religion that way. Does your religion make for absolute righteousness? Are you better because of your religious theory? Are you sweeter because you have the religion you have? Does your religion make you better morally? Or did you borrow your morality from Christianity? Because you say you have morality, don't think that your religion necessarily gave it to you. Lots of people take a variety of religion and graft it on their character, whereas they stole every lonely virtue they have from the Book of God. They stole every purity of their life, as a child might steal flowers. They stole all their flowers of piety and virtue from the Gospel, and they never give it any sort of credit. Some people know no quotation marks in the case where they set up type. Does your religion make your life courteous? Does your religion render you free from self? Does your religion make your heart affable? Does your religion make your presence comely? Does your religion make you pray easier and pray sweeter prayers? Does your religion bring you to the altar of God? Does your religion open the Book of God to you? Does your religion make everybody dear to you? Does your religion make you want to be an infinite helper in your finite life? Does it make the uttermost parts of the earth dear to you? I tell you, men and women, any religion that does not make people outside of your home town dear to you is not Christ's religion. Any religion that does not make heathendom dear to you; any religion that makes you talk forever about home missions, and against foreign missions, is not Christ's religion. He was the great Foreign Missionary. He left his home in heaven, and came to the earth and baptized its dust with his blood in the Garden of Gethsemane. And he broke his heart for the world. He was the great Foreign Missionary. In other words, try your religion if it be of God. If it makes you affable; if it brings you into continuity with the great arguments of history and holy living; if it brings you into contiguity with suffering, and makes you as balm, then that thing is of God. If you have got Christ—not an emasculated Christ Jesus, but Christ who is also the Lord God Almighty—if he can take your sins away; if he is "able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy"; if he is able to kiss your dead eyes awake in the morning of the day of God; if your religion makes you companionable with God; if it makes you a home on earth and in heaven; if it makes you an inhabitant of time and of eternity, and while you dwell on the earth to be a preparatory citizen to dwell in heaven—then that thing is of God. If it be of God, hold to it!

The other day I called on an old, old man. I had never seen him before, and his face somehow minded me of how the face of John might have been, it was so dear. I told him my name and that I was a preacher; and he took my hand and held it in his, and I felt as if to me had come the mercy of God and that some Simeon of the old time was standing and speaking to me and holding my hands. This is what he said: "The Lord God Almighty bless you, boy." And my heart cried, "Say it again." But I said no word. Only he said, "The Lord God Almighty bless you, boy." I was a man—I am long past boyhood, I am past youthhood, I have come to what I might esteem middle age, but he was up in the nineties, and he looked on me as a boy, and he said again, "The Lord God Almighty bless you, boy."

He told me that he had been a preacher and Christ had been with him all the time; and his faith was quite clear so that he thought it was noon still, but it was evening. And he said how good God had been to him. He said, "I lie here or sit in the house, day in and day out, but my Jesus is with me. He is with me all the time, my friend; all the time." And I tell you, a religion that establishes a soul and stays its goings and makes old age placid and sweet like an unrippling lake; a religion that makes the hope of eternal life to glow on your evening sky until the purple light is splendid like the morning—it is of God! It will stay forever. And once again, "Try the spirits whether they be of God." Amen.

ROME TROUBLED ON ALL SIDES

FATHER PHELAN CALLED TO ORDER

APOSTOLIC DELEGATE BONZANO, the Pope's representative Washington, on May 30 wrote the llowing to Archbishop Glennon of . Louis:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 30, 1914.
ost Reverend John J. Glennon, D.D., Archbishop of St. Louis, St. Louis, Mo.

YOUR GRACE: Since my arrival in this county, I have frequently read the editorials of the estern Watchman, and it has not been rare at I have found some objectionable point in em, particularly some disrespectful reference the ecclesiastical authority.

While the editor of this paper, the Rev. D. S. elan, loudly boasts of his loyalty and devoon to the Holy See, he nevertheless usurps e right of criticizing the bishops of the urch, and frequently casts aspersions upon em with grave injury to the ecclesiastical disline which Our Holy Father has so much at art.

Numerous bishops and priests, with whom I ve had occasion to speak concerning this per, have deplored the attitude of the Rev. . Phelan and have expressed their surprise at the ecclesiastical authorities have taken steps towards repressing his audacity. The rotestants, on the contrary, seem to consider m as an oracle of the church and quote his temperate utterances as doctrines of the me.

After the opportune letter that you addessed to him on the 12th of January, 1914, ncerning his reprehensible article on the ngo, and in which you alluded to his reated attacks on the hierarchy, I thought the ev. Father would have finally recognized his ty in this regard. But when I now behold e unworthy manner in which he continues assail the illustrious Bishop of Toledo, in grant violation of the disposition of the I Plenary Council of Baltimore No. 231, I n constrained to admit that I was badly misken.

It is time, therefore, to call him to order. ence I direct Your Grace to summon him to ur presence, and, with two priests as witsses, the Vicar General and the Chancellor the Diocese if possible, to read this letter to m. You will then intimate to him that he ust change his method of writing. And if should fail to do this, you will withdraw om him the necessary permission for editing public journal which, as a priest, he must ve from you according to the constitution fficiorum et Munerum of Leo XIII, that was ewly insisted on by the present Pope, in his cyclical letter Pascendi Dominici Gregis, in e following words: "Nominatim servari diligentius praecipimus, quae articulo XLII nstitutionis Officiorum in haec verba edicunr: 'Viri e clero seculari prohibentur quomis, absque praevia Ordinariorum venia, aria vel folia periodica moderanda suscipiant.' ua si qui venia perniciose utantur, ea, oniti primum, priventur."

If you are obliged to take this latter course, id the Rev. Father should yet persist in writg, nothing remains for you to do, but to proed against him.

Whatever is finally done in the matter, I rect that this letter be published, in its enrety, on the editorial page of all the editions the next number of his paper, and without y comment upon it, either then or thereafter. this is not done by him, I will have recourse other means for rendering it public.

I deeply regret that I am obliged to take these measures, but a further delay to act would only justify the opinion of those who suspect authority of weakness or of connivance.

With expressions of esteem and best wishes, I remain, Sincerely yours in Xto,

JOHN BONZANO,
Archbishop of Melitere.
Apostolic Delegate.

Archbishop Glennon, as requested, summoned Father Phelan to the archiepiscopal residence, read the monsignor's letter to him, and delivered it to him in person, and it is duly and obediently published in the Western Watchman of June 11. Like Father Phelan, we print the letter without comment. It speaks for itself.

THE EXPOSITION BOYCOTT

From the Independent, New York, June 15

THE efforts of certain religious journals and societies to discredit ex-Mayor Nathan of Rome and compel the authorities of the Panama-Pacific Exposition to refuse him as the duly appointed delegate from Italy are destined to create a corresponding attitude of animosity and suspicion in the minds of those who do not share the religious views of the delegate's enemies. The call is now being sent forth for all Catholics to boycott the exposition, and this because a foreign state has chosen a representative who is persona non grata to the Roman Catholic leaders in America. It is difficult to escape the conclusion that an attempt is being made to utilize the influence of a great church in our country to administer a rebuke to an anti-clerical party in Italy by an unwarranted attack upon an enterprise which all Americans are interested in promoting. It is well in such circumstances to remember the injunction of Washington that we keep ourselves from entanglements in European quarrels.

IT IS evident that the responsible leaders of the Roman Catholic Church are absent from the United States when their followers come out as boycotters of the Panama Canal Fair in San Francisco. Certainly, eighty millions of Protestants in this country will note this action with interest. Some of the fiercest of the anti-Catholic papers have called that institution the "boycotting church," but most Protestants have thought the statements were exaggerations. This action of Roman Catholic authorities is certainly to be deprecated, for the reason that it adds fuel to the fire of anti-Catholic resentment, steadily rising in this country because of aggressive political Catholic activity. It seems to be the very essence of Roman Catholicism to interfere with political and state affairs, and the tremendous losses of the church in Italy, France, and Portugal on account of political activity are evidently no lesson to the institution.

Father Phelan in the Western Watchman, June 11

WE DO not see why the Catholics of the United States should try to bankrupt San Francisco and the whole State of California because the king of Italy has seen fit to designate a Freemason churl to represent his government at the Panama Exposition. What can the directors do in the premises?

MEXICO AND THE PRIESTS

New Orleans Times-Picayune, June 8

"ANOTHER thing that has resulted in heaping criticism upon our heads," said a member of General Gonzalez' staff (Constitutionalist,) "is the action that we have taken against the Catholic priesthood in Mexico. In the first place, it should be understood that a large percentage of the Constitutionalist army is composed of Catholics, many of the officers being Catholics. But an investigation by a disinterested person will furnish convincing evidence of our contention that the priesthood in Mexico is a distinct evil, and has been wielding an influence harmful to the republic. Like the Spaniards, the Catholic priests in Mexico have been meddlers in politics. They have heretofore insisted on exercising a certain amount of influence in political affairs as a matter of right. They get every cent of money that it is possible for them to get out of the poor peons and the Indians; nor have they have ever shown any eagerness to help these poor people out of the mire of illiteracy. We are sending all the Catholic priests out of the country and the churches have been closed. It has not been decided definitely what policy shall be pursued with respect to the Catholic Church after the establishment of Constitutional government in Mexico City, but it is very probable that the church will be permitted to reopen their places of worship under conditions that will tend to an uplifting of the people, rather than their mental and moral degradation. The priests who have operated in Mexico, however, will not be allowed to return, at least not very many of them."

Mr. Roosevelt and the Constitution

JUDGE ALTON B. PARKER, urging allegiance to the constitution in n address to the graduating class of ale Law School on June 15, took ccasion to rebuke severely ex-President Roosevelt for his recent statement egarding his plans for settling a rike during his administration. Mr. arker said: "Something is radically rong in the mental process of the ectorate or else patriotism is at its st gasp when, with hardly a whisper f protest, a retired chief executive ay brag to the representatives of the eople of his treasonable scheme to inude upon State rights and violate therwise the fundamental law by stablishing a military receivership ver coal mines pending a strike, admitting without a suspicion of decent ame that he had well considered at his offense might be impeachable committed—impeachable, that of urse, only because the acts planned ould have been unconstitutional and wless."

To Help the Prisoners

A PRISONERS' Relief Society is now being organized, the leading spirit being a young man of West Virginia, while among the directors are a number of influential business men of that State. It is proposed to make the organization a national one, if possible, in order that a Gospel of cheer and helpfulness may be carried to the inmates of the prisons and penitentiaries throughout the country. This is a work which is very greatly needed. One of the chief leaders in the enterprise is a man who himself has known the meaning of prison life and the hardness and bitterness of the lot of the everyday convict. This man, who is now a thorough Christian, believes that many hundreds if not thousands of prisoners can be reached with the Gospel through the Prisoners' Relief Society, and that a great reformative work con be done among these unfortunates. Any one wishing to communicate with the organizers can address "D," THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

How Man Conquered Nature

THIS is the title of a little volume by Minnie J. Reynolds, which will charm youthful readers. "When I first began to read the book," writes Miss Margaret E. Sangster, "I settled down to look over a story for children; but as I got interested in the subject I began to realize that, although it is a child's book, written in simple style, with easy words, it contains a great deal of information that the average grown-up has never taken the trouble to learn. How many of us know, for instance, how the primitive women carried water, how the men first trained our common domestic animals, how money and language first came into use? These are only a few of the real facts found on every page, and I am not ashamed to say that every chapter held some information for me, and taught me many things that I had never heard of. How Man Conquered Nature should be on every child's bookshelf." Published by The Macmillan Company, New York. Price, 40 cents.

Questions and Answers

B. O. In my early teens I had an intense and almost uncontrollable desire to enter into the field of Christian labor, but every one told me that no one could be a disciple of Christ who had not had a "change of heart." I knew that I felt just as I had always felt. Yet I believed I was worthy and thought that when I overcame some faults common to childhood so no one would doubt my sincerity I would join the church. For more than sixteen years I have been fighting those faults and every year they grow worse. Now my apparent indifference touches the lives of seventy-five to a hundred children yearly. What shall I do?

There seems little doubt that you made an unwise decision some years ago, or at least failed to make a wise decision at the best time. But as a matter of fact it is far more important to make sure you are right with God now and doing the work he wishes you to do than to try to figure out the answer to a problem so long past. Can you not realize that you may approach Christ and talk matters over with him just as you would talk them over with any friend whom you can see? Even if you had done wrong knowingly he would forgive you freely and give you grace to serve him successfully now, in your present position. But since you meant to do right it is even easier for you to believe that he overlooks any mistake of the past and will help you now to know his will and do it. Your case was doubtless that of so many other children who grow up with the consciousness of loving God and with the desire to serve him. Your advisers were mistaken in telling you to wait for something which you had already received. But the thing to do now is to rouse yourself from all indifference, whether real or apparent, to trust Christ at once for the complete forgiveness of your sins and cleansing of your heart and for the enduement with the Holy Spirit. Then he will show you how to serve him fruitfully in your present occupation or lead you to another where you can do still more for him.

Mrs. A. J. O., Fountain City, Ind. 1. As previously explained in the Mail-Bag, there are certain prophecies that have a twofold significance, the first relating to the impending event and the second to an event more remote. Thus it is that we find the prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem coupled with warnings to prepare for his second coming—the one already fulfilled, the other yet to be fulfilled. 2. In I Cor. 14, Paul was laying down rules for the exercise of spiritual gifts, among others, the gift of tongues, his point being, in the latter case, that one who had received this gift should pray that he might be able to make it intelligible in his address to others. To the apostle, evidently, "tongues" meant languages and not unintelligible utterances. See his conclusions on the subject stated in verse 19.

Reader, Wheeling, W. Va. 1. John may have been baptized by some of his own disciples, according to the views expressed by commentators. 2. Nothing is recorded to show that Judas Iscariot ever took an active part in the spiritual work of the twelve. 3. The message of the church at Smyrna was addressed to a body of faithful Christians, some of whom had sealed their faithfulness with their lives. Poor in the world's goods, it was rich spiritually. It was encouraged not to shrink from suffering. The "accuser" (translated "devil") would persecute and imprison them. "Ten days" are explained as ten years on the principle that in Scripture a day frequently means a year. The time of hardship and trial would be short, however, and the joy which would be their reward would endure forever.

S. S. Teacher, Constantine, Mich. 1. If we can conceive of the conscience as capable of being so wholly quickened that it could be said to be perfectly enlightened, then it would be an unerring guide in all things; but the necessarily imperfect conditions of humanity make this more than doubtful. We see now but dimly many things that will be revealed hereafter. Even the best Christian is conscious of his own imperfections in judgment as well as in conduct. The enlightened conscience is ordinarily a reliable guide to the sincere believer; but there are many cross-roads in life where we must simply look to God for leading, and pray and trust in him to guide us. 2. In the last ten verses of Heb. 10 the apostle was exhorting the church to hold fast to the faith with patience and thanksgiving. Being enlightened, their apostasy would be a graver sin than that of those who, living under the old dispensation, despised the Mosaic law. He pleaded with them to renew their covenant with Christ, to take a firmer hold of the faith to which they had pledged allegiance and to persevere in the spiritual life, reminding them of the heavenly possession promised to those who are faithful to the end. It was a revival discourse, designed to strengthen and encourage where faith was weak.

H. F. W. U., Wilson Creek, Wash. The first hymn to which you refer is by the poet Whittier, the first stanza being as follows:

We may not climb the heavenly steeps
To bring the Lord Christ down;
In vain we search the lowest deeps,
For him no depths can drown.

M. E. McK., Millansville, P. Q. 1. The "whosoever will" so frequently quoted in Gospel invitations is based on Rev. 22: 17. 2. In I Cor. 9: 5, Paul implies that he, like other men, had the power to "lead about a sister as a wife"—a sister by faith, which makes all of us brothers and sisters in the one great family of the heavenly Father, but for the work's sake and that he might devote himself unrestrictedly to the Gospel, he had remained single.

Miscellaneous

Beth, Crookston, Minn. We never heard of the lines you mention being set to music.

J. B. McInturff, Strasburg, Va., would be glad to have some reader of this paper send him the name of the author of the poem which begins: "Is father's eyesight growing dim, his form a little lower?"

F. A., Shenandoah, Pa. With regard to the dynamiters, the desire is simply that justice may be done. No one would wish the innocent to be punished. We believe this is the general sentiment on the matter.

W. L. W., North, S. C. There is a difference between actual investment and speculation on the rise and fall of prices. The first is a legitimate transaction; the second is a species of gambling.

Mrs. A. W. I., Rochester, N. Y. The future is in God's keeping, and he will make it known in his own good time. Many eminent Bible scholars have tried to interpret the prophecies concerning the "end of the age," etc., as to the time of their fulfilment, but have failed.

L. B., Mechanicsburg, Pa. 1. Dr. Torrey was ordained as a Congregational minister, and W. A. Sunday as a Presbyterian minister. T. DeWitt Talmage was a Presbyterian. 2. The Bowery Mission is situated at No. 227 Bowery, New York.

Mrs. J. C., Simons, Ohio. There are doubtless many who hold the views you have expressed concerning the passage in Rev. 13. There are many divergent speculations on the subject and it is not surprising, in view of verse 18, that this should be so.

C. C. S., Shelbyville, Ill. 1 Tim. 3: 2 is interpreted by modern commentators precisely as we explained in the Mail-Bag. They hold that it is the counterpart of chapter 5, verse 9, both passages meaning that the parties should have been married but once. See Luke 2: 36, 37 for an illustration of the feeling which prevailed concerning second marriages.

J. A. H., Chester, S. C. In concluding that John makes "no mention of the Lord's Supper" you have overlooked John 13, and the discourse in chapter 14 on the same occasion, which is so beautiful that it has been called "the Holy of Holies" of the Gospel record. The three following chapters also relate to the same occasion.

D. W., Middelstum. 1. Although cremation is not discussed in the Bible, either to be approved or discouraged, it is well known that this method of disposing of the dead is very ancient, and in early times was probably more generally employed than interment. Previous to the time of Christ, it was apparently the general practice, except in Egypt, Judea and China. Wherever the belief in the resurrection of the dead prevailed, embalming and burial were used instead of burning. 2. We do not know of any magazine of the kind you describe.

C. M. W., Newark, Ohio. 1. We continue to give attention to the activities of the Roman Church in American politics. The importance of this subject is shown in the action of the various denominational bodies, most of which have adopted resolutions at their great annual assemblies, calling attention to it. 2. The "times of the Gentiles" (see Luke 21: 24) is interpreted as meaning until that period when the Gentiles "have had their full time as occupying the position in the true church which the Jews had before them—in other words, until the Jews are again 'grafted into their own olive tree,' when one church, of both Jew and Gentile, together shall fill the earth." (See Rom. 11.) When that shall be, is hid with God, and human speculation on the subject is of little value.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

HAVE you sent in the names of your friends who might wish to become members of the Prayer League? As announced last week we shall be glad to forward applications for enrolment to all whose names and addresses are sent.

Do not fail to send in the acknowledgment of the answer to your prayer. This part we are apt to neglect. Remember the nine lepers who went on their way without expressing gratitude, and remember the Lord's response of the one who turned back to give thanks. One reader asks especially that those who have received answer to prayers for financial help will testify to that fact, that her own faith may be strengthened.

Rev. J. K. B. writes from Carterville, Mo.: "I must write you a line, for I cannot suppress the gratitude in my heart for the goodness of God in answering my prayers, for I have been given health and strength." "One of Christ's followers" writes from Reece, Ky.: "The Lord has answered a prayer for me that seems a miracle." Mrs. A. C. B. writes from Bridgeton, N. J., thanking God for answering prayer for victory in a campaign against the granting of a liquor license. R. K., of Banning, Cal., writes: "I wish to acknowledge God's answer to prayers for my mother's healing. She was at death's door with an incurable disease, when the Lord raised her up in answer to prayer." Mrs. E. R. of Winter Harbor, Me., writes, thanking God for answering prayer for healing her mother of pneumonia. Mrs. A. J. H. expresses thanks for the answer of an earnest prayer that she might hear from an only son. "Yesterday," she writes, "the long-looked-for letter came."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from: ——. D., Philadelphia, Pa.; P. J. W., Whaleyville, Va.; L. W., Wooster, Ohio; Mrs. N. B., Oskaloosa, Iowa; B. C. K., Plainville, Conn.; Mrs. D. S., Crestline, Ohio; Miss C. E. S., El Reno, Okla.; D. R., Washington, D. C.; M. M. F. Coatsville, Pa.; P. E., Glens Falls, N. Y.; Mrs. A. F. B., DePere, Wis.; V. S., Long Beach, Calif.; Mrs. A. A. P.; D. W. B.; Mrs. E. M.; Mrs. H. I. R.; E. M.; J. F. W.; Mrs. C. O. H.; A Reader; Mrs. E. O. B.; Mrs. M. S.; E. M.; F. L.; M. B. S.; M. R. D.; M. K.; E. M. W., Philadelphia.

Mrs. N. W. S. urges renewed prayer for a request that has not yet been granted. W. K. writes begging all members of the Prayer League to pray earnestly that she may be led to Christ through his grace. She writes: "I have been an unbeliever, but from the bottom of my heart wish to be a Christian." The way is short and easy for a soul so earnest. She has but to stretch out her hand to find the Saviour near with his infinite and never failing compassion.

A sad letter comes from a mother who fears that her little four-and-a-half-year-old boy may not learn to talk. The removal of fear and doubt from this mother's heart will do much to encourage the boy to make the effort of speech. Let us remember her especially in our prayers, and also her husband, for whom she asks prayer that he may be spiritually blessed. Mrs. M. A. W. asks prayer for her little granddaughter, eight years old, may be cured of severe throat trouble which makes her breathing labored and painful.

A heart-broken wife writes: "Will you pray for me in my time of trouble? After years of constant service and sacrifice my husband has tired of me, broken up our home and cast me adrift without means. Oh, pray that God will touch his heart and that we may be reunited." Mrs. L. B. C. writes: "My heart is broken over the waywardness of an only son. Won't you pray very definitely for his deliverance from strong drink and his conversion?" A subscriber, who signs herself "Margaret," repeats requests for prayer that three sons may be drawn very near the heart of Christ and that one who is out of the church may be converted, that her own sight and the sight of dear ones be restored, a friend rescued from strong drink, and that she herself may know that she is a child of God. Faith will bring quickly the answer to this last prayer, and the answers to the others may follow soon when once she has ceased to doubt her own acceptance. Remember: "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out."

Mrs. H. S. M. requests prayer for revival in a church at Worthington Springs, Fla.; Mrs. M. M. M. for a revival of Pentecostal power in a church near Leggett, Tex.; Mrs. J. W. S., for a general spiritual awakening in Chicago. Mrs. O. N. E. V., for a revival in church and Sunday school at Dauphin Island, Ala.; Mrs. W. T. S., that a Sunday school at Macunzie, Pa., may be built up; F. B. C. for a revival at Bernie, Mo.

The following friends ask prayer for assurance of sins forgiven, a deeper work of grace, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing:

METZ "22"

Introducing the New Fore Door Model
Stream Line Body, Plate Glass Rain-Vision Wind Shield
The Ideal Car for Cross Country Driving or City Use

$495 Equipped Complete

Big, roomy seats, with thick, tufted upholstery and deep cushions, built for luxurious comfort.

Four-cylinder 22½ H. P. water-cooled motor, Bosch high tension magneto, Prest-O-Lite tank, best quality Goodrich clincher tires.

Fore doors of liberal dimensions, 20 inches wide.

Gearless transmission—the kind that won the Glidden Tour.

The METZ "22" is the most compactly built car in the world, and is extremely economical in operation and upkeep. METZ owners travel 28 to 32 miles on 1 gallon of gasoline, 100 miles on 1 pint of lubricating oil, and 10,000 to 12,000 miles on a single set of tires. It makes 50 miles per hour, and at hill-climbing is uusurpassed. Its engine develops more horsepower per 100 pounds of weight than any of the big touring cars, and its gearless transmission does away entirely with gear trouble. It is easy to drive and easy to take care of; and it costs so little to buy it, and so little to run it, that it combines in greatest degree absolute economy with absolute luxury.

The METZ "22," in open competition with cars of all makes and prices, won the last Glidden Tour, from Minneapolis, Minn., to Glacier National Park, Mont., the three METZ cars being the only cars that held perfect scores, without time extension or additional allowance of any kind, for the entire eight days of the contest. The METZ cars were the lowest priced cars in the tour, and they were the only cars in it that were equipped with gearless transmission.

Mr. Charles H. Metz has been building cars of this type and developing their perfection, sixteen years. As a result the METZ "22" is today the most practical car on the market, regardless of price, horsepower, or any other qualification.

WORLD CONGRESS OF SALVATIONISTS

THE third International Congress of the Salvation Army opened in Royal Albert Hall, London, June 11, with a demonstration such as even that great body of enthusiastic workers can seldom witness. The decorations of the Peace Centenary Ball, held the night before, were still in ...e and added to the picturesqueness of the gathering with its own waving ...ers and groups of delegations from many lands, often in native costume. ...sed bands led the wonderful choruses of singing, and with the one excep... of the moments spent in tribute to the delegates lost on the Empress of ...nd, the whole Congress was in a state of intense elation.

...bert Hall, in which the first and last sessions of the Congress were held, is ...of the greatest auditoriums in the world, and is pronounced ideal for such purposes as this. It is in circular form, with three tiers of boxes and two galleries. Its twenty entrances were thronged before six o'clock on the first evening, and the streets leading to it were filled with processions of people all headed one way. Needless to say, the immense house was filled. It took an hour and a half, after General and Mrs. Bramwell Booth mounted the platform, for the bodies of delegates to make their entrance and pass in review before the general with salutes according to their nationalities, and take their seats. The scene was thrilling in the extreme. The enthusiasm was that of the reunion of a great army returned from victorious wars. Every company of delegates received its meed of welcome. There were 700 from the United States, and possibly as the strains of the "Star-Spangled Banner" were heard and this huge delegation, led by Commander Evangeline C. Booth, marched toward the dais, it received the greatest outburst of cheering accorded any country. The entrance of the remnant of the Canadian delegation was marked by silence broken only by the sound of sobs.

In his opening address at this great meeting in the history of the Salvation Army, General Bramwell Booth, son of the founder, William Booth, read messages from the king, from President Wilson, from the prime minister of England, the lord mayor of London and others, including the governor-general of Korea. The messages of the British monarch and the President of the United States were as follows:

KING GEORGE'S MESSAGE

I join in the welcome which your International Congress will receive, and I hope you may have a successful series of gatherings. I have for many years watched with deep interest your work for the people, especially for the less fortunate citizens of the empire. I think that the work is carried on with great ability and with much self-sacrifice and unselfish zeal. I trust that it will go forward in all parts of the world, and that the blessing of God will continue to rest upon you.

THE PRESIDENT'S SYMPATHY

Sympathizing with the Salvation Army in its efforts to succor the weak and erring, I desire on this occasion of the gathering at London of its representatives from all parts of the world, to give expression to my good-will toward the organization and to my recognition of the great good that has resulted from its evangelistic and philanthropic work. The American people are deeply distressed that your meeting opens under the shadow of a great grief in the tragic death of so many of your brave fellow members, and I express on behalf of my fellow citizens and in my own name sincere and heartfelt sympathy.

This was the great welcome meeting of the Congress. The concluding assembly, June 26, also took place in Albert Hall, and on the days between an extensive program of events was arranged to take place in six other large public buildings and also in ten other cities, under the leadership of the various commissioners and other officers.

The last international congress occurred in 1904. At that time General William Booth was still living, and in his address gave the following account of the origin of the Salvation Army:

"I walked back to our West-End home and said to my wife: 'O Kate, I have found my destiny! These are the people for whose salvation I have been longing all these years. As I passed by the doors of the flaming gin-palaces to-night I seemed to hear a voice sounding in my ears, "Where can you go and find such heathen as these, and where is there so great a need for your labors?" And there and then in my soul I offered myself and you and the children up to this great work. Those people shall be our people, and they shall have our God for their God.'"

To-day the movement is world-wide. It speaks in twenty-five languages to the poor and the outcast of fifty-eight countries and colonies. Nearly 9,500 corps and outposts are located throughout the world. Its constituency is numbered by the million.

The Salvation Army International Hall on the Strand was dedicated on Friday afternoon, June 12, the second day of the Congress, with a "Concourse of Nations." The singing at that meeting was wonderful. In the evening representatives of many nations were introduced to the assembly. American songs sung one after the other at the close of the evening meeting aroused great enthusiasm.

On the Saturday following a gigantic parade took place over a

Questions and Answers

B. L., Dayton, Ohio. Can one be a true Christian and yet have a monotonous experience, year after year, without any special evidence of growth in grace or progress in the spiritual life? This is my individual case, yet I feel that I should be at work for Christ.

Such an experience as you describe may, and doubtless often does, happen in the case of those who, though sincere believers at heart, have never taken the first step toward those Christian activities which are the road to spiritual growth and development. Going to church is only a part of the Christian's duty. Having found the truth himself, he should strive earnestly to give it to others. There are many ways in which he can do service. By kindness and upright example; by quiet, unostentatious charity, seeking out the needy who are to be found in almost every community; by visiting the sick, the prisoners, the shut-ins; by reading to the aged and infirm; by taking an interest in missions, and, last but not least, by striving, in tactful and kindly ways, to arouse the same spiritual desire you feel in your own heart, in the hearts of your church fellows. Many a Christian makes an excellent team worker who cannot work well alone. Take the minister into your confidence. Tell him to help you to "get busy." If you feel led that way, connect with some Gospel mission and get right into the work. Don't hesitate to confess Christ at every fitting opportunity; it will strengthen you and give you confidence. Ask the Lord to open the way and to give you equipment and the power to reach the hearts of men and lead them to the cross. Ask in Jesus' name, nothing doubting, and you will receive. Do not be overambitious at the outset. Take the humblest opportunity that offers and make the most of it, and hope for better things. Once entered in that service, whatever talents you may possess will be in no danger of rusting through idleness.

L. H., Virginia, Ill. In Eccles. 10: 15—"the labor of the foolish," etc.—the meaning conveyed is that while even the wise cannot foresee the future (see preceding verse), the fool is altogether in the dark concerning spiritual things; he has no capacity for them and his indifference and obtuseness are tiresome even to the patient ones. "He knoweth not how to go to the city" is a phrase which has a parallel in some of our current modern expressions—as of one of whom it is said: "He doesn't know his way about." It means that he is so unenlightened, his whole life so gross and sordid, that he is ignorant of the most ordinary matters and has no conception of the spiritual.

R. W. X. The name of God is to be spoken with reverence and never lightly or flippantly; it is not to be uttered heedlessly, but to be held as sacred and holy and above all other names. Far less is it to come from the lips in boastfulness, or in profanity and cursing. There is an added emphasis in the second clause of the commandment: "for the Lord shall not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain." The profane, the vulgar, the swearer and the blasphemer are here warned of the wickedness of their ways, and of the certainty that they will be called to account for using the name of God "in vain." In a certain sense, too, those who, while praying with their lips, yet cling to sin with their hearts, may be guilty of violating the commandment; but we should be careful not to judge others in such cases, leaving judgment to Him who knoweth the hearts of men.

E. R. N., Cambridge, Md. 1. There are many things in Scripture concerning which authorities differ and the interpretation of Rev. 13: 18 is one of these. Some have held that the mark of the beast was the brand of the ivy leaf with which Antiochus Epiphanes branded the Jews; others interpret it as the sign of popery and point out that the Greek letters of the word "Lateinos" contain the mystical number 666. Still others believe that the mark or sign was that of Balaam, the false prophet. Again, there are not a few who hold that the "mark" may not be a visible one, but something symbolical of allegiance. 2. It is useless to speculate on the degrees of punishment. The duty of Christians here is to get right with God through Jesus Christ, and to endeavor to bring others into the kingdom. The parable of the unjust steward has already been explained in the Mail-Bag. The application (Luke 16: 7, 8, 9) is not to be regarded as a commendation of the steward's wickedness. The point is that worldly people often show more wisdom, energy and discernment in their worldly affairs than the children of light do in their spiritual affairs, and take greater pains to secure desired results. See the latter clause of verse 8. The passage in verse 9 relating to the mammon of unrighteousness is better translated "turn to our own advantage." Money is to be used as a trust for the glory of God; it is never to be abused or idolized. 3. The use of the plural in Gen. 1: 26 is the prerogative of divine majesty. It is the triune God who speaks.

E. C. G., North Carolina. 1. "Huguenot" was "originally a nickname applied to partisans of the Reformation in France," writes an authority. Some derive it from huguon, a word used in Touraine to describe persons who walk in the streets after dark. The early French Protestants chose the nighttime for their religious gatherings. There are other explanations, but none uthoritative. 2. There is nothing to indicate Justin Martyr's belief on the point you mention. 3. Ignatius is said to have been a disciple of St. John. He became nominal bishop of Antioch by the laying on of apostolic hands. When Trajan began to persecute the Christian church Ignatius, eager to protect his flock, offered himself as a victim. Trajan accepted the offer, met him, conferred with him, and it does not seem that the hard-hearted ruler was touched, for Ignatius was flung to the lions in the Roman amphitheater on a feast day. Such is the account given in the book entitled Martyrius Ignatii.

J. A. H., Chester, S. C. Jesus' words: "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do," were spoken as his executioners were completing their dread task. But the prayer was not limited to them alone, but included all who had a hand in it, for the apostle could afterward say with truth, "had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of Glory." In a still wider sense, the prayer was a fulfilment of the Messianic prediction in Isa. 53: 12. The world, in every age, owes much to these few words. We have no right to question the validity of Jesus' prayer, that what these fanatical and misguided men did in their ignorance and anger should not be laid to their charge in the final account.

R. B., Waco, Texas. In round numbers there are 300,000 Indians in the United States. They are mostly in reservations scattered throughout twenty-six States and having a combined area of almost 100,000 square miles. The fund to maintain these reservations aggregates annually $85,000,000, of which sum $62,000,000 belong to the tribes and $13,000,000 to individual Indians.

H. A. S., Grand Rapids, Mich. Commentators point out that the passage in Ex. 20: 11 does not specifically declare how long a period of time elapsed before the "sixth day," but rather emphasizes the fact that nothing was done after the sixth day, the great task being then completed. As to the time occupied in the work of creation, there are wide differences of opinion, some still holding to the literal interpretation, while others point to the fact that the word "day" in Scripture has various meanings, as in the "day of the Lord," the "day of vengeance," the day that is "as a thousand years in his sight," etc. The conflicting views on the time occupied in creation make it a subject of acute controversy, with little prospect of agreement.

L. G. L., St. Louis, Mo., writes: "In the Mail-Bag (issue of April 15) 'Reader, El Reno, Okla.,' asks whether there is any authentic astronomical account of the star that guided the Wise Men to the Babe in Bethlehem. May I point out that in the very nature of the events, as described in Matt. 2, the star could not have been a natural one. If one will read the account carefully, he will see that the star was first seen in the East, then after they came to Jerusalem and had learned from Herod that the Messiah was to be born at Bethlehem, the star reappeared when they left the king and 'went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was.' In the above account it is quite apparent the star proved not only to be a g[uide], but came and stood over where the y[oung] child was—something that could not be [ex]icated of a physical star. I have learne[d] think of the 'star' as a band of angels, from a distance shine or appear like a [fire]. For, are we not taught in the Word in [Heb.] 12: 3, 'They that be wise shall shine as [the] brightness of the firmament'? And do we [not] read in Rev. 1 that 'the seven stars are [the] angels of the seven churches'? The 'star' [or] that guided the wise men may have been [an] angelic society, for the Lord uses angel[s as] his messengers." We recall a similar thou[ght] suggested in a sermon by Dr. Talmage [many] years ago.

J. Irvin Taylor, Chester, Pa., writes: [Re]cently when out riding with a gentleman [of] the seventies, he told me he never went to [bed] at night without adding to his prayers [the] prayer familiar to most of us in childhood, 'Now I lay me down to sleep.' The thought came to me, Why not have a morning prayer? They are certainly Christian helps, when [go]ing with the heart's accord. A few morn[ings] afterward these lines came to my mind:

"Now I wake me from my sleep,
Help me, Lord, thy will to keep,
Make me noble, good and strong,
And protect me from all wrong."

J. K., Selma, Miss. 1. No answer is possible to your first question. 2. The "God of the living and not of the dead"—the passage to which you refer—is interpreted, in its reference to the patriarchs, to mean that their spirits survived, although their bodies rested in the grave. It is one of the earliest divine assurances of a life hereafter found in the Scriptures. 3. Jesus is Mediator, Intercessor and Saviour. He pleads for us, and if we sincerely repent, accept him as our Saviour, and pray in his name for forgiveness, our prayers are heard and answered. 4. In John 19: 23, 24 it is related that the soldiers took the Saviour's garments, including a seamless robe, for which they cast lots rather than rend it. The garments worn by his resurrection body are not described in the Gospels.

Mary Tucker White, Manchester, N. H., sends this little verse, which may prove helpful to some one in trouble:

ASK and it shall be given.
God's promises avail.
SEEK, though the time thou spendest
Seems lost and efforts fail.
KNOCK and the door shall open.
Persistence shall prevail.

MY FLOWER

BY ELEANOR DUNCAN WOOD

ALL day long I had worked and worried,
Too sad for solace, too tired for thought.
Under life's crushing burdens buried
I had spent my strength and my brain for naught.
I dropped my head on my hands, despairing,
Vanished my future's golden gleams;
Conquered, bitter, and no one caring,
Was this the end of all my dreams?

Close to my side in the lengthening shadows
Crept my beautiful five-year-old,
Flushed with play in the flowering meadows,
Head like a nodding marigold.
Voice of the wood-thrush in the clover:
"Does big folks get tired and s'eepy, too?
Look at ze rose I bringed you, muvver,
Pretty and sweet. It's dus' like you."

Quick to my desolate heart I strained him.
He had known no shadow his whole life long.
He should know none now. The soul that trained him
Should wring from sorrow his evensong.
He had given me love and a rose. O Father,
Though my dream had faded, my eyes were dim,
I would not fail him. Lord help me rather
To give the rose of my life to him.

And when comes that day of all dole to mothers
I shall gird on my young knight's stainless sword;
He shall strike for the right and for men—his brothers,
Let him strongly win, where I failed, dear Lord.
And alone, afar, where no banners glisten,
I shall know my dreams have at last come true.
Bend low o'er my heart's fair flower, and listen!
I will give my all. Let him bloom for you.

WHAT WE ARE DOING FOR VERA CRUZ

BY CHAPLAIN T. B. THOMPSON, U. S. S. "VERMONT"

WE ARE all more or less acquainted with the accomplishments of the American forces in Vera Cruz, but from a humanitarian point of view it may be helpful to e some of the sympathetic work that has been e by our forces since our occupation of the city. first thing that impresses one is the establment of order, and the quiet running the city administration. This is due to enforcement of just and proper laws. It have been largely from a sense of fear t the inhabitants first met our demands; the most ignorant is soon apprised of the of justice and equality before the law; as this has been the guiding principle e, as it is at home, it was easy to establish and order throughout the city. It may expressed as a reasonable doubt if Vera z has ever experienced such an ideal civic e as now exists, by the use of the courts police agencies, under the supervision of American forces. Unquestionably a corating influence is the example of the y and navy personnel in general.

he second thing that impresses one is the aned up" city, and the absence of foul rs which were formerly common. The nsing of the city and the establishment of itary laws is one of the great achievents in the interests of the people. This was mplished in a remarkably short time. In e places dirt accumulations of years were oved; in others, holes had to be filled to lish pools of filthy, stagnant water, which e common and furnished breeding places mosquitoes. Some of the streets were repaired h fine stone and gravel, and in a few places e permanent material was used. But it was essary to go further than the ground surface h this kind of work. Rules and regulations cting public markets, hotels, shops, restaurants, dwellings had to be promulgated. All public es are cleaned regularly, and garbage receples are required in restaurants, hotels and pri- homes. These are emptied by the garbage-, who hauls it away and burns it, or disposes of some satisfactory way. The buzzards and vules that formerly performed this act of sanita are looking on with apparent disgust at the erican and his ways, as do many of the inhabits.

he labor situation of Vera Cruz presents no cial problem as yet; but in maintaining the artments of city administration, and in furing employment to competent and willing abitants, an excellent piece of work has been e. At first, many of the inhabitants were sured to see the sailors and soldiers actually perming manual labor; however, some of the onters have been put to work, and no doubt those disdained honest labor before are now finding greeable and profitable. The presence of some nty-five thousand men of the army and navy in around Vera Cruz has added to the demands of or in stores, shops, hotels and restaurants.

he release of the political prisoners and the nane treatment of the criminals in the federal son and city jails are among the humanitarian ults of our occupation. For centuries the fortress of San Juan de Ulua has been dreaded by all who were not in sympathy with the ruling power in Mexico. Investigation reveals the fact that some died and rotted in their cells; many were political prisoners, incarcerated because of their disloyalty to the political party in power; while some were real criminals, justly committed for their deeds. This prison, reeking with filth, dampness and misery, is now empty for the first time in more than a hundred years, the majority of its prisoners having been liberated. Acknowledged criminals have been held, but removed to quarters more fit for a human being. In this work, Professor Carlos V. Cusachs, professor of mathematics in the United States Navy, was invaluable, and without his assistance as an expert interpreter, a just and proper separation of the prisoners would hardly have been possible.

PRINCIPAL STREET IN VERA CRUZ BEFORE CLEAN-UP

A commendable work along ethical and moral lines has been the abolition of the bullfights, the lottery, and the gaming-wheels. The city is to be congratulated that these demoralizing influences of the grosser sort have been done away with. Little by little the people may be educated to a higher ethical and moral standard. It will take a long time to lead them from the card-table, the roulette wheel, the lottery system, the game fight and the bull ring; but if American occupation continues, we may look for the passing of these old marks of barbarity and savage lust, and find substituted for them the cleaner and more wholesome sports, such as set forth American ideals. Vera Cruz, like other cities, has its "open sores" of dissipation and social vice. When these shall be done away with, or cured, is hard to predict. As long as the income from any business or trade is regarded as of more consequence than the lives of the men and women involved in keeping it going, we cannot expect to cure the running sores of any city from the bottom. We can, however, depend on the American forces to do all in their power toward establishing the best and safest method of handling this situation.

The city also has its poor and neglected: Much has been done by the army in serving out rations to the hungry, while the Red Cross Society has not been slow to see its opportunities for relief. Up to the present time, no organization among the Mexicans has been started for the relief of their own people, but it is hoped that a step will be taken soon in this direction.

The educational interests of the city were for a short time disturbed; but shortly after the army assumed control, the schools were reopened and are now operated as nearly as possible as they were before our occupation. It would seem that some reform might be expected in this field also, should our stay be of long duration.

The health of the soldiers and sailors has been exceptional, and few have suffered acutely from the heat. The general strain of the service and the climate may be felt later by some, but for the most part up to the present time there has been no reason for fear or alarm. Friends in the United States can find consolation in the fact that all the needs of the men are supplied by the government, and every attention is given to the health and comfort of the army and navy personnel in and around Vera Cruz.

AMERICAN OUTPOST GUARDING APPROACH TO VERA CRUZ

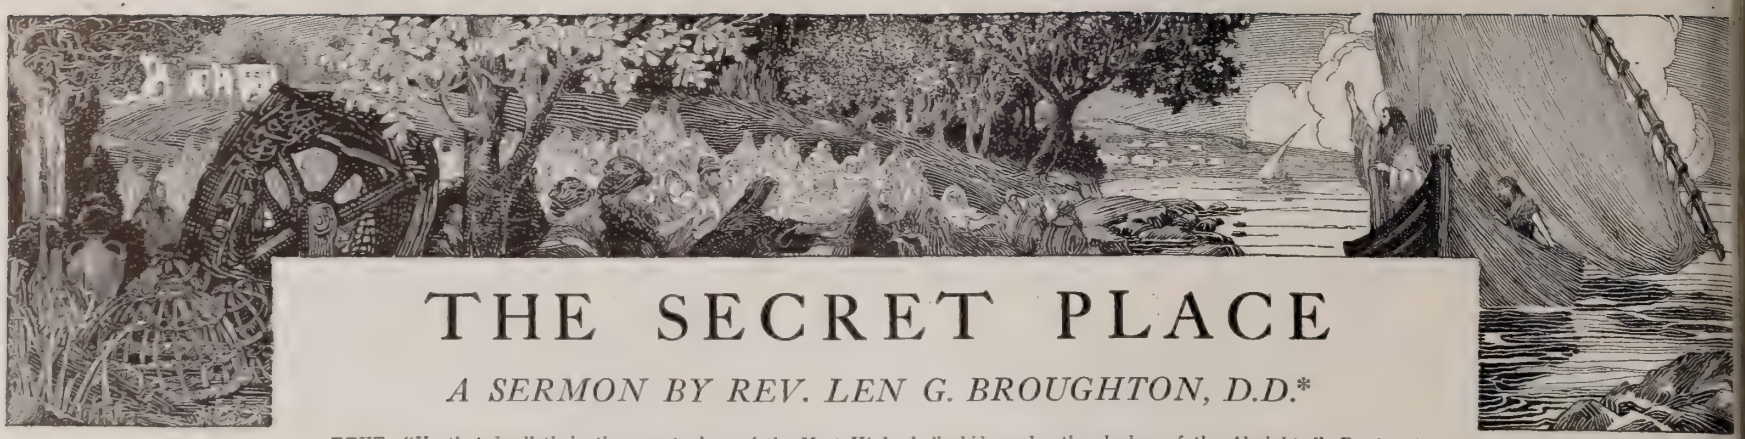
rse two miles long through the heart of London, m the Thames Embankment to Hyde Park. The turned out en masse to witness this historic ctacle, when the Salvationists marched between shing throngs of cheering people. Twenty simaneous meetings in the park were attended by usands.

The English public took a great deal of interest all the proceedings. The uniform of the army l the distinguishing insignia on the costumes of ive-dressed delegates marked the wearers for sideration wherever they went. General Bramll Booth was received in special audience by the g, who, according to General Booth's account the interview, displayed deep interest in the vement and considerable acquaintance with the rk and objects of the Salvation Army. As a ther mark of his interest in the organization g George received Colonel Unsworth, a staff cer who accompanied General Booth on the visit the palace.

Almost the entire Salvation Army field was repented at the Congress. The delegates from at we generally speak of as strange lands conuted largely to the entertainment at the meetings by doing things quite ordinary to them, but extremely novel to their audiences, a party of converted Zulus, for example, giving a war-dance. Some of these delegations prostrated themselves before General Booth, as the custom is in their countries when approaching greatness. The delegates from India performed upon native musical instruments, including tomtoms and bells. On the hatbands of the delegates from Iceland appeared their spelling of Salvation Army, Hjalpraedisherinn. In this delegation and others were men of civic official rank in their own countries. Many were converts from heathen religions. This remarkable commingling of the nations of the world in a common event strongly emphasized the extensiveness of the Salvation Army work and its universal appeal.

Commander Eva Booth in her address at the welcome meeting aroused the vast audience to a tremendous outburst of enthusiasm by the following peroration: "General, we come with our flag! Americans are a patriotic people; the Stars and Stripes, whether it flies from the White House in Washington or the farthest homestead in the city suburb, fires the forces and thrills the being of the true American; but the flag to which I refer, the flag that is dearest to my heart, and the flag that is dearest to the hearts of my people, is the Salvation Army blood-and-fire flag.

"In the fold of that banner are wrapped the flags of all nations; upturned to the flutter of that wave are the faces of all colors; and in the story of that banner are the nations of all tongues; and enlisted among the lives that contend for the claims of that flag are the races of all people, and though we are an army separated from each other by wide stretches of railway and sea, and seldom look upon each other's faces and hear each other's voices, wrapped in the folds of the blood-and-fire flag are our hearts all together, and that is the flag that is dearest to us. It is in the love of that flag that we are here to-night, and through this Congress we expect to have that love deepened. These are the bonds which bind us, and through this Congress we expect them to be strengthened. This is the faith—faith in the story of that flag held all round the world, the story to which our confidence, our trust, our faith is nailed; the greatest fact of all history—the Lamb of God dying for the transgressions of the whole world."



THE SECRET PLACE

*A SERMON BY REV. LEN G. BROUGHTON, D.D.

TEXT: "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty." Ps. 91: 1

THERE is no part of the ninety-first Psalm that can be properly considered without considering the whole, and I am glad that we have for our consideration so large a section, for it is so very simple. It is simple enough for any child to understand. Though we take the first verse for our text, really the whole psalm forces itself upon us. From beginning to end the psalmist is giving us his experience in "the shadow of the Almighty." It was not enough for the psalmist to have thrones and armies about him. He had tried all the experiences in the ways of the world, and he had found that none of them in times of trouble sufficed. He had also had experience in the ways of God, "abiding in the shadow of the Almighty"; and he had found that this experience was the one thing that he could rely upon when all the rest of the experiences of his life failed him. He gives us here a testimony of how he had found life "dwelling in the secret place of the Most High."

To start with he gives us in this first verse the setting for his experience: "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty." You will observe in the first part the condition that he gives: "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High." It is a striking fact that every promise in the Bible is based upon conditions. Only the obedient can claim God's guidance in life. The sheep that strays away from the shepherd can expect only his own strength when danger comes. The Father loves the prodigal at the swine trough, but he feeds him at home. The children are ever wanted in the Father's presence. The Christian that eats husks with the swine surrenders the fatted calf with the Father. Esau lost his birthright because he sought something else. David lost his peace because he sought his pleasure. To say "I will have my way and walk with God" is equivalent to saying, "God will have his way and we will walk alone." It is not enough for us "to stand on the promises," as we sometimes sing; we must also comply with the promises. So the psalmist, speaking of these rich promises, conditions every one of them upon "dwelling in the secret place of the Most High."

God Our Refuge

Next I want us to note the result that comes from this "dwelling." First of all there is here the promise of "abiding under the shadow of the Almighty." Properly considered this is one of the most far-reaching of all the promises that we find in Scripture. In order to see its far-reachingness we must take into consideration the whole psalm.

Here we find in the first place the promise of refuge and fortification. "I will say of the Lord, he is my refuge and my fortress." "He is my refuge." I have seen a picture of a shepherd with a drawn sword in his hand, while a lamb crouches at his feet and looks up into his face. Just out in front of the shepherd with his drawn sword is a wolf. The thought, evidently, is that of a lamb being pursued by a wolf until he sees his shepherd guard and keeper and falls restfully, confidently, and trustfully at his feet, while the shepherd with his sword drives back the wolf. So David had come to that experience where to him God his Father was his guardian Shepherd, the One to whom he could go when his soul was tried, and when temptation was hard after him; he had found that God was the Shepherd with the drawn sword, where he could find perfect rest and refuge.

You will see also that there is the promise here of fortification. "He is my fortress." I do not know if you know the difference between a fort and a fortress. It is very significant that it is not said here, "He is my 'fort,'" but " my 'fortress.'"

Some years ago in considering this psalm I became puzzled to know what the psalmist had in mind by the use of the word "fortress." I went to my dictionary to find the difference between "fort" and "fortress," and the difference there defined was so slight as to be scarcely worth noticing. And yet in talking with soldiers and army people I noticed that they made a difference, never speaking of a "fort" as a "fortress," or of a "fortress" as a "fort." So one day I went to an old army general and said, "I am puzzled to know the difference between a 'fort' and a 'fortress.' I have gone to the dictionary and it seems no wiser than I." I said, "First of all, is there any difference?" He said, "Of course. A fort is a fort." "Yes," I said, "a very good definition, like I expected!" He said, "Hold on a bit. A 'fort' is one 'fort,' but a 'fortress' is two or more 'forts.'" I came back to the ninety-first Psalm with an entirely new light upon its meaning, and I read in it what I had not seen before. "He is my 'fortress'"—God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Spirit, a trinity of forts so placed at every angle as to protect me against the approach of the enemy, and to defend me when the enemy does make an approach.

All Fear Dispelled

To whom is God a triune fortress? He is a fortress to the man who "dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High." I remembered this just recently when I was at Gibraltar. Standing there, looking upon that great rock, I observed that there were fortresses at each end—the Atlantic and the Mediterranean end—arranged in triangular form at the base, and at each side at the places of danger on the right and on the left. Fronting the Mediterranean there is a fortress which protects the rock from the sea, from the strait on the right, and at the other angle from the bay. There is also a similar arrangement at the Atlantic end of the fortress of Gibraltar. There it is, that great solid rock with those many forts making its great fortress impregnable. So is God to the man who "dwells in the secret place." On the Mediterranean side of that great rock and fortress there is a little fishing village inhabited only by fishermen. They carry on their vocation under the shadow of that great rock, scarcely ever having the sun to shine upon their little habitation. But oh, how secure they are in the shadow of that rock, nestling in the cliffs! No enemy could approach them; all the guns of that fort would protect them. And, my friends, they are not more secure, nestling under the shadow of Gibraltar, than are we if we nestle under the shadow of God Almighty.

Then, as we read further, we see that there is trust in "the shadow of the Almighty." "In whom I trust." It is only the man who abides under the shadow of the Almighty who knows God well enough to trust him.

There is a story told of a man who was being tried for treason after the war between the States. They were about to convict him, when there was brought in an old slave who had lived with him for many a year, and been his closest companion in many respects. The old slave was put in the witness-box, and the attorney began to ply him with questions. Finally, the old slave raised himself up and said, "If you had lived with my master like I have you wouldn't talk like that." And it is the man who lives closest to God, who is his daily companion, who knows God. When I hear men speaking lightly of God and his rule, and profanely of his will and reign, I feel like replying in the words of that old slave, and saying, "If you had lived with Him as I have," poor specimen that I am, "you wouldn't talk like that; you would know him." It is only the man who lives with him, and talks with him, and hears him talk and sees him work, that is able to trust him. So David, out of the experience he had, said, "In the shadow of the Almighty there is trust. I will put my trust in him."

Again, there is in the next place deliverance. "Surely," he says, "he shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, and from the noisome pestilence."

I had a man in my church in Atlanta who was, before he professed conversion, a great drunkard and gambler. And after he was converted the taste for strong drink dogged him day and night so that he was not able to get rest for it. He had resolved not to touch it, but ofttimes it looked as if his resolve would fail him and he would have to go back to it. He tried this and that, but nothing took that thirst for drink, that awful craving tha at times almost made him mad, away from hin Finally, he went into his room and got down on h face and, as I have often heard him say, hande his appetite over to God. He said something lik this: "If you are not able to take this appetite awa you are not able to save my soul; and if I can trus you with my soul, I can trust you with my appe tite: take it." He came out of that experience wit never another thirst until this day.

This is exactly what David is talking about. "H who abides under the shadow of the Almighty" ca rely upon him to be his deliverer from all that woul destroy him.

In the next place you see that in his deliveranc there is comfort. "He shall cover thee with hi pinions, and under his wings shalt thou take refuge his truth shall be thy shield and buckler." Here i something every child can understand. The figur is that of a mother-hen gathering her chickens ur der her wing. All of us doubtless have seen tha The very thought of it takes me back to the days o childhood. Out in the country district where w lived how often have I seen a group of mother-hen with their chicks in the field! And when som shadow appeared that looked like the figure of hawk, I have seen those different chicks run t their respective mothers; never one of them mad a mistake, every one finally lying under the wing o his own mother. No one needed to be there t point out to them the mother to whom they be longed, but every one perfectly adjusted himself t his respective place. Then I have seen her as sh nestles the chicks to herself, getting as low as sh can on the ground, even getting her head down s as to make it impossible for the hawk to locate her Oh, how simple and beautiful is this picture: "H shall cover thee with his pinions, and under hi wings shalt thou trust." The old mother-hen cover her chicks under her wings in time of danger, t protect them from exposure, to impart to them th warmth of her body, to rest them from their labors and give them required sleep. In all these respect God our Father proposes to protect us under hi wings.

Strength Renewed Day by Day

As we read further in the psalm we see that i the shadow of the Almighty there is courage "Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night nor for the arrow that flieth by day, for the pesti lence that walketh in darkness, nor for the destruc tion that wasteth at noonday." Courage! If ther is anything the church seems to need more tha another it is this courage. We have come to th place where we are so discouraged and beset wit clouds that we need courage. We are almost to day in the position of the apostle Peter, when h sat there while Jesus was being tried and swore h never knew him. Afraid to stand up for our color and declare our faith! Would to God we could b in the position of Peter when, endued by the Holy Ghost, he stood before the very people to whom h had denied his Lord and declared unto them th secrets of our religion! We need courage in thes days of ours, and there is nothing that can give th Church of Christ the courage it needs but the con sciousness of the fact that God is on our side. Oh to feel the presence of God, that we are over shadowed by him, makes us courageous, and strong and invincible!

Yet again, there is conquest. "A thousand shal fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand but it shall not come nigh thee." In the first part of the psalm the Lord is fighting our battles for us; in the remaining part of the psalm the figure changes, and we are engaged with him in fighting his battles, and here we have promise of sure victory.

There is another story in connection with our Civil War that I desire to draw your attention to In one of the severest battles during that terrible war, a battle in which the Northern army outnumbered the Southern army by three to one, and it was not to be expected that the men of the South would be victorious, yet after three days and nights

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, July 12. Matthew 8: 3. "I will; be thou clean." From our study of the remarkable teaching of Jesus, Matthew leads us on to a study of remarkable acts of Christ. With the multitude who were astonished at his doctrine and followed him down the mountain, we mingle in spirit, to have our admiration for the Lord and our faith in him increased. It was a bold act of the leper, a social outcast, to approach so closely to Jesus. And it was a bold act for Jesus to touch the leper, for thereby Jesus became ceremonially unclean. But the leper's faith shames ours. What could he have heard of Jesus to conceive in his heart the confidence which he expresses by his humble petition? Very little indeed, considering his isolation. Jesus' reply is prompt. Brief is the leper's call, and swiftly comes the echo: "I will." Jesus has a personal will which he exercises in sovereign fashion. With a word he not only cures the outcast of his loathsome disease, but restores him to his full rights in the society of men. Leprosy is throughout Scripture an emblem of sin. It exhibits sin in its polluting, contaminating, defiling effects. "Lord, make me clean, if thou wilt; for thou canst, and I know that thou wilt!"—that is our daily plaint amid the corruptions of our flesh.

MONDAY, July 13. Mark 1: 44. "See thou say nothing to any man: but go thy way, shew thyself to the priest, and offer for thy cleansing those things which Moses commanded, for a testimony unto them." This charge of the Lord to the cured leper may have been intended to keep from Jesus the gaping crowds, and to permit him to pursue his work quietly. But it also secured the leper against the spiritual danger of making himself very important to his townsmen by displaying his cure, and possibly against the danger of having the validity of his cure questioned by the already hostile priests, if they had learned prematurely that it was Christ who had effected the cure. But this charge also corroborates the assertion of Christ that he was not come to destroy the law. He insists on every tittle even of the ceremonial law "for a testimony against them." His defamers shall not find cause, in any act of his, to preoccupy the minds of the people with the charge that he is a wanton despiser of the law of God. They themselves must be compelled to acknowledge officially that he has accomplished a deed such as only God could perform, and that he has done a kindness such as only the merciful Messiah could show, for whose coming they were waiting. Jesus can make his very enemies witnesses for his power and goodness.

TUESDAY, July 14. Matthew 8: 7. "I will come and heal him." A believing soldier, a man of high rank, a proud Roman captain—indeed, this is an extraordinary trophy which the Conqueror of the world gains in his campaigns of love. Not only the message which he has sent to the Lord but also every detail of his action bespeaks the centurion's faith. He must have been a very humble man to take such a compassionate interest in a lowly private of his detachment, and to cast to the wind his Roman prejudice, which would have kept him from asking a favor of a despised Jew. And all this in behalf of another! But the answer of Jesus affords food for reflection. Again we note His consciousness of his power. When we pray to Christ, we do not pray to a phantom or to impersonal force, but to a perfect divine-human being, who speaks of going and coming as other men do, and of healing as a foregone conclusion when he has once started to come, as only God can. But must he really come to heal? Read on and discover the purpose of Jesus' offer of a personal visit to the centurion. If his answer had not been given in just this form, we should not have the famous rejoinder of the centurion in our Gospels.

WEDNESDAY, July 15. Matthew 8: 10. "Verily I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel." What are the marks of greatness in the centurion's faith? Surely, a Roman knew the power of authority, especially a Roman army officer. Granted. But how many people know as much and fail to raise their thoughts from the knowledge of human authority to the contemplation of that boundless authority of the All-Powerful, from whom all authority is ultimately derived, and in comparison with whose power even the might of a Cæsar is no more than the superiority of a corporal over his guard? Even among church people this sluggishness appears. Though face to face continually with the marvelous works of God in nature, and with the mighty acts of God in the kingdom of grace, still church people in critical moments fail, alas! too often, in the appreciation of the efficiency of divine help, and actually trust more to human help. Yes, Israel had not produced such heroic faith as was found in this pagan officer. Jesus' astonishment is recorded on different occasions in Scripture, but in every case it is either men's faith or their unbelief that has excited it. Both causes contribute to his marvel in this instance. For by inference he expresses surprise that such faith had not been exhibited as yet by any member of his own race. Has Jesus ever been astonished at us? For which reason?

THURSDAY, July 16. Matthew 8: 11, 12. "And I say unto you, That many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven. But the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." "The children of the kingdom," the members of the true church of God in the days of Christ, had enviable privileges. To them "pertained the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises." To be an Israelite was a great thing indeed. But when the old church became haughty, arrogant, and carnally secure because of its religious and national distinction; when the humble faith of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob had died in the proud church of Jerusalem, God turned away from it. In this text Christ, taking occasion of the faith of the centurion, predicts a reversal of the fortunes of Jews and Gentiles as regards their relation to the God of the covenant of grace. From among the Gentiles, who had been wandering in the wilderness of error and sin, God will gather true children of the kingdom, who will be guests with the saints at the marriage-banquet of the Lamb. "How unsearchable are God's judgments, and his ways past finding out!"

FRIDAY, July 17. Matthew 8: 13. "Go thy way; and as thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee." Luther in one place has this thoughtful remark: "As you believe God to be, so, to you, he is." Believe him an angry God, and your heart will ever be in dread fear of him. Believe him a God who does not care for you, and you will never feel his comforting presence. Believe him a shortsighted and feeble God, and you will not get any counsel or strength from him. But believe him a great, good, wise, holy, merciful and gracious God; believe him the God that was manifest in the flesh in Jesus Christ and who spoke to men by the teaching of his beloved Son, and your faith will draw from him manifestations of those blessed virtues. "As thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee." This word of Jesus, spoken to the sorrowing centurion and to many companions in grief in his day, balances the revelation of God's kindness even with man's believing supplication for that kindness. God never belies the trust reposed in him by his children. We reveal the quality of our faith in him by the things we say of him and to him. "Come, my soul, thy suit prepare, Jesus loves to answer prayer."

SATURDAY, July 18. Luke 7: 13. "Weep not." To weep with them that weep is an approved expression of true Christian sympathy, and God, who puts our tears in his bottle and holds not his peace at the tears of his heart-sore pilgrims in this vale of tears, remembers these heavenly dewdrops of compassion that fall from tender hearts in hours of bitter sorrow. Jesus, too, wept. But God does more for the weeping. He comes to dry their tears, and this word of Jesus to the disconsolate mother at Nain is the introduction of the glorious miracle which turned a funeral cortège, led by sable death, into a triumphal procession headed by the Prince of life. Weep not! Oh, blessed message that we carry to millions who sorrow without a comforter! True, it is meaningless advice when it comes from those who have no hope and can arouse no hope. They may express by it their stoic indifference to grief. But speak this word in Jesus' name, freight it with Gospel meaning, let it point the mourner to him who is the resurrection and the life and who will one day call the captives of Zion to return from their tombs with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads, and you will see that this word still calms troubled hearts as effectually as when Jesus himself uttered it.

e Southerners were victorious. After the vic-ry was over and the men of the North had retired
r counsel, the officers of the army that had reained said one to another, "How do you account
r this victory? We had three to one, a superior my, a perfect field in which to fight." One said e thing, one another. Finally a man arose and id, "I think I know the secret of it." They said, Well, give it." He said, "Those fellows had Jack-n in their midst."

That is the secret of victory in our spiritual
e. That is the secret of victory in all life that ides. You ask me, "How is it that that man and at woman seem to have such spirituality and ex-rience? How is it that that church seems to erride all its difficulties and move straight ahead?
ow is it that that community overcomes its diffilties and marches ahead in the progress of civilization?" How is it? There is but one answer. That man, that woman, that church, that community has God in the midst. When God is in the midst there is no failure.

Finally, the protection of angels. "For he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways. They shall bear thee up in their hands, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone. Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder; the young lion and the serpent shalt thou trample under foot." I remember very well the first time that text ever gripped me; a very, very gracious experience in my life! For more than three months I had been prostrated upon a bed of illness, the result of a long and terrible siege of typhoid fever. When a few friends were allowed to come and speak to me they found me all to bits physically and nervously. I remember a dear friend, one of my intimate associates at that time (a splendid Bible student though not a minister, one of the best Bible students I had up to that time ever known), as he sat by my bed and saw I was so nervous I could hardly lie on the bed, and so overcome by emaciation that it looked like no hope; I can see him now as he leaned over and said, "Don't despair, for 'He shall give his angels charge over thee to keep thee in all thy ways.'" When I was left alone, I could almost feel the presence of the heavenly host. In the valley, and on the mountain top, ministering spirits doing the will of God, often indicating the way of God. Oh, all this is our heritage in "the shadow of the Almighty!"

The Church's Opportunity

OVER in England the leading minds in the church are turning strongly toward economics—the fact being of itself an evidence of the growing conviction that the duty of reconstructing the prevalent ideas about property and wealth has been too long neglected. Dr. Robertson Nicoll reviews the controversy in an instructive article in the British Weekly. He notes the drift of the clerical contributions on the subject, whose eminent writers seem to have covered every phase of the question from the earliest times, treating property in its historic, philosophic and theological aspects. The keynote of the discussion has been sounded by a clergyman, Dr. Bartlett, who strongly urged the consideration of the Bible doctrine of stewardship. He points to the teaching of the ancient Biblical law and the prophets as showing that, while property has the divine sanction, approval is restrained by "a premature insistence on the right of God, the only absolute owner, and the rights of our fellow men, especially the weaker and poorer." Strong in terms is the characterization by another divine, Dr. Gore, on "what we are accustomed to call legitimate insistence upon the rights of property," which he declares "the Old Testament would seem to call the robbery of God and the grinding of the faces of the poor." He advocates "the alteration of conditions by gradual and peaceable means." He would maintain the right of property for use, but not for abuse, nor, as frequently happens, to permit it to work disastrous havoc. Christians ought to face the facts and gird themselves for reform, even if it entails sacrifice.

What has been the attitude of the church in America on this problem of such transcendent importance? Has it been in accord with the teachings of Christ? Or has it been a temporizing attitude, a conservative makeshift for the sake of temporary peace and quietness? For years past THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has taught that the only way of dealing with the question was to go back to Christ and his clear and unmistakable doctrine that all property is a stewardship, and that the extent of our possessions determines the extent of our responsibilities. We have had in recent years much discussion touching the "corporate conscience," the duties and responsibilities of wealth, the rights of labor, etc. Some of our pulpits have been storm centers of controversy, and extreme and even violent utterances have taken the place of calm and temperate discussion. But the time has arrived when the church must frankly face the issue. If the kingdom of God is to be advanced among men, we must inculcate the principles of the Founder, who has defined the duties of wealth as well as its dangers in clear and unequivocal language. We must learn that each class has its duties and that many things which we have regarded as being done in the spirit of charity, while good in themselves and laudable in the doing, would never have been necessary had the social conditions been such as it was our duty to make them. "Harnack," writes Dr. Nicoll, "says that in the economic struggle the church has generally been upon the wrong side." This is a severe arraignment, even if true; but in these enlightening days, when the gravest problems are being openly and frankly discussed, the church is becoming sufficiently awake to its opportunities. Its place in every great moral struggle is at the forefront, as a leader of men, inspiring them individually and collectively to justice and righteousness.

The Mediation Outlook

HOPES of the success of the Peace Conference at Niagara, which received a shock when Carranza refused to participate, have risen again. Waiving their opposition, the Constitutionalists are now represented in the negotiations, informally, but even an informal representation is an important concession at the present stage of the proceedings. There will be no halt in their military campaign. Villa will keep on fighting, but every battle will bring the end measurably nearer. We have had confidence from the beginning in the mediation program, and we have it still. We look forward hopefully to the establishment of a capable provisional government in Mexico, as the outcome of these efforts. The conference is a practical illustration of the Pan-American spirit in action. This would be followed by our withdrawal from Vera Cruz and the formal waiver of an indemnity. The success of mediation would carry to all the Latin-American republics conviction of the reality of our unselfish friendship. It would do more, for it would show that international differences can be settled honorably without resort to war, and that there is such a thing as brotherhood and friendship among the nations of the earth.

The Evangelist's Part

THIS is the season of religious assemblages, when the denominations, great and small, gather as divisions of the grand army of the Cross, to review the past year, encourage each other with the good tidings of the present and make plans for the future. It is a splendid and inspiring thing to observe the strong note of confidence and the signs of substantial progress which have marked all of these gatherings this year. Nor is it material progress merely, for there is a marked advance all along the line, an enlargement of activities and a widening and deepening of spiritual influences everywhere. It has been estimated that the forces of Protestant America at the present moment aggregate over 22,000,000 church members, twice as many adherents, 16,000,000 Sunday school attendants, 2,000,000 superintendents, teachers and officials, 165,000 pastors, 215,000 religious organizations, and 210,000 church edifices, capable of accommodating practically the entire Protestant population. Besides this mighty array, there are many thousands more of faithful Christians, secluded, sick, shut-in, or for various reasons unable to avail themselves of church privileges.

We note, too, that there is a growing tendency to give fuller recognition to the value of evangelism in upbuilding the churches. In the Presbyterian General Assembly, held in Chicago lately, one of the most striking reports presented was that of the evangelistic committee, which showed that in the last year, the confessions of Christ in Presbyterian churches had reached a grand total of 93,000, as against 72,000 the previous year. What proportion of this number of accessions was directly due to the efforts of evangelists laboring in co-operation with the churches is not stated, although it is reasonable to assume that many might be traced to that source. We would wish to see all the great denominational bodies make more emphatic deliverance on evangelism, assigning these faithful laborers their proper place in the activities of the church and assuring them of the warmest and most cordial co-operation by pastors and officials.

Simple Ministries

WE SOMETIMES think that the good old a of anecdotal illustration is neglected in t pulpit in these days of theological controversy a wordy disputation. What power and convicti there are in a sermon that is illuminated with t actual things of daily life! Jesus in his minist made the effective use of the parable and the famili incident a model for Gospel teachers for all tim Many of the great preachers of our own day, who sermons appear in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD fro week to week, enrich their discourses with ane dotal illustrations. Even though drawn from t commonplace, an incident that reveals a phase human kindness, sympathy with helplessness, co sideration for others, love for the lost and fall ones, or which prompts us to hold out hands of hel fulness and to speak compassionate words, finds lodgment in some heart and may be the turnin point in the transformation of a sinful life. Doub less the principal reason why the "common peop heard Jesus gladly" was because he spoke in tern which they could understand, and that he kne all about their heavy burden, and the cares th oppressed them. He could talk familiarly abo happenings in their everyday lives, of their neig borly surroundings, of the fields, the vineyards, t orchards, the hills and the flowering plains. H knew all about their hardships too, the ill-requit labor, the onerous taxation, the greedy usurers, t injustice of the law, the selfish indifference of t rich toward the poor—many of these condition duplicating the problems of to-day. To win sou to Christ, the preacher, evangelist or Gospel work must get into close touch with the people—so clo that they can feel that he has a heart that bea in sympathy with their own, and a share in a that affects their material and spiritual well-bein Let him not disdain the commonplace.

Those Who Fail

HOW shrunken and pitiful a thing, how hollo a delusion, is the so-called success of self-a sorbed men and women!

Like that soldier who, when Galerius sacked t camp of the Persians, found a bag of shinin leather filled with pearls and threw away the co tents but carefully preserved the bag, they wi find that they have spurned true riches, real su cess, to hug unto their hearts things that are empt and worthless.

Achievement is not always success, while repute failure often is.

Many a poor cripple who struggled under h handicap, doing the best to make himself usefu trying to reflect a little sunshine into the darkne and to make a home a little brighter, but never e pecting special recognition here or hereafter, wi be surprised to find his name written in letters unfading light high above that of a nation's co queror.

When the scroll of earth's real benefactors unrolled, it will be found that many who stan highest on the list were hardly recognized durin their lives. The name of many a servant will b above that of his master. Many a humble employe will be found to have been in reality more succes ful than the proprietor of the establishment i which he worked.

General Notes

—GIULIO ULIVI, a distinguished Florentine engineer, has i vented an electrical machine which he has shown to be capab of detonating explosives at a distance of several miles. H claims that it will locate and set off torpedoes ten or fiftee miles away, and that explosives in warships, forts and am munition depots are subject to its destructive invisible rays. half of these claims be true, the new contrivance may prove powerful aid in the transformation or abolition of moder warfare. Even dreadnoughts within its deadly radius would b at its mercy, and war-aeroplanes would be kept at a safe an ineffective distance.

—DAVID WINSOR, a young and much loved missionary Sirur, India, and the head of the industrial school founde there by his late father, and Mrs. Winsor, his mother, passe away recently. In February last he was called out by the peopl of the Ponce district, who had suffered from the depredations o a panther. He went, shot the marauding beast, but wa severely wounded, his injuries keeping him a month in hospita A few days after convalescence, he had an accidental fall fro his horse, which produced concussion of the brain. He neve regained consciousness. His death is a great loss to the mis sionary work in Sirur, where his fine ability, his spiritual en thusiasm and the success that attended his efforts gave promis of a splendid future. His parents—Rev. and Mrs. Richar Winsor—rendered valuable aid to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD whe it sent its second relief ship, the Quito, to India in 1900.

Aerial Sham Battle Tragedy

THERE was a tragic ending of military aerial maneuvers near Vienna recently when an army aeroplane rammed an army dirigible and both, aflame, plunged to earth, rrying nine men to death, two in the aeroplane, d seven in the dirigible. It was the first sham ht in the air ever attempted by these war ma-ines. A huge crowd had gathered to witness the ntest. Thousands watched breathlessly the aero-ane glistening in the sunlight, darting about the eat balloon. They saw the two machines come gether, saw a puff of smoke, heard a roar come t of the sky and witnessed the mass of flaming reckage shoot downward. It was all over in a nute. Not a single life was saved, and thus was ded another awful catastrophe to the well-nigh iversal tragedies that have marked the progress aerial navigation. This tragedy illustrates the ailty and uncertainty of this earthly life as de-ribed by the apostle James:

For what is your life? It is even a vapor, that appeareth for ittle time, and then vanisheth away. (James 4: 14.)

Taught 4,000 to Swim

UGUSTUS S. LOWSLEY, who has taught 4,000 men and boys how to swim at the outdoor ths during the last ur seasons, has been appointed instructor swimming for the blic Bath Commis-n of New York City. e commission con-ders this one of the st important fea-res of its depart-ent, on account of the efulness of swim-ing as a preserver of e, and as a healthful hletic exercise. It is range, at this time nen such marvelous ogress has been made the preservation of e and health, lon-vity, and improved ethods of life-saving, at so little attention ould have been paid the art of swimming, d that so many pre-ous lives should have d to pay the penalty such neglect. Some n learn to swim more sily than others, some en at a single lesson; t almost any one who ill try long or hard ough can learn to tch the stroke, and en exercise only is cessary to the mastery of the water. Every girl well as boy ought to be taught to swim, always der wise and competent instruction and protec-on. Swimming has been an art practiced from me immemorial. The prophet makes this refer-ce to it:

And he shall spread forth his hands in the midst of them, as that swimmeth spreadeth forth his hands to swim. (Isa. : 11.)

Recreations Substituted for Church

EV. DR. J. L. GORDON, pastor of the Central Congregational Church of Winnipeg, Canada, a sermon recently preached said: "The average ealthy Christian thinks more of his automobile an he does of his Bible; the average poor Chris-an thinks more of the number of cards in the deck an he does of the number of books in the Bible. he pulpit may be suffering from a cold wave of aterialism, and humanity indulging in one of the randest 'joy rides' ever known. Give me a religion rough as a cocoanut, if it contains the sweet ilk of human kindness. If there is no church ere is no morality." The minister was wise to ll attention to the widespread desertion of the rd's Day, and the substitution of the recreations d amusements of life for the services of the nctuary and the study of God's Word. This has promise of good to the nation. There is danger at this use of Sunday as a great American "joy ride" may result, as such excursions often do, in the wreck of body and soul to our people. But the world is becoming steadily better, and this national sin will come to a halt. It must. There cannot come too soon a revival voicing this spirit:

I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the Lord. (Ps. 122: 1.)

Sleeps in His Own Coffin

THERE is an eccentric man living at Lincoln, Neb., who made his own coffin several years ago, and every night since then has slept in it on his front porch. If the weather is cold, or if a shower comes up, he pulls the top of the coffin over the opening, leaving a crack through which he can get a little fresh air, and calmly goes to sleep. He built the coffin a size or two too large, and a little deeper than usual, and then he fitted a set of springs in the bottom. On these he placed a small mattress, and provided himself with blankets and quilts. In the summer, the leaves hide the box from those passing on the street; but in the winter, when the trees are bare, the coffin bed is plainly seen. The reason the old man—who is in his seventy-sixth year—gives for his action is that it costs too much to die. Vast sums of money, he says, are thrown away foolishly on funerals. He says the only funeral expense his family will have will be the digging of the grave, as he has the coffin, he has a suit saved for graveclothes, and his son has a wagon that will serve very well as a hearse. The old man may be a crank with one idea crosswise in his head, preventing others which would give it proper proportion; but his idea about the useless and sometimes sinful extravagance of many funerals is worthy of consideration. Where there is money to afford it, a generous expenditure upon funerals is the becoming thing; but in many instances persons of modest means, and even of poverty, are drawn by the love they have for their dead, and the desire to honor them, unto expenditures that are unnecessary, which do the dead no good, and handicap the living in the fight for the bare necessaries of life. Most burials in olden time were inexpensive. There is the mention of one, however, that appears in striking contrast to the simple one planned with the plain board coffin on the porch. It was the royal funeral accorded the patriarch:

So Joseph died, being a hundred and ten years old; and they embalmed him, and he was put in a coffin in Egypt. (Gen. 50: 26.)

THE LARGEST AMERICAN FLAG

IT IS claimed that the largest American flag in the world is the one that was carried in the parade in St. Louis, Mo., on Flag Day, which was witnessed by hundreds of thousands of people. The flag was 150 feet long by 78 feet wide. It was made by fifty girls of St. Louis, and carried by 175 members of the Million Club. It is not the size, but the significance of the flag that gives to it its value. The flag, costing a few cents, that hangs out of the poor man's cottage window on the Fourth of July, and the little flags in the hands of the children of all nationalities at Mont-Lawn, like the gigantic flag in St. Louis, stand for everything that is true, beautiful and good in individual character and in public life. Many have died for the flag; many who have fought for it still remain. A cavalry officer in the Union Army in the Civil War, who lives in a beautiful home on a bluff overlooking the Ohio River, has a tall staff, and every day in the year he has the flag flying from it. He offered his life for its defense, and lost an arm protecting it. It is a beautiful custom of some States to have a flag flying in every public schoolyard every day. The people of the South are as loyal to the flag as those of the North. An ex-governor of a Southern State said recently: "My father was killed in the Confederate Army, our slaves took care of my mother and the fatherless children, while every fiber of my nature is true to the South, yet if the Stars and Stripes were to be fired upon to-morrow, even at my present age I would ask my government to permit me to write my name down as the first volunteer to defend the integrity of that flag." The cross is the only symbol we will place above the flag, and in the words of the psalmist we will say:

"We will rejoice in thy salvation, and in the name of our God we will set up our banners." (Ps. 20: 5.)

President on Church Unity

PRESIDENT WILSON wrote a letter to Dr. W. H. Roberts, stated clerk of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, concerning church unity, which says: "I have been gratified to learn that a delegation, representing the American churches, will go to Europe next August in connection with the World's Conference on Faith and Order. It is especially pleasing that our churches will be represented by divines so eminent as Bishops Rhinelander and Anderson and the other gentlemen mentioned. May I not ask you to make known to them, and through them to the World Conference, my entire sympathy with the great object of the Conference, which looks to the unity of all Christian churches?" More and more, the churches are catching the spirit, and offering this prayer of the Master:

Holy Father, keep through thine own name those whom thou hast given me, that they may be one, as we are. (John 17: 11.)

Killed by Trained Lions

EMERSON D. DIETRICH of Brooklyn, twenty-six years old and a graduate of Cornell University, entering a cage to feed a female lion and four cubs on a railroad siding in Chicago the other morning, was set upon by the beasts and was literally torn to pieces. The young man was the manager of a show in which the lions play a leading part. The lions are the property of Mme. Adjie Costillo, to whom Dietrich was to have been married soon. Dietrich was very fond of the lions, and made playmates of them. Teddy, his favorite cub, was the ugly one who began the attack and caused the tragedy. Dietrich's betrothed brought his body to his father's residence in Brooklyn, where funeral services were conducted by Rev. O. E. Fisher of the Dutch Reformed Church. There is a latent savage instinct in animals, and even in man himself, but in the latter it is kept under by human will and divine grace. The wild beast, however, is liable at any moment to become dangerous and destructive. In his prayer for deliverance from his spiritual enemies the psalmist says:

Save me from the lion's mouth. (Ps. 22: 21.)

Kaiser's Gift

CHRIST'S German Evangelical Church, East New York, was honored the other day by Emperor William, who, to mark the golden jubilee of the church, presented it with a Bible. The flyleaf bears a Biblical autograph, written by the emperor recently while at his summer home on the Island of Corfu. The presentation was made by the German consul in New York, Baron Hans von Ungelter. The gift is significant, because the Kaiser is a firm believer in the divine authority of the Scriptures, and because he takes a deep interest in the material and religious welfare of the subjects of his empire who become citizens of our republic. In wireless messages exchanged on June 20 between President Wilson and Emperor William, celebrating the opening of wireless communications between the station at Tuckerton, N. J., and Eilvese, Germany, there was the most cordial expression of mutual national regard, and the hope was expressed that the new invention would draw the countries closer together in commerce and happiness. The wireless was spoken of as an additional link binding the two countries in mutual friendship and closer intercourse. There is nothing that will bring nations so closely together as the Bible. All nations and kindreds and tongues are by it made one family of our Lord Jesus Christ. The psalmist pays many tributes to the power of the Word of God, and among them is this very familiar one:

The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul; the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple. (Ps. 19: 7.)

NEW HARMONY'S CENTENNIAL

THE centennial of the foundation of the town of New Harmony, Ind., was celebrated in a memorable manner by exercises, extending from June 6 to 13 inclusive. In 1814, George Rapp, a sturdy German from Württemberg, came to America with several hundred peasants, and took possession of thirty thousand acres of ground on the Wabash River in Posey County, Ind. He established a community settlement there which flourished amazingly for ten years, when Rapp carried his large family back to Pennsylvania, and continued his community at Economy.

Martin T. Golden was chairman of the "Rapp Day" exercises. George C. Taylor, secretary of the Centennial Commission, welcomed the visitors and also paid a tribute to the memory of Horace P. Owen, who was president of the commission until his death on March 9. Colonel George B. Lockwood, president of the Republican Editors' Association of Indiana, made a reply in which he said New Harmony was the most important social experiment station of the last century. "Here was waged the battle between the individual instinct and the social impulse. To curb greed without destroying initiative; to limit selfishness without removing incentive; to bring about social amelioration without individual enervation; to lift up the swamps of society without submerging its plateaux; this is the vital problem of to-day as it was of Owen's day, but we are manifestly nearer its solution now than the world was when, one hundred years ago to-day, New Harmony's history began."

Sunday was Devotional Day, and A. E. Fretageot was chairman of the exercises. The chief address of the day was made by Rev. F. C. Iglehart, D.D., of New York City. His theme was "The Divine Hand in New Harmony." He said among other things: "The intellectual ingredient so necessary was furnished by Robert Owen, a man of singular mental brilliancy, his equally talented sons, and the truly great thinkers gathered about them here. Robert Owen founded the first free school in America, the first kindergarten, the first co-educational school, the first industrial school. The supreme motive of Owen's life was to right wrongs that were radical and widespread, and especially the wrongs of the poor and oppressed common people who could not help themselves. Robert Owen's communistic experiment vanished in thin air, as it deserved to do. His business proposition dismally failed, but his settlement at New Harmony was a great success. He devoted himself to greater things than the manufacturing of cotton cloth—the making of men and women. He was a pioneer as a reformer in the industrial world. The parliaments of the civilized nations and the Congress of the United States have been working toward the industrial ideals of Robert Owen. It seemed as though the spiritual was to be left out of the Owen civilization, but God planned otherwise. It was through Robert Owen's wife, who was a Miss Dale, and a loyal Presbyterian, unfaltering in her faith in the Scriptures and in Christ as the Saviour, that religion was introduced here. She trained her four splendid sons, who were their father's right arm in the establishment of the colony. No better type of Christian civilization can be found than was in New Harmony fifty years ago; no better than can be found there now."

OWEN DAY AT NEW HARMONY CENTENNIAL, EX-PRESIDENT TAFT SPEAKING

Monday was Owen day, with Clarence P. Wolfe as chairman. The feature of the day was the visit and address of ex-President Taft, who made a well-prepared, comprehensive address, commending the settlers but severely criticizing their mistaken experiment of communism and enumerating some of the causes for the failure. He said among other things: "Equal remuneration for unequal service is contrary to an eternal law of justice. Socialism destroys the incentive to individual accumulation, so necessary to a prosperous community. The New Harmony socialism failed, as all such movements against the laws of political economy must."

Tuesday was Woman's Day, with Miss M. E. Fauntleroy as chairman. Distinguished women from the State and nation made able addresses. Some of those on the program were Mrs. Mary Donald, Miss Charity Dye, Ellinor Runcie, Mrs. Demarchus Brown, Mrs. C. A. Greathouse, Mrs. Albion Fellows Bacon, Mrs. Sarah Dinwiddie, Mr Senator LaFollette and Mrs. Rachel Fauntleroy, charter member of the Minerva Club, which, it claimed, was the first Woman's Club in Americ and which was started in her house. A LITTLE ANGEL OF THE MOUNTAINS

CHAPTER XI—Continued

THE beautiful leaven of the Gospel worked quietly in Cañon Creek. Many of the men who came to the first service failed to return. The saloons endeavored to counteract the new influences. But for many the zest of sin had gone. At length the Red Dog closed its doors. The Morrison's had opened their restaurant with a huge dinner, free to all dwellers at Cañon Creek. The men had helped in the construction of the eating house and gave it their willing patronage. Mr. Morrison became not only the spiritual leader of the community and its host at meal time, but became also in a modest way its banker, the men bringing their personal funds to him for safe keeping. Plans were being made for the establishment of a church and a bishop had already promised to come to conduct its formal organization.

"'Bout how much have you all got in all them collections you've took up every Sunday?" asked Old Four Eyes one day of Mr. Morrison.

"You have been very liberal," he replied after consulting his account book, "and I find that after setting aside a hundred dollars for the bishop's expenses and what gifts we have sent him for his work, and paying the express charges on the prayer books and hymnals he has sent us, we've got something like eight hundred and seventy-five dollars left in the safe with which to build a church."

"Gents," said Old Four Eyes, "when this yere shepherd comes we're goin' to make that an even thousand, an' as soon as he gits here we're goin' to commence buildin'."

"Meanwhile, there's The Red Dog," said one man. "It's a big room an' it's been shet up for three months, an'—"

"That would make an excellent place," said Mrs. Morrison.

"It was located with an eye to business an' is central to us all," added another.

"'Tain't very far from The Black Pup, though," said a third miner.

"We will plant the house of God right opposite the house of the—" Mrs. Morrison stopped a moment, "right opposite The Black Pup, if necessary," she resumed. "Wherever one goes the other ought to go, too."

"Good for you," cried Old Four Eyes. "That's the kind of a fightin' spirit we all likes an' it's that what brought us to you all people."

To which there was a loud chorus of approval, much of it expressed in a good old-fashioned "Amen."

Straggling Indians began to attend the Sunday school, among whom was Olaf's friend, Blue Wing. But the happiest of all the people in Cañon Creek was little Olaf himself, and yet there was a cloud upon his happiness. Parson Bill remained but a doorkeeper, as it were, in the house of the Lord; nor had he been altogether a consistent doorkeeper even for sometimes, and in spite of his inclination, he had dwelt in the tents of the ungodly. He had fallen once or twice, as had some of the others, and he had come back ashamed and meek to resume his watch and ward, but without making that long-desired confession. He seemed to be one whom neither the prayers and entreaties of the man and woman, nor the pleas of the boy, could bring to his knees.

Parson Bill had been well educated in his youth. Before he broke with respectability and came out West and cast his lot with the rude miners, he had been something of a student and a thinker, and he had long since

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

Mexican Peace Progress

PROTOCOLS covering points thus far agreed on between the American and Mexican delegates were formally signed at Niagara Falls, Ontario, June 24, thus narrowing the questions under discussion to the selection of a provisional government. A clause by which the United States agrees not to claim "war indemnity or other international satisfaction" is taken to mean the abandonment of the demand that Huerta salute the flag. A supplementary conference is being arranged between delegates from President Wilson, Huerta and General Carranza, pending which the Peace Board will take a recess, according to reports. The costly defeat of the rebels at Zacatecas under General Natera was reversed on June 24 by a strong rebel force which captured the city at a loss of 2,000 men, including possibly General Ortega, second in military importance only to Villa himself. Villa had not reached the scene of operations, but was in nominal command. The campaign against Zacatecas had lasted for several weeks and its capture is considered of prime importance to the rebel cause. The city is a silver and copper mining center, has a population of about 40,000, is 8,000 feet in altitude, and about 350 miles from Mexico City. It is the capital of the State of that name. Guerrilla warfare on the Americans at Vera Cruz appears to continue. The battleship Utah returned from Vera Cruz June 22, for overhauling, bringing the first men who have returned on furlough from Mexico.

For Free City Excursions

NEW YORK offers an example in sane benevolence in the action of the Interborough Rapid Transit Company, which has arranged with the Commissioner of Charity to issue free transportation to poor women and to children under fourteen to visit the outlying city parks during the summer term. This beneficial privilege will be given on Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays and Fridays, excepting holidays, between eight A.M. and ten P.M. A movement is also on foot, by the Safety First Society, to convert vacant lots into temporary playgrounds, or parks.

All Play and No Work Unpopular

THE experiment in summer vacation farming by school children begun three years ago by the Board of Education of Ishpeming, Mich., has proved so successful that similar school-farms are being instituted in other parts of that State, school boards providing the land and paying the pupils about ten cents an hour for labor, the boards marketing and retaining the proceeds of the produce. The idea has the double advantage of inculcating knowledge and good habits, and supplying city dwellers with fresh vegetables at low cost.

Movies Invade Churches

AN EFFORT is being made in New York to organize a Church Entertainment Society to utilize church buildings in idle hours for giving moving-picture and other entertainments to poor children. Churches of a neighborhood are asked to form groups for the purpose. The first free entertainment of the kind was given in Old First Presbyterian Church recently. The idea is being urged by prominent church people, and is adaptable to almost any community.

First Boats Through the Canal

THE honor of being the first boat through the Panama Canal is being acquired by various craft for their respective classes. Commercial use actually began May 18, when three sugar barges started under tow from Balboa, at the Pacific end, tied up at Pedro Miguel Lock for the night, and completed their journey to Cristobal at the Atlantic end the next day. By the end of May $7,356.12 in tolls had been earned. The first continuous voyage from ocean to ocean was made May 19 by the tug Mariner with two barges in tow. On June 8 the Panama

Progress of Irish Home Rule

ON JUNE 25 the British House of Lords, without waiting for the Irish Home Rule Bill to be placed on the statute books by royal signature (first instance of the kind), took up the promised bill to amend that measure. To the disappointment of Unionists, nothing was proposed beyond the concessions long ago offered by Premier Asquith, namely the reservation to each county in Ulster of the right to decide for itself if it would be excluded from the operation of the act for six years; excluded counties to be governed by the Lord Lieutenant. The new bill is looked upon as the opening wedge to a compromise. Lord Crewe, in introducing the bill to amend, admitted the religious difficulties in the way of acceptance of Home Rule by Ulster. John Redmond, leader of the Irish Nationalists, has issued an appeal for funds to enable the people of Ireland to withstand the "conspiracy between Tories, Orangemen and aristocrats to prevent Irish liberty."

Preparing to Fly Across the Atlantic

AT a favorable moment in July, Lieutenant J. C. Porte of the navy aeroplane service will set out from the Newfoundland coast in the airboat America on what may prove to be the first flight across the Atlantic. The America was launched by its builder, Glenn H. Curtiss, on Lake Keuka, Hammondsport, N. Y., June 22, and subsequently made several saisfactory flights. The power is supplied by two engines of 100 horsepower each; the planes have a spread of seventy-two feet over all. There are devices to insure stability, and utmost confidence is expressed by the aviators in charge. The America was built for Rodman Wanamaker, who has planned the trans-Atlantic flight in the interests of international peace.

In the presence of army men and many others, Charles S. Niles gave an exhibition of almost perfect control of a monoplane in all sorts of aerial twists and tumbles and wing-over-wing falling, diving head down from a height of 3,500 feet and doing other amazing things above Governor's Island, New York, June 23. When he finally landed, General Robert H. Evans declared the United States ought to have 1,000 aeroplanes, and 2,000 aviators in training, to make this country invincible in war.

Greece Gives Us a Dreadnought

ENCOURAGED by the President, who believes that the purchase of our two outgrown warships, Idaho and Mississippi, by Greece will tend to avert a new war between that country and Turkey, and despite strong protests made by the new Turkish ambassador, Rustem Bey, immediately he had presented his credentials June 22, the House on June 23 accepted the Senate amendment to the Naval Appropriation Bill permitting the sale. The $12,000,000 to be paid for the two ships will be promptly used for the construction of a first-class battleship. The Idaho is at Gibraltar on a summer cruise; the Mississippi is at the Pensacola Navy Yard.

Vaterland's* Sister Ship Launched

THE Bismarck, the newest Hamburg-American liner, and the biggest ship yet floated, was launched at Hamburg, June 20, the Kaiser, present as a spectator, christening the boat by quick action when the granddaughter of the great chancellor failed to make the bottle of champagne break against the huge hull. June 18 the North German Lloyd liner Buelow arriving at England from Japan ran on rocks near the coast and was badly damaged; her passengers were taken off by tugs. June 23 the Gothland, a ship of the Red Star Line, struck rocks off Land's End, England, in a fog, and her passengers were rescued by other steamers. The vessel left Montreal June 12.

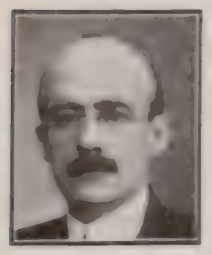
SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JULY 19*

SIGHT TO THE BLIND

By Arthur H. Howland



JESUS has been to Jericho, and starts now on his way up through the hills to Jerusalem. But before he is really gotten away from Jericho a blind beggar, Bartimeus by name, cries out, begging to be healed. He seems to have been a very importunate, almost importunate man, and some of the people who were following Jesus thought that he was disturbing the solemnity and dignity of the Master's departure from Jericho, so insisted that he keep quiet. But his desire for sight was so great and his faith that Jesus could help him so real that he would not stop calling. From the account given in Matthew in the ninth chapter it is stated that there were two blind men who thus accosted Jesus. But Mark, who was always on the lookout for the spectacular and dramatic elements of the occurrences which he reports in his brief Gospel, remembered particularly this more vehement of the two men and also recalled the fact that he had at the time learned his name.

There are always many discouragements in the way of getting to Jesus. Many are ready to hinder us. But this blind beggar was determined that he would at least have the verdict of Jesus on his case. So he continued to cry until "Jesus stood still and commanded him to be brought." Then the happy words came to the blind man's ears: "Be of good comfort; rise, he calleth thee."

With the same impetuosity with which he had been calling the Master he rose and ran toward him, casting away his garment that would impede his progress. It is interesting to notice that the question Jesus asked the blind man was the very same question he had asked James and John when they came desiring the chief seats in his kingdom: "What wilt thou that I should do unto thee?" Well enough he knew what was wanted, but he also knew that the putting of the request into words is a positive and definite help to faith, a help in getting mind and soul and body ready to receive the giving healing. While the request of the blind man was a request for a personal gift, as the request of two brothers had been, Jesus evidently considers that the nature and value of the requests were entirely different. It is perfectly right for a blind man to want to see. There is in that no desire to get ahead of others, to get something away from some one else. He longs simply to have his share in the universal gift of light. The other request meant the effort to snatch something from some one else, and Jesus could not countenance it. But to the blind man he said: "Go thy way; thy faith hath made thee whole."

To us who know the power of Jesus the other words seem so unnecessary: "Immediately he received his sight." Of course he received his sight after he had put his case into the hands of Christ. Immediately, then, he began to follow Jesus in the way.

A wonderful transition that. One moment blind, helpless and outcast, hearing the praises of those who followed Jesus and having no part in their joy; the next, full of life, full of light, full of gladness, full of song and of hope, following Jesus in the way.

It was no wonder that after the man had asked to be healed Jesus healed him; nor was it any wonder that being in need Jesus found him and met that need with his power. It is beautiful to think of the sad, the hungry, the lonely, the diseased, tormented lives which Jesus touched with his wholesome, energetic and loving grace. The needs of the people called forth his kindly power. And he is just the same to-day, able and willing to bear our burdens and forgive our sins, to heal our diseases, to drive away our darkness, to baptize us with his light.

While we do not find many well authenticated cases of his healing people from blindness to-day, probably because of the church's weakness of faith and failure to appropriate his infinite power, we do find countless cases of his bringing light, light of all sorts, into the lives of men. Indeed his chief business is to take men out of the kingdom of darkness and translate them into his own blessed kingdom of light. Sin is very much like blindness. There are certain things that unregenerated people simply can not see, though they are very plain to the sight of those whose souls Christ has touched. He himself said that until a man were born again he could not even see the kingdom of God. The shouts of gladness and praise, the lives of peace and victory lived by Christ's followers, all these things seem strange and unreal to the man who has failed to find the light of Christ. He hears the shouts and songs in much the same way that blind Bartimeus heard them sitting beside the Jericho road. But who never any one gets tired of his blindness and longs for light, if he will but call to Jesus he will find it. He is indeed the Light of the World. If you have not yet let his light come into your soul ask him for it now. It is a prayer he loves to answer. And even as you ask you will receive.

Do you know of any people still living in the blindness of sin? Take them by the hand and lead them to Jesus that he may give them his light.

Then all along the way our light is in him. "He that followeth me," he promised, "shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." Step by step he will guide us, solving our problems, leading us safely and in gladness toward the eternal light of his Father's kingdom.

OUT OF DARKNESS

By Amos R. Wells

I KNOW one blind Bartimeus who has found Jesus, and found him so gloriously that all the world knows it—Fanny Crosby. She was ninety-four years old last March, and during all that time, except the first six weeks of it, her eyes have been sealed from the light of day. But to what beauties and marvels her spiritual eyes have been opened! She has written more than eight thousand hymns, and many of them are immortal: "Rescue the perishing," "Pass me not," "'Tis the blessed hour of prayer," "Safe in the arms of Jesus," "Blessed assurance," "Speed away," and oh! so many more.

This aged saint is as happy as the day is long. Once she said to me, "I believe the blessed Book from cover to cover. I believe it, because I have proved it." "My blindness," she said, "has been the greatest blessing God could have sent me. See how many friends it has brought me; and without it I should not have written all these hymns."

Many books have been filled with accounts of the achievements of the blind. Take for a specimen the story of James Wilson, the poor blind boy who became so familiar with the streets of Belfast that he often served as a guide to bewildered strangers. He became a traveling pedler, and was led through many perils in prosecuting his dangerous occupation. At one time a sudden call halted him on the very brink of an open well eighty feet deep. He employed persons to read to him, and his eager memory was so retentive that he became known as "the Walking Encyclopedia." Once in a company he was asked to repeat the names of as many ships of the British navy as he could. He gave names without hesitation till six hundred and twenty were written down, when he was told to stop. This poor blind boy became a well-known writer.

Such lives are led by Jesus into true vision even though the physical eyes are left in darkness. When George Matheson, the wonderful blind preacher of Edinburgh, wrote his great hymn with the line, "O Light that followest all my way," he did not feel himself to be in darkness, but in the most lovely sunshine. Bartimeus himself understands now, if he did not understand then, that his eyes were really opened when he began to call after Jesus. Our Lord said, "Thy faith hath made thee whole." His faith not only led him to vision; it was vision.

But how slow we are to realize the immense power of faith! We are like the old lady who was crossing a stormy bay in a little steamer when the engine suddenly stopped and the boat was in great danger. She rushed to the captain for assurances of safety. "Madame," he said, "we must trust in God." "O dear!" she cried; "has it come to that?" To the Christian it will begin with that, and continue with that, and that will be our stay all the journey through.

But though we rely on this mysterious unseen agency, this power of faith, we have work to do on our own part, as Bartimeus had to cry out after Jesus. Sam Jones illustrated our share in faith by a watering-trough for cattle which he saw out West, where water is precious and no drop may be wasted. The cattle had to mount a platform to reach the trough, and as they did this their weight on the platform pressed a lever which threw the water into the trough. As they did their part, the springs far up in the mountains did their part, and the cattle's thirst was quenched.

Now Bartimeus met obstacles in doing his part, just as any Christian meets obstacles on the path of faith. The people around him rebuked his clamor, "but he cried out the more a great deal," and Jesus heard him. A Berlin machinist designed a locomotive which was provided with a "superheater," the object of which was to raise the steam to a higher temperature than it would otherwise reach, and thereby cause it to do more work. It is superheated Christians, men of the Bartimeus type, that accomplish things. They have strong desires. They know what they want. They refuse to acquiesce in anything less. They rush against all barriers. They scorn the advice of weaklings. They reach their goal, and often carry many others with them. Moody was such a superheated Christian. John Knox, Luther, Wesley, Booth, Miss Willard, were others. Every true Christian is a Bartimeus, breaking through all hindrances that he may bring his own ills, and those of the world, to the good Physician.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LEADERSHIP TRAINING—I.

BY FRANK L. BROWN, General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

BEFORE we can reach the what of leadership training, we must have clearly before us the who, how and when of it all.

And first as to who needs the training for effective leadership in Sunday school leadership is the local school. Surely those now in office need it for their own strengthening for a larger vision and better service.

And as the future of any child-less family will perish, and any organization will fail that does not plan well ahead for the training of those who shall succeed its present officers, so the Sunday school will die that does not provide a plan for the training of its future officers, committees and teachers, from among its own young people in the later teens.

It is a sad but true indictment of this greatest institution in the world for character making, that with a Sunday school army of over 30,000,000 we have up to the present time practically stumbled on a leadership.

This is true of its organized leadership as well as that of the local school. It is only in the last two years that the International Sunday School Association, which represents North America, has established its first Sunday school "West Point" in the Training School for Organization Workers at Lake Geneva, Wis., a ten-day summer school on organization methods.

For the most part leaders have been picked out as needed here and there from those who were discovered doing their work a little better than the majority, these leaders coming out of the school of experience.

I believe the day is coming soon when there will be established a great institution for the training of all who desire to specialize in the Sunday school field, for world, international, State, provincial and denominational Sunday school leaders, as well as pastors, superintendents and all who are seeking special Sunday school equipment.

The leadership problem in the local Sunday school is an acute one. The usual plan is to wait for the resignation of a superintendent or other officer and then wrestle with some unwilling candidate who has no training for, or trial in, the work of Sunday school management, and who, after stumbling around a bit, hits a snag, or has his toes stepped on, and resigns the job, when the operation is gone through with once more.

The wonder of it all is that the Sunday school has survived this long continued policy. This is not sane as a plan, it is not dignified, it is not

THE S. S. CONVENTION

AS THIS edition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD goes to press, the hosts are assembled in Chicago for the work of the great International Sunday School Convention. Thousands of delegates from the United States and Canada are in attendance. At the opening session in Medinah Temple on June 24, over 4,000 delegates and visitors listened with rapt attention to the address of Mr. Marion Lawrance, who gave the keynote to the convention's work when he stated these as the goals set for achievement during the coming year:

One million total abstinence pledge signers in 1914-15 and yearly for ten years thereafter.

One million new Sunday school members.

One million accessions to the churches from the Sunday schools.

Ten million to be reached through home visitation campaigns.

Twenty-five thousand additional organized secondary and adult Sunday school classes.

Twenty thousand new Home Departments.

Fifty thousand new Cradle Rolls.

Five thousand new Mission Study Classes.

One hundred thousand new members of teachers' training classes.

A civic training school or institute in every city of fifty thousand or more population.

One hundred new graded unions.

Ten thousand organized classes engaged in community service.

Graded instruction on efficiency and co-operation standards, discussed at all State and county conventions.

This is the great Million-a-Year Campaign which is to be the motto of the present convention.

The opening session at Medinah Temple was begun amid picturesque surroundings. American and English flags were displayed everywhere, and were interspersed with electric signs ablaze with New Testament texts. Messages were read from many distinguished persons interested in Sunday school work, including President Wilson, the Secretary of State and Secretary of the Navy. President W. N. Hartshorn, Bishop Charles B. Anderson, Episcopal diocese of Chicago, and Rev. F. B. Meyer of London were among the leading speakers. Bishop Anderson urged that the primary purpose of the church is not great buildings, even benevolent institutions, but teaching and preaching Christ—"making Christians of those who are not Christians." Professor E. Excell, with a chorus of five hundred Chicago young people, put power and expression into every song, and drew out the hearty vocal co-operation of the great audience.

While the main convention was for delegates largely, there were thirteen additional meetings on the opening day in different parts of the city. Many churches have been placed at the service of the convention for this purpose, including Baptist, Congregational, Methodist, Presbyterian, Episcopal, Evangelical, African M. E. Church, and the Moody Church (Interdenominational). There were nine simultaneous conferences on Sunday school work, including a Danish and Norwegian conference, and a German conference. The themes discussed included "Promotion of Teaching Work," "Adult Bible Classes," "Temperance Education and Activities," meetings for boys and girls, etc. In these various gatherings, women devoted to the Sunday school cause took an active part. At one of the meetings, Mrs. Zillah Foster Stevens of Peoria, international superintendent of temperance work, urged that the cause of temperance be put on a broader, more humanitarian, scientific and sane basis than heretofore. She criticized the temperance literature and songs of the day.

At one of the meetings a report was presented on "A Scientific Sunday School Organization for Chicago and Cook County," the conference having been called at the instance of Hugh Cork, of Wheaton, Ill., secretary of the State Sunday School Association. "If you want the boy to go to church when he becomes a man," said Mr. Beeman, a member of the committee, "you must train him to go to Sunday school when he is a boy; otherwise he will never get into the habit of church attendance."

Marion Lawrance, who is one of the leading figures in the convention, in his address at Medinah Temple gave a most hopeful view of the Sunday school outlook. He said, among other things:

"One of the hopeful signs of the times is the enlarged place now being given to the Sunday school in institutions of higher learning. Education helps to fit for leadership. A very large proportion of our leaders of today in affairs of both church and state are college-bred men.

"Many colleges are putting in courses for Sunday school workers and giving straight college credit for the same. Christian colleges could scarcely do a more profitable thing for the cause of righteousness than to equip leaders and trainers. Nearly all of the colleges of the State of Missouri are banded together in what is known as a 'commission of the Missouri College Conference.' This commission co-operates with the Missouri State Sunday School Association. It is our plan to extend this scheme to every State in the Union."

Arrangements have been made for a parade of 50,000 men, in connection with the convention work, and every adult Sunday school class in Chicago will be represented in the line.

A comprehensive report of the convention proceedings will appear in next week's CHRISTIAN HERALD.

LEADERSHIP TRAINING

bringing to the King's business the efficiency methods now prevailing in all large business concerns.

Second, how shall this training of a local leadership be accomplished?

In many of the State conventions and in summer schools there are institutes covering brief courses for the Sunday school superintendent, and certificates awarded where attendance and note-taking has been satisfactory. This, however, while excellent, is only a partial preparation, and should be supplemented by the after reading of books on Sunday school management.

The city Sunday school institute, with weekly sessions, such as is conducted in Des Moines, Kansas City, Topeka, Birmingham and many other places, is a most valuable method of training superintendents.

At these institutes the superintendents meet with the Sunday school teachers of the city in an opening session where some topic of mutual interest is presented. The institute then divides into sections, the superintendents meeting in a body, and in some cases the secretaries meet separately. A chapter on some method book is presented each week and discussed, and at the end of the season an examination may be held.

The third question, as to when the training of a Sunday school leadership can be undertaken, has been answered above in part in so far as it relates to the superintendents now in office. But for the young people to whom we must look for future leaders we must establish a leadership class as a part of the school plan. The plans for this as well as for the self-training of present officers will be taken up in the next article.

The Howard Watch

THE predominance of the HOWARD Watch among yachting men illustrates some interesting conditions in American business and professional life.

There is in this country no exclusively yachting class as such. Practically every American yachtsman is a man of affairs, who finds his greatest relaxation on the water, and who takes his HOWARD Watch with him when he goes abroad.

The thing that makes him a yachtsman and an American disposes him to like the HOWARD Watch—with its fine traditions, its trim, racy lines, and its way of showing its clean American heels to the talent of the watch-making world.

The wonderful character of the HOWARD Watch is that it meets men of so many different kinds and occupations on their own ground. Men in commerce, in the technical industries, in the professions, in official life.

A HOWARD Watch is always worth what you pay for it.

The price of each watch is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached—from the 17-jewel (double roller) in a Crescent Extra or Boss Extra gold-filled case at $40, to the 23-jewel in 18K gold case at $170—and the EDWARD HOWARD model at $350.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD Watch. Find the HOWARD jeweler in your town and talk to him. He is a good man to know.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Faithful Foundations*

IN THESE days of skyscrapers unusual attention is being paid to foundations. They were always important, but now that the buildings are going higher than ever, the foundations must receive greater care than ever.

We see illustrations constantly of this same fact in the building of lives and careers. The office boy who puts a letter in the wrong envelope when he is sending out the mail; the clerk who makes mistakes in his weights and measurements; the stenographer or teacher who lets little errors slip through her work; the helper of any sort who cannot be trusted to get things just right—these are not the people upon whom heavier burdens are put. The people in authority do not care to build important structures of responsibility and opportunity upon these unsafe foundations.

America has grown used to the watchword: "Do it now." We should pay more attention to this other watchword: "Do it well." Our young people seem to be in danger of getting the idea that it is not quite dignified, not quite in keeping with our ideas of independence, to do things too carefully. We do not want to be slaves, even to an ideal, even to a model of perfect work. So, much of our work, or other acts, is not thorough, accurate, careful.

You have heard the old story of the great pianist who used to lay six beans—or was it peas?—on the piano, and compel himself to play a most difficult and intricate composition through six times without an error. Every time he went successfully through he took up a pea and put it in his pocket. Every time he made a mistake he took all the peas out of his pocket and began again, even if he were almost at the end of the sixth time. Many of our young music pupils seem to think an error makes no difference. They expect to make them, so of course they do make them. You cannot build great achievements of art upon these faulty foundations.

Study carefully our Scripture verses (Luke 16: 10-13). "He that is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much." We understand fairly well the principles and the promises contained in that statement. But notice: "He that is unjust in the least is unjust also in much." Don't neglect to pay your fare because the conductor neglects to ask for it. Don't loaf because the boss isn't looking. Be just—in things little and big—all the time. The eleventh verse is more startling: If we are not careful of physical responsibilities we shall not be trusted with spiritual responsibilities. You want to have spiritual power, power that shall tell in heaven and to eternity; be faithful now to the temporal things and tasks entrusted to you. Lastly, if you are not faithful with what belongs to another, you are not likely to be trusted with treasure for yourself.

We should remember that the surest way to compel ourselves to accuracy and thoroughness in our work is to remember that it is all linked up to Christ's great age-long task of love. The reason we want to do our work well is because our work, if well done, will help other people, and if poorly done will bother or harm them.

Every time you do a thing carefully, and well, correctly, precisely, you are adding the likelihood of your doing every future task in the same way. You are forming habits of correct, and safe, and profitable action. You are getting skill in proper and successful and helpful work. You are laying foundations for a good, useful, large structure of fine achievement. You are getting ready to stand forth at life's close, "a workman that needeth not to be ashamed."

* "Faithful in Little Things." Luke 16: 10-13. B. Y. P. U. and Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, July 19, 1914.

Three Women Blessed*

OUR Scripture references contain the words of three happy women. The words sprang from their hearts to their lips, and were uttered in song. The old rules of melody were not the same as those to which we are accustomed. It was much later that our scale of eight tones came into use, and the ideas as to pleasing intervals which make melody in the world of music as we know it. But there was song, song which did give beautiful expressions to emotion, particularly the emotion of joy.

So we in thought hear these three women singing. Miriam stands forth and sings her war song of triumph because the enemies of God and of his people have been thrown into the sea. Hannah sings a song of thanks and gladness because in answer to her prayer she had given birth to a son, whom she cheerfully "lends" to the Lord for service in the temple. And Mary, the sweet young wife of Galilee, assured that she is to be the mother of the Saviour of her people, sings the ever great "Magnificat," "My soul doth magnify the Lord."

One note which runs through all three of these praise songs in somewhat surprising. It is something that sounds almost like cruelty, or at least a rigorous sternness. "The horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea." That is a gruesome, pitiful, terrifying spectacle. Yet this brave strong woman of Israel glories in it. Hannah sings: "The adversaries of the Lord shall be broken to pieces; out of heaven shall he thunder upon them." And gentle Mary sings: "He hath showed strength with his arm; he hath scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts. He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree. He hath filled the hungry with good things, and the rich he hath sent empty away." Strange to say, Hannah also had something to say about hunger and bread in her song: "They that were full have hired out themselves for bread; and they that were hungry ceased."

Why did these women mingle these bitter words with their sweet notes of thanksgiving? Because they recognized that God has enemies in the world, and that these enemies must be overthrown; because they knew that there can be no lasting blessing except as the blessing that is founded upon justice and upon the undoing of existing wrong; because they knew that before the song of final triumph can be sung there must come the struggle of right against wrong, of truth against falsehood, of justice against injustice, of oppression against kindness.

History gives many noble pictures of beautiful women who allowed God to touch their hearts and to touch their hands or lips or pens that they might help forward his cause. Joan of Arc, leading the armies of France against the oppressor; Florence Nightingale giving her strength and her skill to the wounded soldiers of England's armies; Harriet Beecher Stowe and Julia Ward Howe writing the battle book and the battle song which helped to bring to an end the wrong of slavery; Frances E. Willard, leading the woman's army of the temperance hosts, these and countless others have shown to the world the power of consecrated heart and consecrated gifts.

* "The Song-Bursts of Spiritual Women." Ex. 15: 20, 21; I Sam. 2: 1-10; Luke 1: 46-48. Epworth League Topic for Sunday, July 19, 1914.

thought himself away from Christianity. He could not seem to get back, although he tried hard enough in his soul. It needed some tremendous impulse to open his eyes, some shock to break up his nature. The water did not flow until Moses smote the rock with the rod of power. Well, the impulse came, and it produced the awakening. "God moves in a mysterious way, his wonders to perform," was a hymn often sung under the pines, and a vivid illustration of it was presently provided.

CHAPTER XII

THE devil did not intend to give up Cañon Creek without a struggle, and he found an instrument ready for his hand. This instrument was Mr. Dead Shot Jackson. Banished from the confines of the town, the outlaw had fled, not the country, but to nearby cities of refuge, thinking thereby to escape vengeance.

Undaunted by the bitter lesson that had been read him, he continued his career of drinking, gambling, and murder. One town after another in the territory soon got too hot to hold him. He could, perhaps, have fled to other parts of the country, but he had lived long in those mountains, and no other land or clime appealed to him. Besides, he had a certain amount of pride in not being forced away against his will. His hand was against every man's, yet he resented the fact that rapidly every man's was becoming raised against him. He determined, therefore, that he would remain in that part of the country, come what might.

He fondly imagined that the hue and cry that had been raised over the death of the Indians would have died down by this time. So, with astounding bravado, he decided to go back to Cañon Creek as if nothing had happened. The Black Pup would still welcome him gladly, he thought; certainly so long as he had any money; and even if he had none he might be welcomed if he would organize and lead the fight on the religious element by which the saloon had lost so much trade, as he had learned. His back was against the wall, as it were, and the realization begot in him a reckless spirit of retaliation and revenge. He hated the whole town because it had originally cast him out, and because, justly or unjustly, he ascribed his downfall to the religious influences which were stirring it—influences in which he took no stock whatsoever. And he was glad to do anything he could to restore the reign of Satan again.

Some sort of a break had to come in his career, anyway. He had nursed his supposed grievances and wrongs against the camp until he hated it with an absolutely reckless and desperate hatred. The popular conception of a desperado is that, like a bully, he is inevitably a coward. That is not always true. Some of the bravest men on record have been the most brutal and the most desperate. There are bullies who are perfectly willing and indeed anxious to abide all the consequences of their bullying. They may be exceptions to a rule, but they exist. And sometimes they are almost as thrice-armed as the just quarrelers!

Dead Shot Jackson was one of this kind. No man could doubt his physical courage. That was as true as the fact that very few could approve of his actions. The longer men thought of him the more they disapproved of him. The more they heard of his conduct and career the less they would tolerate from him.

There were two people that Dead Shot Jackson particularly hated. To them he traced all his misfortunes. Upon them, and bad luck, as he phrased it, he laid the blame for his swift, impending ruin, admitting no responsibility of his own for his downfall. Their actions, he declared in his heart, had made him a persona non grata to his fellow men.

Life got to be a real hell for the man. It was with difficulty that he could get liquor to drink. Men would not trust him. Nobody would even gamble with him. He could not work. Labor after such a career had become impossible to him. So he decided that he would stake all on one wild plunge. He would go back to Cañon Creek. He would see if there was any real religion in the town. He would shoot up the two people he hated. He would get all the liquor he wanted at The Black Pup for once in his life. He could defy everybody, and if he died in the effort, he would at least die "with his boots on." So his wild thoughts ran on and on.

As is sometimes the case, the devil's emissary arrived before the Lord's. The eagerly expected bishop was due on Saturday, but late comers from the nearest railroad station down the valley told of a wash-out on the eastern side of the Great Divide, and said that the train would probably not get through until very late Saturday night. Mr. Morrison decided to arrange with some of his friends to meet the train on its arrival and bring the bishop up the trail through the pass, so that he could be there in time for Sunday morning. Mr. Morrison would have gone himself, but he felt it would be better for him to remain in camp to carry on the service if the bishop did not come or arrived too late.

Dead Shot Jackson reached the town on Saturday night, in plenty of time to join the weekly revelers at The Black Pup. It was not yet dark when he rode defiantly down the long street on his bronco, his Winchester rifle leaning on the pommel of his saddle, his hand on the trigger, his fierce, keen eyes glancing rapidly and suspiciously at every man in sight. A few months before the desperado thus appearing in the camp would have been shot on sight. He was a self-confessed murderer; he was a fugitive from the wild, rude justice of the frontier that had sought him unavailingly in the mountains; and nearly any man in the camp once would have rejoiced to be his executioner. But a different spirit had come over the town; there had been no private shooting affrays for a long time, and they were proud of their record. Although the people stared in surprise and amazement, which rapidly crystallized into a grim determination to deal with him collectively, they did not offer to molest him individually. It was realized that Jackson's case ought to be handled by the community rather than by the individual. Old Four Eyes, the Doc, Parson Bill, and above all Mr. Morrison, would have to gather the citizens together so that concerted action might be taken. The first lesson in the administration of law, to wit, that vengeance was not the prerogative of the individual, whatever his wrongs, had been learned by heart.

The outlaw at first attributed his immunity to fear or indifference. He was soon to be undeceived. Like all men who are without religion, who knowing nothing about it despise it, he completely mistook what was back of its restraints. He lacked any power to discriminate between the fear of the Lord, which is the beginning of wisdom, and the fear of the man, which is generally the commencement of something quite different. The news of the desperado's arrival was quickly spread throughout the camp. When it reached Old Four Eyes he immediately called a meeting of the citizens at the restaurant. That they naturally assembled there rather than at the saloon was another interesting and significant fact.

Added Tire Cost

Five Ways in Which Some Men Get It

Way One is by paying too much for a tire. Sixteen makes now sell at more than Goodyear prices—some at one-third more.

Yet Goodyears lead in Tiredom. They offer costly features found in no other tire. Their under-price is due to matchless output. And that is due to matchless popularity.

Way Two is by buying tires that rim-cut. In such tires, this one trouble ruins one in three. No-Rim-Cut tires can't rim-cut. That we guarantee.

Way Three is through blow-outs due to wrinkled fabric. Our "On-Air" cure prevents this, but the process is expensive. So No-Rim-Cut tires are the only tires which get it.

Way Four is through loose treads. In No-Rim-Cut tires, through a patent method, we reduce this risk 60 per cent. No other maker does this.

Way Five is through wasteful anti-skids. The All-Weather tread—used on Goodyears alone—is tough and double-thick. It is flat and smooth, like a plain tread. It doesn't center the strains on small parts of the fabric.

Mark the Reasons

You know that Goodyears outsell any other tire. You know that men are flocking to them, for you see them everywhere.

Mark the five great reasons. Look back at your tire troubles and think what these things save.

Then, in fairness, try the Goodyears. Learn why they hold top place. Any dealer will supply you if you ask for Goodyears.

Why do you coddle Corns?

Why soak them and pare them? It brings only brief relief.

Blue-jay will stop the pain instantly. It will end the corn completely, and in 48 hours. It is doing that to a million corns a month.

The chemist who invented Blue-jay solved the whole corn problem.

Apply it, and the corn is forgotten. It will never pain again. Gently the Blue-jay then loosens the corn, and in two days the corn comes out.

No pain, no soreness, no annoyance. And that corn will never need treatment again.

Old-time methods will not do this. Let no one claim they will. But Blue-jay does it, and has done it for sixty million corns.

Prove this to-night.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

CHRISTIAN HERALD PRAYER LEAGUE

A GRATEFUL mother writes from Tennessee: "I joined the noon-hour Prayer League some time ago, and delight to meet with you daily. I wrote and asked the prayers of all in behalf of my son, who is at the 'Central Hospital,' and want to acknowledge that God is answering our prayers. The last letter states that he is improving mentally and physically." Another grateful friend writes from Clinton, S. C.: "I want to acknowledge the Father's goodness in answering the prayers of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family in behalf of the loved one suffering from curvature of the spine. He is partly restored, after years of suffering."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

Mrs. N. O. E., Lynchburg, Va.; M. A. B., Hale, Mo.; Mrs. F. A. McCollumn, Maxton, N. C.; V. V. L.; Sedalia, Tenn.; Mrs. K. A. D., Wampaca, Wis.; M. K., Ludlow, Mass.; Mrs. E. B. N. H., Gossville, N. H.; R. W. B., Cashmere, Wash.; Mrs. G. H., Ottawa, Ontario, Canada; Mrs. E. McC., Westmoreland, N. H.; Mrs. M. A. McC., Nevada, Mo.; Mrs. William Riggs, Weatherby, Mo.; Mrs. H. E. T., Winner, S. D.; Mrs. J. A. H., Dykes, Mo.; A. R., South Bethlehem, N. Y.; Mrs. R. L. C.; Nernet, Calif.; A. L. H., New York, N. Y.; Mrs. I. S., Shawnee, Okla.; A Reader, South Omaha, Neb.; A Subscriber, Eugene, Ore.; J. L., Westmoreland, Kan.; A "Kentucky Girl."

The following very sad letter comes from a friend in South Carolina. We know the members of the Prayer League will make it the subject of very special prayer. Let us pray particularly that the father's faith may be strengthened, and that God's will may be perfectly revealed to him:

"Several years ago I had a dear baby boy desperately ill, and had him in New York twice for treatment. I requested the prayers of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and many others, for his recovery, but we lost him. Since then I confess I am somewhat skeptical as to the efficacy of prayer in the healing of diseases. I believe God is able, of course, but does he choose to interfere when nature's laws are in operation? My dear wife is now critically ill. In the light of my past experience I confess I can not pray with much faith for her recovery. Others among your readers have more faith than I have. If there is virtue in it, God can hear and answer their prayers. I therefore request them for the recovery of my wife's health if it be his will."

Specially urgent prayers also come from B. B.; M. E. M.; E. B. C.; E. J. S., for opportunity to become a missionary, or pastor's assistant, and spiritual fitness for the task; M. L., that she may not be compelled to foreclose a mortgage assigned to her without her consent. The money is needed but she does not wish to cause distress by foreclosure.

M. A. B. asks prayer for a spiritual awakening and conversion of many souls at Hale, Mo.; Mrs. F. A. M. C. for revivals at Maxton and Polkton, N. C.; Mrs. M. C. G., for a revival at McDade, Texas; Mrs. J. H. N., for spiritual help in a community in California; Mrs. N. E. S., for a revival at Hendersonville, N. C.; Mrs. J. A. H., for a revival at Dykes, Mo.; A. J. M., for revival in a Home at Port Orchard, Wash.; Mrs. L. O. W., for moral and religious uplift of community of Esmont, Va.; A. W. S., for a revival at Hackley, La., and the salvation of many souls; Mrs. L. M. N., that a pastor, filled with the Master's spirit, may be sent to a church at Sanbornton, N. H.; Mrs. M. V. that strife in a Michigan church may cease; Mrs. I. H. B., that a church at Orrville, Ohio, may receive a pastor filled with the Holy Spirit.

Mrs. L. G., Mrs. L. M. T. and Mrs. L. O. W. ask prayer that eyesight may be restored; Mrs. N. E. S., that failing eyesight be restored; A. C., that threatened blindness may be averted; Mrs. M. C., that her son's eyesight may be restored.

The following friends ask prayer for assurance of sins forgiven, a deeper work of grace, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing:

I. M. B.; L. E. J.; Mrs. M. A.; Mrs. N. E. S.; Mrs. S. S.; H. S. P.; F. A. G.; Mrs. L. G.; Mrs. A. W. (that self and three daughters may know sins are forgiven); Rev. J. P. B. (endowed with spiritual power to preach and better knowledge of word of God); Mrs. M. D.; A Reader, Cumberland, Md.; A Reader, Healdville, Vt.

The following friends ask prayer for the conversion of sons:

M. A. P. (that son who once professed Christ may come back to fold and overcome bad habits); F. G. H.; Mrs. H. M. F.; Mrs. F. A. G.; Mrs. T. J. C. (that son may be converted and overcome drink habit); Mrs. M. L.; Mrs. J. H. N.; Mrs. M. H. W.; Wife and Mother, Amsterdam, N. Y.; Mrs. S. A. B.; Mrs. N. I. (that son may be converted and return home); Mrs. I. S.; G. M. D.; Mrs. M. C. (for conversion of two sons; that one may overcome drink habit).

The following friends ask prayer for the conversion of husbands:

HIT THE SPOT

Postum Knocked Out Coffee Ails.

There's a good deal of satisfaction and comfort in hitting upon the right thing to rid one of the varied and constant ailments caused by coffee drinking.

"Ever since I can remember," writes an Ind. woman, "my father has been a lover of his coffee, but the continued use of it so affected his stomach that he could scarcely eat at times.

"Mother had coffee-headache and dizziness, and if I drank coffee for breakfast I would taste it all day and usually go to bed with a headache.

"One day father brought home a pkg. of Postum recommended by our grocer. Mother made it according to directions on the box and it just 'hit the spot.' It has a dark, seal-brown color, changing to golden brown when cream is added, and a snappy taste similar to mild, high-grade coffee, and we found that its continued use speedily put an end to all our coffee ills.

"That was at least ten years ago and Postum has, from that day to this been a standing order of father's grocery bill.

"When I married, my husband was a great coffee drinker, altho he admitted that it hurt him. When I mentioned Postum he said he did not like the taste of it. I told him I could make the taste all right. He smiled and said, 'try it.' The result was a success, he won't have anything but Postum."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. Made in the cup with hot water—no boiling. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

ROMANISM REJECTED IN ROME

FROM the Italian papers we learn that in Rome of fifty thousand pupils of the public schools, only 1,403 of their parents have asked for Romanist religious instruction. Romanists, called "clericals" in Italy, had made such tumult against the city administration, which refused to make obligatory the teaching of the religion of the Pope, that a chance was given the parents to vote on the subject, with the result that the "clericals" have been overwhelmingly defeated.

To hear them it seemed that the municipality was guilty of an attempt against the liberty of conscience of fifty thousand families, by denying to their children a form of religious instruction which is not desired. That is what the "clericals" mean by liberty; the imposition of their religion on people who do not want it, a religion which, after all, is not Catholic, but purely Papist.

How many Romans, do you think, go to kiss the Pope's shoe? Perhaps not one. But pilgrims from abroad, including some silly Protestants, who want to have a look at the "old man of the Vatican," submit to the ceremony of toe-kissing, and help to maintain such imposture.

It is time to challenge the false assertion that the Italian people are a Roman Catholic people. They are not! They are anti-clerical, and preeminently so. If we except certain towns, where tradition has taken the place of reason, those who think they are convinced Romanists are a minority. The greater number of so-called Roman Catholics do not follow the precepts of the Roman Church. The greater part of them do not care for religion, and are claimed by the church only because they were baptized. Many others are both anti-Roman Catholics and anti-clericals, and many have changed their religion; yet the Roman Church counts them among its flock. Of such Catholics is the people of Italy composed. The Romanist religious instruction is no longer obligatory in the schools of Italy, and having been put at the disposal of the fathers of families, it has been rejected by the majority.

PROTESTANTS DENOUNCED AS "HERETICS"

From a London Letter in the Western Watchman, St. Louis, June 18

LAST Sunday great numbers of Catholics met at Barcelona in the House of the People with the object of protesting against the so-called Protestant Congress which met fifteen days ago in the Palace of Fine Arts in the same city. Señor Ildefonsus Cebrino, who opened the meeting, severely blamed the government for permitting this heretical demonstration, and urged Catholics to take the offensive and not simply act on the defensive against the continued and insidious advances of these proselyters. Other orators reproached the authorities still more energetically for their supine amiability to these alien religionists, and a somewhat political complexion was given to the meeting by the speech of Señor Pascual, director of La Trinchera, who said that the responsibility for these concessions to Protestants lay with the highest personages of the State and that to defend Don Jaime of Bourbon was to defend the religion of Spain. He revolted against the present dynasty and said that if the king was to govern as he should, he ought not at the same time to be responsible, and yet hide behind his administration. Several telegrams were despatched by the meeting, amongst which was one to the Apostolic Nuncio at Madrid, which ran as follows:

The Catholics assembled at the House of the People protest against the complaisance of the government towards false religions, and they beg you will transmit to his holiness in Rome their sentiments of filial submission.

Your Cooking and Baking Done 10 Days Free

Will you let us take the drudgery of cooking and baking off your hands for ten days—just a test—if we do it absolutely free—absolutely without a single penny from you?

Will you let us relieve you of the hottest and hardest part of your kitchen work—let us give you more leisure, more time for social pleasures, for shopping, for resting and keeping cool—if there is no obligation whatever?

A Mere Request Brings You This Automatic Cook

Just say the word and we will put in your kitchen, on ten days' free trial, the best servant any woman ever had—our No. 32 Perfection Fireless Steel Range—an automatic cook that will be a bigger help to you than a maid.

We are willing to do this just to prove to you—by actual demonstration—that this new kind of fireless stove will cut your kitchen work in two; that it will do all your cooking and baking without the slightest attention from you except to put your foods in and take them out; that it will give you better things to eat, from soup to dessert, than when cooked in the old way, and that it will save 60 per cent. to 80 per cent. on fuel and also reduce your meat and grocery bills.

You can make this ten-day test without sending us a single cent. And there won't be a solitary penny to pay if you are willing to send the range back after you see what a convenience and economy it is.

Let It Get All Your Meals

Slavery to the kitchen the grind of cooking three meals a day, especially in hot weather—the burden of watching over a hot stove to see that things don't burn—is helping make nervous wrecks of thousands of women. But a Perfection Fireless Range will free you from all that. Cooking and baking will no longer tie you down to the kitchen. All you have to do is to start the meals—this automatic cook does the rest. You never have to look at a single thing from the time you put it in until you are ready to eat. Absolutely no danger of scorching or burning or overcooking.

Sunday Dinner Cooked While You Are at Church

Think of the convenience of putting your Sunday dinner in to cook, from the chicken to the pie, cake or pudding, while washing the breakfast dishes, then going to church, knowing that everything will be done to a delicious turn and ready to serve whenever you get home.

Let It Help You With Preserving

You will find a Perfection Fireless Range a wonderful help in your canning and preserving. Fruits and vegetables which cook up flat and mushy the old way come out of the Perfection whole and delicious—and all without the slightest watching—and no gas, coal or wood fire going to make your kitchen like a furnace.

A Real Fireless Range Not a Mere Box

The Perfection isn't a mere fireless box. It is a real range—the only fireless cooker that is range high, that you don't have to stoop or get down on your knees to use, that has iron and steel range construction and finish and range handiness throughout. It is the only fireless with a patent disappearing oven, and the only one with a handy shelf for all cooking utensils.

Pays for Itself Out of What It Saves

A Perfection Fireless Range isn't an expense, but a positive economy. It keeps on paying for itself over and over, year after year, in what it saves on fuel. And it keeps on paying for itself over and over in what it saves on meats. For instance, a chuck roast cooked in the Perfection will equal an expensive rib roast cooked on a gas, coal or wood stove. Or a round steak will come out of the Perfection as juicy and tender as an expensive porterhouse or tenderloin cooked the old way. Also meats cooked in the Perfection will weigh at least 25 per cent. more when done than if cooked by gas or coal fire. All this is simply because none of the flavor, juices or nutriment escapes in steam or smoke.

Send No Money

With all its many advantages—with complete equipment, including a free set of the famous "Wear-Ever" brand of cooking utensils that would cost $5 or $6 at any store—the No. 32 Perfection Fireless Steel Range costs only a dollar or so more than most of the old-fashioned cooker boxes, which are nothing but makeshifts compared with this.

And remember that you can have a Perfection put in your kitchen for ten days' free trial without sending us a single cent. Then, if you are willing to part with it, simply send it back at our expense—we will pay freight both ways—and you won't owe us a penny. Or, if you want to keep it, simply send us the special Direct-from-Factory price of $14 cash (a saving of $10 under the price which the No. 32 Perfection has always sold for in stores); or, if you prefer, you can pay for it in small monthly payments of $3 each, as explained in the coupon below.

Better mail the coupon now. Instead of being tied down to your kitchen this hot weather, let our automatic cook get your meals ten days free.

Complete Outfit of "Wear-Ever" Aluminum Cooking Utensils and other equipment absolutely FREE with each range

Questions and Answers

C. S. D., Freedom, Pa. 1. The passage in Col. 2: 14 implies that having forgiven us (verse 13) he has "wanted out" (canceled or effaced) the law's indictment against us, according to the Decalogue. "Which was against us" may be translated as "adversary to us." Christ in his person is bearing the curse of the broken law and has "nailed it to his cross," assuming it himself and redeeming us from the burden. It was an ancient custom, in canceling bonds, to strike a nail through the writing, and this illustration the apostle may have had in mind. 2. Verse 16 is explained as meaning that believers "being complete in Christ, and all purely subordinate means, as essential to acceptance with him, being dispensed with, no regard need be paid to any one who sits in judgment on the believer as to legalistic observances in respect to foods, or feasts, or as to those Sabbaths that related to the Jewish Day of Atonement and the Feast of Tabernacles—not, however, the weekly Sabbath, which was divinely instituted at the close of creation. 3. Eph. 2: 15 should be read in connection with the three preceding verses. The law was the "partition" or fence, which Christ abolished, so far as its power to create enmity between us and God and to condemn us is concerned, substituting for it the law of love, that he might make the two (Jew and Gentile) one new man, each incorporated in the other and through himself reconciled to God, in whom we are all one in Christ as we were but one in Adam." Such is Dean Alford's exposition of the passage.

M. E. M., Canada. The name "Pentecostal" is assumed by various religious bodies, which differ widely in their beliefs and practices. Some of them are extremists, while others are sound and wholesome. The denomination to which you probably refer, though you have evidently been somewhat misinformed about its genesis, is the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene. This is a movement officered by able and well-balanced people and the denomination has had a remarkably rapid growth and a creditable history. It was the outgrowth of almost simultaneous movements in New England, New York and California. The Association of Pentecostal Churches, including the New York and New England groups, was formed largely under the leadership of William Howard Hoople of Brooklyn, in 1894. About the same time the Church of the Nazarenes was established in California under the leadership of Dr. Bresee. Some years later the two organizations united under their present name and later the Southern Holiness Church became a part of the denomination. The church last year numbered 21,877 communicants and 835 ministers. Its doctrines are identical with those of the Methodist Church, but its form of government is largely congregational.

S. N. M., Gen Mary, Tenn. 1. The persecution of Christians dates from the beginning of Christianity. According to McClintock and Strong, there were ten pagan persecutions of the Christian Church, viz.: 1. Under Nero (A.D. 64) when great multitudes perished. 2. Under Domitian, when in one year (A.D. 95) many suffered martyrdom. 3. Under Trajan (98-117) he accused Ignatius, who was carried over accused and executed, mostly without even a pretense of legal trial. 4. Under Antoninus, when the persecutions took a wider range. Then came the persecutions under Severus, Maximinus, Decius, Valerian, Aurelian and Diocletian. In the last decade of the relentless pursuit hundreds of thousands were slain; 144,000 in Egypt alone, while [illegible] succumbed to the hardship and fatigue they were compelled to face. Persecutions by Catholics [illegible] In Germany, France, Bohemia, Hungary, Belgium and Holland the victims were almost innumerable. The Bosom martyrs who died for their faith are estimated at [illegible]. In France in the time of Charles IX the St. Bartholomew's Day massacre, it is said, extended [illegible]. But all previous persecutions seem to have been eclipsed by the infernal persecution of Protestants in France in the time of Louis XIV. Ten countries were free from such persecution, England, Ireland, Scotland, Spain, Italy, as experienced them in 1685, some much more heavily than others.

M. C. R., Menello, Ark. We do not know of any that do so.

J. M. D., Elba, Ala. In Mark 14: 51, 52 the young man who left his garment and fled is supposed by commentators to have been Mark himself, the most probable view being that he suppressed his own name, while telling of an incident of which he was an eye witness.

J. W. R., Butler, Mo. 1. No. 2. There is an apocryphal book called "The Infancy of Jesus," which deals with the subject. It is of early monkish origin, and is not regarded as authoritative or important.

M. A. G., Livonia, Mo. 1. The "Book of the Maccabees," although historically of some value, was excluded among other writings as apocryphal by the early church councils.

J. S. B., Marion, Idaho. There have been various opinions regarding the "Song of Solomon." Many divines have held that the book was a spiritual allegory of Christ and the church. Others hold it to be an epithalamium or wedding song of Syrin, characteristic of the poetry and customs of the country and full of the poetic imagery of the Orient.

Subscriber, Grass Lake, Mich., writes: "I want to thank you for your article in the last Herald on 'Church and State in France,' also for your manly and timely stand on the Roman Catholic question. Many, if not most, of the church papers and about all the secular papers are strangely silent."

M. G., Pasadena, Calif., writes: "I received the flag and portfolio of the Panama Canal, and am delighted with them, and thank you very much. I see in the last Christian Herald the letter of a lady from LeRoy, Mich., doubting the genuineness of the Babylonian tablets. I showed mine to a lady who has traveled a great deal, and she said: 'Any one would know it was genuine,' and of course she herself believed it, and considered me fortunate in securing such a valuable and historic relic. I am very proud of it." Our correspondent and all who have received these tablets have the assurance of the most distinguished Assyriologists as to their genuineness. We took every precaution to satisfy ourselves on that score before offering them to our readers. We regard them as priceless relics of antiquity.

J. F. B. You are not obliged to mention any persons in your will, to whom you do not wish to bequeath anything. It was at one time a custom to leave a nominal sum to all immediate relatives, in order to show that the testator had them in mind in making the will, and had not omitted them by inadvertence. From this custom arose the expression "cutting one off with a shilling." This rule is no longer generally in force, and the fact that legacies are left to friends instead of cousins, and that cousins are not mentioned, would not invalidate the will. No one, however, should attempt to make a will without first consulting an attorney.

H. A., Bear Lake, Mich. In the Old Testament there are many passages which deal with the natural order of events: birth, life, death, the grave, etc. The great question of immortality was one of which the ancient races had only a dim foreshadowing, although they were by no means ignorant of it, as numerous passages show. Thus, it was written of Enoch that, because he had lived a pious life, God took him, so that he was no more among men. Paul, speaking of Jacob, says he regarded life as a journey, and that all the patriarchs looked forward to a life after death. (See Heb. 11: 13-16.) In Ex. 3: 6, the implication is clear that Jehovah is the God of the living patriarchs still, although they had long been dead. See also Isa. 14: 9; Job 19: 25-27; Ps. 17: 15; 49: 15; 73: 24; Isa. 26: 19; Dan. 12: 2, and Eccles. 12: 7. It remained for Christ by his teachings, his death and his resurrection, to bring "life and immortality to light" in the fullest measure. It is only in the clear light of the Gospel that we find the veil removed and the future life fully illuminated.

The story on the "Bible and Newspaper" page recently about Marona, the record Guernsey cow, should have given the milk in pounds and the butter as butter-fat. The American Guernsey Cattle Club has since published the record of "May Rilma 22761," beating Marona's, and being as follows for the year ending May 31: 19,673 lbs. milk and 1,073.41 lbs. butter-fat; nearly ten tons of milk and the equivalent of 1,260 lbs. of butter.

Rev. H. P. S., of Carroll, Iowa, calls attention to a statement in the Mail-Bag of June 24, regarding the marriage of first and second cousins. He writes: "Since July 1, 1912, we have a law in the State of Iowa, expressly forbidding the marriage of first cousins." It may here be added that marriages between first cousins are now prohibited in Arizona, Arkansas, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Louisiana, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota and Wyoming.

A. L. L., McLane, Pa. Under the law of Pennsylvania, a widow receives one-third of the personal property absolutely, and the life-use of one-third of the real estate. The fact that there are minor children makes no difference, so far as the widow is concerned, as to the date of settlement.

W. N., Medley, W. Va. The observance of Christmas cannot be traced farther back than the second century, when it was celebrated in secret by Christians who were being greatly persecuted. In the third century it was celebrated by the Eastern Church, and in the fourth this example was followed by the Western. It was the taste of the age to multiply festivals, and this tendency led to the general observance of Christmas throughout the Christian world. The actual date and day of Christ's birth is not stated in Scripture. Consequently, it is regarded by church historians as probable that the Christmas festival was substituted for the ancient pagan festivals which took place during the winter, thus, as one writer remarks, "transforming and sanctifying the heathen custom and bringing it over to Christian use."

Constant Reader, Urbana, Ill. "Foreordination" and "predestination" are terms which, in past centuries, have given rise to endless controversy. For their history and development we must refer you to any standard theological cyclopedia, as they cannot be dealt with in a Mail-Bag paragraph. "Divine predestination in its widest sense," says one writer, "is God's free and perfect foreplanning of creation and providence." See Rom. 8: 29; 9: 10; Eph. 1: 5 and other passages.

J. B., Dayton, Ohio. 1. The word "damnation," as used in Scripture to denote the final loss of the soul, is not always, according to the newer versions, to be understood in precisely the same sense. Thus, in the old versions, the reading in Rom. 13: 2, "They that resist shall receive to themselves damnation," is now held by the later translators to be more accurately expressed by the word "condemnation" (from the rulers, as the whole passage implies). Again, in I Cor. 11: 29, the well-known passage is rendered by the new versions "eateth and drinketh judgment unto himself," etc. In John 5: 29, "resurrection of damnation" is rendered "resurrection of judgment." 2. The influence of your example on others is a serious consideration. Conscience is not always enlightened; if it were, we would see our own thoughts, motives and acts in their true spiritual perspective and would strive, with divine help, to make them so that they would never be a stumbling-block to others.

Mrs. L. M., Marshall, Wis. We have not seen the account which you mention, but would be inclined to regard it as greatly exaggerated.

Perplexed Wife, Brooklyn, N. Y. There are bathing suits to which no exception can be taken, and any sensible and self-respecting woman should know where to draw the line. If she does not, she should take counsel with some one who does know. At some of the beaches, vulgar suits are ruled out.

Mrs. B. A. P., Marcus, Iowa. "Corpus Christi" is a festival of the Roman Catholic Church, in honor of the consecrated host and of transubstantiation. It is said to have originated in 1230 in a vision which appeared to a nun of Liege named Juliana.

W. C. B., Independence, Kan. 1. No record of the church you mention. 2. In writing up family genealogical tablets, begin with the earliest progenitors of the father, down to his marriage; then give the genealogy of the mother in like manner down to marriage. Follow with the names, birth dates, etc., of their children.

THE ANGEL AT THE GATE

SEQUEL TO "THE UNLOCKED GATES"
BY ALICE J. WHITTIER

IN a vision of the sunset,
In its glorious, golden tide,
Once I saw a wall of jasper;
Saw the gates were open wide.
And my soul rejoiced with singing,
For our earthly bolts and bars:
Sped my spirit's lonely yearning
To the welcome of the stars.

And I saw the long procession
Winding home o'er hill and plain;
They the loved, the lost, the loving,
Welcoming their own again,
Heard the music and the feasting
When our Father's house is filled;
When the Master heads the table
And the fatted calf is killed.

Then I clasped the Book of Promise
To my heart as treasure rare.
Well I knew the gems within it,
Yet I traced again with care.
Yes, the gates are always open,
Twelve, and set on every side;
Open eastward, northward, southward;
To the westward welcome wide.

"At the gates twelve angels" standing?
Yes, twelve angels of the Lord.
Then a sudden question troubled
All my spirit's sweet accord.
Are the gates of heaven guarded?
Must we pass a warder grim,
When our weary hearts have journeyed
Oh, so far, to come to Him?

Then my spirit's soaring pinions
Dropped once more to earth and pain,
Till I took the Book of Promise,
Took and read therein again;
Read that mystic invitation
Thrice repeated, wonder-wide:
"Whosoever will, that cometh,
Freely take of life's glad tide."

Then the far light flamed to glory,
And the chimes of heaven rang.
Then my soul, caught up in rapture,
Heard the angels as they sang;
Saw a marvelous procession
To the gates of heaven wind,
When our Lord returned in triumph
With the ransom of mankind.

"Lift your heads," the trumpet soundeth;
"Up, ye everlasting doors!"
Lo! the mighty concourse answered
As the wind-swept ocean roars,
"In shall come the King of Glory!"
Then unto our sin-torn race
Oped those gates—and with the angels
Worshiped I upon my face.

And the Son of Man in glory
Seated on his Father's throne,
Left the gates of heaven open
For the coming of his own;
And on earth the invitation
Sounds to every land and race,
That the nations come and gather
To the shining of his face.

But He knows the way is weary
And his friends are fain to fear;
So he set the fairest angels
At each pearly gateway near,
Just to welcome you, beloved.
Take this word where'er you roam:
Just to welcome in his loved ones,
As we, one by one, come home.

SUNDAY SCHOOL HOSTS PLAN ADVANCE

BY REV. WILBUR F. CRAFTS, Ph.D.

YOUR correspondent has attended forty conventions and conferences in a year past, half of them national, international and world conventions, relating to religion, education, peace, purity, alcohol and opium; and this International Sunday School Convention is surely the best of all, partly because its wide range includes about all that was scattered through the others. The enthusiastic reception of the Japanese delegates, and letters from Count Okuma, the premier, made the convention seem at one time like an international peace conference.

On one of the autos of Saturday's great parade, near the front of the procession with half a dozen other men, rode a quiet, genial man in a white flannel suit who has been to the whole convention and the whole Sunday school work of the world like the knightly Navarre of the white plume, which was ever at the front in the forward charge. I refer to one often spoken of as "dear Marion Lawrance." "Where he sits, there is the head of the table." He is the king of the Sunday school world, who both reigns and rules, and yet scarcely shows his scepter. It is a case where those well-known lines,

> The bravest are the tenderest,
> The loving are the daring,

most truly apply.

In the morning of the day of the parade he took the annual offering for a budget of $100,000 a year—forty per cent. advance on the preceding budget. There was no sound of machinery, rather "a spirit in the wheels" that made it easy to give, hard to withhold. He called us to: 1. A vision of God. 2. A vision of the Bible. 3. A vision of the field.

Bidding us bow our heads he "led in prayer" in a most novel and helpful way, suggesting things we should silently thank God for; then things for which we should ask God, and then very quietly he harvested the willing gifts, which in most cases were in advance of last year. Following the plan of the International Sunday School Association in giving a tenth to the World's Association, many States and provinces pledged a tenth of their income to the International. "Missions," Mr. Lawrance explained, "are not a feature of church work; they are the whole of it; and helping the man at your own door is as truly missionary work as stretching the hand of help to men beyond the sea."

Mr. Lawrance is supported by about as many other leaders, including employed officers, trustees and other committees, as make up the Congress at Washington, not one whit less intellectual or less patriotic than the men in Congress, and far more dynamic. Sunday school workers, as Jefferson recognized, are chief trainers for good citizenship. Mr. E. K. Warren, president of the Board of Trustees, and vice-president of the association, is the Greatheart among the big business men who are making money chiefly that through its use in Sunday school work they may make a "better world" here and now. Mr. Warren illustrates the text, "The Lord loveth a hilarious giver." His Sunday school work makes him a big boy, illustrating also the teaching of Ruskin and Eggleston that the secret of leadership is to keep the enthusiasm of childhood while adding the maturity of manhood, of which the grandest picture is in the Christ who came to aged John on Patmos, with "head and hair as white as snow, and eyes as a flame of fire." Mr. Warren is not only weighty in giving, but also in counsel. Mr. Fred A. Wells, chairman of the executive committee, the most responsible office of all, is another business man who follows Pentecost with a book of Acts—first spiritual, then practical; and there are fifty more business men in that committee who remind one of Carey's saying that his business was serving God while he made shoes for a living. A fine group, too, of bishops and preachers render free and efficient service on the executive.

Best of all in the personnel of the convention and of the association is the strong faculty of employed workers. Next to the chief, Marion Lawrance, already described, stands Mr. W. C. Pearce, who has been at the same time the chief of staff for Mr. Lawrance (he is to be that altogether hereafter, as associate secretary) and superintendent of the Adult Department, where the greatest growth of the Sunday school has occurred in late years. More new men join the Sunday school than boys, and that is the best way to recover the fourteen millions of boys and men lost from the Sunday schools in recent years to which Fred B. Smith pointed us in an address at once terrific in its call to better work and encouraging from the new standards business men and politicians are adopting. The other superintendents, whose work also gives delightful satisfaction are: Mary Foster Bryner, Elementary Division; Mr. John L. Alexander, Secondary Division; Rev. Franklin McElfresh, Teacher Training; Mr. J. Shreve Durham, House and Visitation; Rev. Wm. A. Brown, Missions; Rev. H. C. Lyman, Work among Negroes.

All these are salaried officers, as is also W. Merritt, who works the "Southwest Field," and Aquila Ducas, who works in parts of Latin America. Two other superintendents, not salaried, are accomplishing good results, and Mrs. Zillah Foster Stevens of the Temperance Department, and Mr. E. K. Mohr of the Purity Department. There is no possibility of even naming the instructive and inspiring speakers swiftly succeeding each other at twenty-minute intervals in more than one hundred meetings of several hours each. The retiring president, Mr. William N. Hartshorn, whose portrait was presented to the convention by General J. H. Heinz, first came into Sunday school work with his wife, since deceased, as a teacher of little children; and he, too, with all his wealth, which is consecrated to the Sunday school, keeps the heart of a child. The new president, Rev. H. M. Hamill, D.D., superintendent of teacher training in the Southern Methodist Church is the first preacher and first employed Sunday school worker who has been honored by an election to the presidency. There is also some significance in the fact that he is the champion of the uniform lessons, which manifestly are not likely to be retired by the aggressive champions of the graded series, many of whom do not seem to be satisfied to let every Sunday school decide for itself. Dr. Hamill is one of those who believe that it is possible to grade the uniform lessons, and presented a plan for that purpose signed also by Amos R. Wells, Wilbur F. Crafts and Mr. Charles G. Trumbull.

Grading the Uniform Lessons

The plan proposed for grading the uniform lessons is to select the new series of uniform lessons, by aid of expert lesson writers for all grades, with a view to having a part at least of each lesson such as Timothy might have known from a child and by it have been made wise unto salvation, and to aid in adaptation by having different topics and different golden texts, whenever it would be helpful, for elementary, teen age and adult divisions of each school. The splendid pageant of Saturday evening, prepared by the Congregationalist Pilgrim Press, gave a very favorable picture of graded lesson work, preceded by tableaux of Hebrew and Catholic and Reformation teaching in earlier ages. But concerning this burning issue of "graded lessons," nor any other question on which differences of opinion has existed, such as

THE CRY OF MOSLEM CHILDHOOD

MOHAMMED, the prophet of Arabia, was a great genius, a poet and a leader of men, but he could never have said, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of Mohammedanism." His life, his book, and his ideals of religion afford no place for the heart of a little child.

Purity and gentleness do not find here their ideal. One of the saddest facts that the missionary has to face is this: Among the enormous literature that has grown up for thirteen centuries past based upon the Koran and other religious books of Islam, there is scarcely a book suitable for boys and girls to read. Everything bears the imprint of the religion which is degraded because of its low ideals of marriage and the home. The result is seen in the lives of little children.

The first thing that appeals to us when we think of Moslem children is their large number. Scattered over all Africa, especially north of the equator, all of western and central Asia and the island world to the south, we find more than 80,000,000 Moslem children under fourteen years of age. The group of pictures with this article shows us some of them. In the Dutch East Indies alone there are 12,000,000 boys and girls.

In Algeria there are no less than 331,287 baby boys under five years of age, and 7,110,488 between five and fourteen. The cry of Moslem childhood as regards numbers equals the cry of a population more than ten times as great as greater London. God hears their cry. Shall we?

The statistics alone cannot give any adequate conception of the neglected condition and the pitiful need of these children who are without Christ and without hope. Their physical condition is pitiful. Infant mortality is enormous, due to ignorance, superstition, vice and early marriage.

In Persia it is estimated that the mortality of infants rises to 85 per cent., and these children all grow up in a demoralizing environment.

In Syria, girls are married at twelve and sometimes are grandmothers at twenty-five. The language of the nursery, the deceitfulness of the harem life, the intrigues of polygamy are all of them calculated to teach things that the young boys ought not to know. Their earliest training is entirely based on the Koran, a book which has been called "a Procrustean bed of the human intellect." It dwarfs, paralyzes, petrifies thought and life. It is the gross ignorance of the parents that dwarfs the children mentally and morally. The average Moslem school is splendidly adapted to develop narrow intolerance and unthinking fanatics. Although they memorize the Koran, they cannot understand it, and in three-fourths of the Moslem world the prayers are said in a language which is not understood by the people.

Things are left out of the lives of these children which are put in where Christianity rules: Pictures, music, toys, books, the Sabbath, and the home, and things are put into their lives which should have been left out forever.

Sex hygiene, for example, is taught in such a coarse way, although the teaching is religious, that it forever defiles their minds and hearts. Any one who has ever read Moslem primers or catechisms will admit the truth of this statement. As one looks at the faces of these little children before they reach their teens, the possibilities of a glorious hope are reflected from their bright eyes and one cannot help having faith in their future. They are bright, intelligent, responsive. If only we could reach out and draw them in before evil days come of prejudice and opposition, of eyes blinded and ears stopped against the message! Of one thing we are certain. Christ loves them and he bids us call them to himself.

Many of these children still live beyond the furthest outreach of any mission station, in lands still utterly neglected. Others are being drawn into our schools and hospitals and for the first time look into the face of Jesus Christ as described in the Gospel. What a splendid opportunity to reach them!

One of the great needs is adequate literature for Moslem childhood. Something has been done, but much remains. The Nile Mission Press at Cairo is hoping shortly to publish a magazine for boys and girls. Will you not pray that it may be a success?

I think when I read that sweet story of old,
When Jesus was here among men,
How he took little children as lambs to his fold.
How I wish they had been with him then.

GLORIOUS POSSIBILITIES ARE REFLECTED FROM THEIR EYES

MOSLEM BEGGARS

PURITY AND GENTLENESS ARE NOT IDEAL WITH THESE

OUR CHAPLAINS ON THE FLEET

BY CHAPLAIN T. B. THOMPSON, UNITED STATES NAVY

THE last army appropriation bill has enlarged and more accurately defined the work of the army chaplain, and has granted him an allowance of $1,200 a year for such equipment as may advance his work more advantageously, and make him more efficient in meeting the needs of the soldier. Moving pictures, illustrated lectures, phonographs, reading-rooms are all furnished where the conditions warrant; and while religious worship is regularly conducted and Bible classes not omitted, the soldier now has many more ways of healthfully and wholesomely spending his spare time, while the chaplain also has new and added ways to make his appeal and to direct the higher interests of the men.

The provision for an increase in the corps of chaplains for the navy to the number of fifty or more more than doubles the corps's present strength. This increase will provide a chaplain for every 1,250 personnel, and furnish a religious representative for each large ship, training station and navy yard. The majority of the young men entering the army and navy service come from homes in which God has his rightful place, and from influences that have made them physically, mentally and morally fit to pass the examinations, and this same influence should be maintained as far as possible by our forces on land and sea.

There are five army chaplains in Vera Cruz; one attached to each infantry. The navy has one chaplain, attached to the marine expeditionary force. Those of the army are the following: J. F. Chenoweth of the Fourth Infantry; J. L. Griffes of the Seventh; R. R. Fleming, Jr., of the Nineteenth; S. C. Ramsen of the Twenty-eighth; L. C. Joyce of the Fifth. The navy chaplain on shore is B. R. Patrick, who is with the marines. Some of these chaplains have as many as nine posts and hold from one to nine services each Sunday.

Chaplain Chenoweth is located at Los Cocos, a station at the edge of the city proper; a club for the enlisted men where they can read, write and play games is a feature of his work. He also conducts the Sunday service in the club-room. A Bible class and Christian Endeavor are also regularly held each week.

Chaplain Griffes has several points to visit and his work covers a large territory. He has a tent, but finds the "open air" service the best for this season of the year. He reports a good attendance at the regular services, of which there are seven each week. He has a thriving Christian Endeavor Society, and operates three reading-rooms for the men.

Chaplain Fleming has rented the Olympia Theater, in which he holds regular Sunday service; the English-speaking people of the city are invited to join in this service. As you see him go about the city at his work, you at once realize he is a busy man and has the interests of the men at heart.

Chaplain Ramsen has perhaps the best location in the city. His infantry is in reserve and located in the quarantine buildings near the lighthouse landing. Moving picture programs furnish popular amusement and diversion for the long evenings, while the roof-garden gives added joys and diversions during the day or evening. The attendance at the moving pictures ranges from 800 to 1,000 men. The roof-garden is equipped with phonograph, reading and writing material, as well as other minor furnishings, and is a very popular place. Many soldiers are here given an opportunity in an attractive form to resist the temptations and sinful attractions of the city, and keep themselves clean.

Chaplain Patrick has a large constituency scattered over a wide area. He has been conducting services at nine different points, and has a service at the brigade headquarters to which he invites the English-speaking people of the city. It is impossible for him to cover all the ground, and some of the chaplains in the fleet are assisting him on Sunday afternoons. Chaplain Patrick has opened a club for the marines that promises to be a success; there will be a reading-room, correspondence-room, and rooms for games, as well as other rooms for the comfort of the men.

The navy chaplains are more limited as to their field. Each chaplain's work is practically confined to his ship. The personal work of the chaplain on board ship is most important, and in this his example and conduct are very essential. The chaplain stands as a medium between the man and his home. The instruction given those who are deficient in the fundamental school branches; the special lectures at such times as circumstances and opportunities afford; the handling of libraries and reading-rooms for the crew; the conducting of moving picture shows; the visiting of the sick; the conducting of Bible classes and the regular divine service on Sunday, are other ways in which the chaplain on board a battleship does, or tries to do, an all round work for the general happiness of the ship.

With a large number of ships in the harbor it has been an easy matter to exchange moving-picture films and keep the crews amused in the evenings. The work in general shows that the men are in a happy mood and enjoying themselves at every opportunity. If the attendance at the regular divine services each Sunday bespeaks anything, we may be sure that the men are in general in good spirits and tone, for the attendance has been excellent.

EXPLORING THE MINE

THEY ARE HELD BACK AND KEPT IN ORDER

WATCHING THE CANARY

FOR SAFETY IN MINES

SCATTERED through 15,000 mines in the United States 700,000 men and boys throw out a half billion tons of coal annually. In the past seventeen years close to 34,000 of these workers have died as a result of accident in the mines, an average of nearly 2,000 a year, and almost half a million more have sustained injuries that in many cases crippled men for life. It is significant that the greater the quantity of coal mined per man at work, the higher is the percentage of injuries and deaths. The economic loss represented by the earning capacity of the killed and injured men runs into the hundreds of millions. It is this whole deplorable aspect of the mining industry that prompted the formation of a Bureau of Mines within the Department of the Interior in 1910, the "safety of miners" being the first objective. What that bureau has already accomplished in this important field of inquiry is well worth considering.

Nothing is more dull, crude, monotonous than the average coal mine town. Huddled about the workings, the low small houses shelter a race of fatalists—men who day and night take their lives in their hands without thought of fear; women who share those lives, toiling in the light, as their men in the eternal dark, through custom thinking little of evil chance, and children playing in the sun and thinking not at all. Shift follows shift, and the earth swallows them up for a time. In due season the cages bring them again to the light of sun or stars and the sweet air.

Then some day without warning, a vague rumor starts that all is not well. No one knows who got the word first or what the trouble is, but in some way it spreads and, as though called by a whistle blast, women, children, and such men as happen to be above ground rush to the pit mouth, crowding about the men on duty, calling questions, shouting, begging, cursing and praying, according to their bent. They are held back and kept in some sort of order until the first rush and shock has ceased. The men are called to their stations. They have all seen it before. Fire in the mine. Fire is nearly always started by explosion of mine gas—the fatal "fire-damp"—and the explosion generally brings down tons of coal in the workings, burying many, and imprisoning others in peril of fire, suffocation, starvation.

Time was when a crowd of lion-hearted, reckless miners would have rushed to the rescue of their fellows regardless of the consequences to themselves, taking no precautions, equipped with no apparatus for life-saving. Only a few years ago at the Hanna Mine in Wyoming some forty such would-be rescuers went into the mine after fifteen or sixteen men who had been caught in an explosion and the entire rescue party was killed. Such fatal heroism is fast becoming wholly unnecessary. In fact, such a need is becoming less and less likely to occur as the precautionary measures advocated by the Bureau of Mines are adopted by mine operators.

But to return to the scene of the accident. Already, under the new order of things, alarm has been sent by wire to the nearest "relief station," and a car fully equipped with a rescue crew and apparatus is on its way. These cars are always ready: daily record is sent to all mines, giving the exact location of each. Every large mine also now has its own rescue force especially trained by government experts, and these men act as leaders of emergency parties of four to six men each. Only such are allowed to join the expert rescue crew as have been tried and can be depended upon to keep their heads. They must be fine specimens, with lungs and hands and legs that will not fail when needed, and they must thoroughly understand the use of the breathing apparatus on which depends their success.

The breathing apparatus is much like a diver's equipment, and by its use a man may live for hours surrounded by poisonous gases, smoke and unbreathable air. Some depend on hose through which fresh air is forced from outside the mine; others are not connected with the outer air at all, but supply artificial air from small tanks carried on the back. The latter apparatus requires expert use.

BUREAU OF MINES RESCUE CREW

The men go about their work systematically. When they enter the area of poisonous gas they keep close to one another and are ordered not to separate under any circumstances. It goes without saying that a successful rescue party must first of all take every precaution for its own safety. Stretchers are always carried and a relief station or base of operation is established at the end of the good air, where another rescue crew wait with knapsacks, ready to put on their apparatus and start at a moment's notice. Meantime a patrol has been established covering doors and brattice for the protection of the relief. In dense smoke the crews further protect themselves by holding a rope leading to fresh air. A telephone is often used in shaft work to keep the men in touch with the surface. They also carry electric lamps, safety lamps (to detect the presence of gas), thermometers, gas analysis apparatus, compass and a map of the mine.

Thus equipped they make their way where unprotected men could not live, forcing entrance to the corridors blocked by the falls of coal to their unfortunate comrades. First-aid treatment is applied where necessary, and the injured are sent to the surface to be cared for, while those who are unhurt turn to and help under expert direction.

The bureau has now six mine accident investigation stations and eight training cars. Trained experts answer the call very much after the manner of a city fire department. They take charge of fire fighting and rescue work, heading the local volunteer parties. The coal fields of the country have been divided into districts, and a car is assigned to each, moving about from place to place where lectures and demonstrations are given. During the first ten months of this work more than one hundred thousand miners attended the lectures and received mine rescue training. In investigating the causes of mine fires and explosions the bureau has made a careful study of methods of protection against the poisonous gases responsible for many deaths. The "white damp" is the most feared and the most difficult to detect. Now mice and small birds are called upon to give warning, because they show the effects of the gas before a man can feel it. Weight for weight, a mouse will consume about fifteen times as much oxygen as a man, and where the amount of poisonous gas is so small that a man will not be harmfully affected for two hours a mouse will become giddy in ten minutes. Two or three mice are carried in a small cage and as soon as they show signs of distress both mice and men "gang awa'" if not "agley." Sometimes, however, mice are slow in responding to the presence of small percentages of gas and similar experiments have, therefore, been made with birds. Canaries seem to be best suited, since they show signs of distress most quickly, and the symptoms of poisoning are most clearly defined. The bird's balance on its perch is immediately lost, while a mouse may lose consciousness without changing its attitude on the floor of its cage. A cage has been devised with glass sides and a small oxygen tank; as soon as the symptoms of distress have warned the men and a retreat has commenced, the glass slides of the cage are closed and the oxygen chamber partly opened. The small occupant promptly revives, and, after a rest in the open air, is as good as new.

The movement for the establishment of rescue stations patterned after those of the Bureau of Mines is being extended as rapidly as possible for the purpose of training men locally in first-aid work so that they may be instantly available when needed. There are several hundred groups of such men now throughout the country and more are constantly forming. The larger mines have rescue stations of their own and several have also private rescue cars modeled upon those of the bureau.

SEEKING REST BY FLIGHT

BY

REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXTS: "Oh that I had wings like a dove! for then would I fly away, and be at rest." Ps. 55: 6
"Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee." Ps. 55: 22

I THINK you will see that there is a contrast here—that as you pass from one verse to the other there is a change in thought, in mood, and in outlook. And yet they are both the cries of one psalmist, and are included in the limits of one psalm. In the one there is a wild, stormy unrest; in the other there is the beginning of peace. Perhaps a night has intervened between them, for you know what one night's rest can do for a fevered mind and a despondent heart. At night I don't know what we were not going to do! We would resign our position! Matters had become intolerable! We would leave them as they were and get right away! Our resignation should be sent in the very next morning! And the morning came, but God had sent the sweet angel of sleep, and the feverishness had been allayed, and the impetuous impulse had been quieted, and the dawn came very peacefully!

Perhaps it was some soothing, quieting interlude which had similarly intervened in the life of the psalmist between the two expressions which I have taken for my texts. Here he is face to face with a great trouble, a sore difficulty, a heavy burden, and his first thoughts about it are exceedingly morbid and unhealthy. "Oh that I had wings like a dove! for then would I fly away." He wants to fly away from his burden. He would like to leave it there, just as it is, and get right away. He says that if he could only fly away he would be at rest. That was the mistake he made. No man ever finds rest by flying away from a burden. Whatever shape your trouble may take, you cannot find peace by desertion. God has ordained it otherwise. And the psalmist came to see it. At night he said: "My burden is greater than I can bear; would that I could fly away and leave it." When morning dawned his heart had come to calmer and clearer vision, and he said: "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee." No need to fly away! Rest is not gained by flight, but by seeking the power and strength of God. "Oh that I had wings like a dove! then would I fly away and be at rest." No! never; the path of flight is the way to weariness and pain. "Cast thy burden on the Lord, and he shall sustain thee"; yes, thou shalt be able to lift thyself up, and stand erect under the heaviest load.

Now, this disposition to seek rest from our burdens by flight is as prevalent to-day as in the days of the psalmist. We still try to fly away from our difficulties instead of seeking the strength of God to sustain them, and I want to ask your attention to one or two ways in which this flight is sometimes made.

The Temptation of Burdens

Here, then, is a man whose business affairs are becoming involved. His resources are being more and more impoverished. He feels as though he is being gradually and relentlessly closed in as by an iron wall. Night comes into his day, and the iron feet of anxiety crush all the joy out of his life. His cares accumulate until they become a huge burden, which lies like a cold, heavy stone upon his heart. This goes on for weeks and perhaps for months. The worry gnaws away at his heart without ceasing, and makes him depressed, and nervous, and irritable, unpleasant to his family, disagreeable to all his friends, and obnoxious to himself. At length when the burden is intolerable he cries in the bitterness of his soul: "Oh that I had wings like a dove! for then would I fly away, and be at rest."

Now that is an evil moment, a moment fraught with infinite peril, when a man begins to think of flying away from his burden. For in these matters thought is so speedily followed by purpose, and purpose so speedily followed by action, that even thought itself must be regarded as pregnant with tremendous issues. When a man begins to think of flying away from his burden, depend upon it he will soon make an attempt to fly. And how is the attempt very frequently made? A vast number of men try to get away from the burden of their worries and cares by an excessive indulgence in drink. Again and again have I heard men say: "I could bear it no longer; the burden was crushing me, and so I took to drink." And so the man uses drink as a kind of opiate. He takes that mind of his, which is "heated hot with burning fears," and he plunges it in forgetfulness by means of drink. He takes to drink as a means of flight from care. You know this is no fancy picture conjured up to meet the exigencies of a sermon. It is a leaf from commonplace life. Only the other day, in an exceedingly powerful biographical fragment, I read these words: "There is no getting rid of these gloomy thoughts; the only way to forget is to go to some place where there are a lot of people and where there is drunkenness and rollicking." I believe that this is the explanation of why many people take to drink. It is not because they like it, it is not because they are driven by the appetite of a beast. It is not the drink they crave, but forgetfulness and rest. Of course, the appetite is soon created, and at length the passion for drink becomes more intense than the passion for rest. But let us willingly recognize that in many instances men take to drink to flee from care. They wish to fly away and be at rest!

Whither Shall He Flee?

Now, let me say one or two words about this particular means of flight. It may be that the temptation will come to many who think that they are in no way exposed to the danger. It may be that there are young men—may there not be young women, too?—who will some day fly to drink as a refuge from care. Let me say, then, in the first place, that it is a most cowardly and selfish resource. It is cowardly if for no other reason than that it means a showing of the white feather; but it is cowardly for the additional reason that when a man takes to drink he deliberately sells his birthright, and throws away the prerogatives of a glorious manhood. He takes his pearls—the pearl of reason, the pearl of conscience, the pearl of will—and casts them before the swine of passion and lust. But it is more than cowardly; it is intensely selfish. It means that the man considers himself and himself alone. When a man flees to drink to gain rest from his burden he does so at the expense of putting an extra burden upon somebody else. But it is more than cowardly and selfish; to fly to drink is useless. The man says: "I will take to drink and be at rest." Does he find rest? He says: "I will bury my sorrow." Where? "In drink." Is the grave deep enough? Drink is the poorest cemetery I know in which to bury one's care. Everything you bury in drink has a speedy resurrection. Drink cannot hold it. Bury sorrow in drink, and it will soon rise again from its grave. But more than that—the sorrow reappears, stronger and heavier; the grave of drink in which you thought to bury it has only nursed and fattened it, and there it is wilder than ever! You fled for rest, and behold fresh trouble! If you want to bury your care and sorrow, bury it in God! That is a fast grave from which it will never emerge. Don't seek rest by flight! "Cast thy burden on the Lord, and he shall sustain thee." He will hearten thy trust.

Let me now take another example. Here is a man whose burden does not arise from an involved business, or from the worry which comes from an impoverished purse. It is not the care of the world which weighs upon him, but the burden of an outraged conscience. He carries a load of guilt which weighs upon his heart like lead. His burden depresses him, and produces lowness and insipidity of life. And so while some men carry a load of care, this man carries a load of remorse. And this remorse seems to sit between the shoulders, as Dante says it does in hell, and with its sharp teeth is ever gnawing at the guilty man's life. At length the burden of guilt becomes intolerable, and the man cries out in his heart: "Oh for the wings of a dove! for then would I fly away, and be at rest." Here again is a perilous moment when a man begins to think of flying away from his burden. The thought will be followed by an attempt. The man who thinks of flying away from the gnawings of his conscience will soon be trying to fly away. And how is the attempt very frequently made? A vast number of people seek to get away from the burde of their conscience by an excessive indulgence pleasure. They fly away on the wings of plea ure to be at rest!

Now, let us look at this. A man who has violat his conscience soon finds ordinary pleasures tan and tasteless. There is nothing like a sense of gui for destroying the taste for the quieter pleasures life. And so men seek refuge from guilt in sens tional and distracting enjoyments. Revelry sought as a means of gaining quietness and peac A man with a thundering conscience flies away in noisy and exciting company in order that the threa ening voice may be drowned. I think you will kno how common this is. That outraged conscienc that great white throne in every life, what we w do in order to get away from it! Even when are alone, and conscience begins to upbraid us, begin to talk to ourselves, or sing to ourselves, do anything to drown its voice. Well, the sar troublesome cause leads men into a round of plea ure. They are burdened by their guilt, and th take the wings of pleasure and fly away for re Many a poor wretch, whom the world considers fa and prodigal, is only seeking a grave in which bury his guilt. Many a wretched woman, who labeled gay and frivolous and worldly, is carryi a heavy load of guilt, and seeking a grave in whi she might bury it. And they think they can bu their burden in pleasure! They fly to pleasure f rest—do they find it?

Our Burden-Bearer

Can a soul find rest from the burden of co science by flying away on the wings of pleasur When Macbeth had murdered Duncan and Banq had also been despatched, Lady Macbeth arrang a feast, that in company and revelry and jest a song the murderer might fly from the cries of h own conscience. And how did it succeed? In t very midst of the feast, when the merrymaki was at its height, when jest and jollity freely flowe Macbeth gave a great start, and cried: "Nev shake thy gory locks at me!" What did he se The ghost of the one he had murdered! The de of yesterday intruded into the feast, and even the very heart of pleasure painted before him t ghost of the one he had slain. Oh, these ghost these ghosts of yesterday, these ghosts of past si how they will glide into our revelries, and chan them into bitterness and pain! If we only kn how to get away from the ghost of guilt! I t thee, conscience-burdened man, if thou take t wings of pleasure and fly to the uttermost parts the sea, even there the ghost shall meet thee, t burden will remain. "Be sure your sin will fi you out"; the ghost will rise before you in the ve midst of the revelry and dance.

How useless, then, to take the wings of pleasu and to seek to fly away from the burden of o guilt! Sometimes we recommend people who a cast down and disquieted within them, to get ir company, to look at the world, to see a bit of li and have a change of air. What if it is not change of air they need so much as a change heart? We counsel them to take the wings pleasure and fly away for rest, when perhaps t counsel they need is just this: "Cast thy burden the Lord, and he shall sustain thee." Oh, men a women who feel the burden of guilt, don't seek fly away from it. Bring it, and cast it upon t Lord. Tell him that you have heard that with h there is mercy and forgiveness and plenteousn of grace, and that you kneel at his feet if perchar there may be healing and strengthening for y He will sustain you. Remember that he has, in t told number, relieved men and women whose c sciences were as restless as yours, and whose gu was as burdensome as yours, and he has impart to them his own calm. He will likewise say to the "Thy sins, which are many, are all forgiven the That forgiveness of God is no idle sentiment, but mighty practical force. It loosens the guilt whi holds a man in bonds, just as the sun breaks up ice-blocked river and lets the boats go free. Do try to fly away from thy guilt, but cast thy burd on the Lord, and he shall sustain thee.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, July 19. Luke 7: 14. "Young man, I say unto thee, Arise." We have here an act of kindness which our Lord performed without being asked. Not one of the mourners had thought of such an impossible thing as restoring a dead person to life. We do not even read of an unspoken wish or faint hope that Jesus had discovered in the heart of the mother. An instance like this illustrates the fact that God's gracious help travels in advance of our requests. Another thing which startled the funeral company was that Jesus touched the bier. To a Jew that meant pollution. Jesus, however, was the Lord also of that ceremonial law, and his immediate command to the dead young man, issued upon his own authority, shows him to be the almighty God who speaks and it is done. Breaking through the barrier of a legal formality, Jesus yet fulfils the entire law of love: he restores the young man to his mother, that he may be a comfort and support to her in her old age. This incident may remind our young people of a fact which they are apt to forget in the bloom and buoyancy of their young lives: young people too must die, and death appears most ruthless when it strikes down the bud or opening flower of a young life. Hence also the young must prepare to meet their God.

MONDAY, July 20. Luke 7: 22. "Go your way, and tell John what things ye have seen and heard; how that the blind see, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, to the poor the Gospel is preached." From his prison, John the Baptist has sent messengers to Christ to ask him: "Art thou he that should come, or look we for another?" To prove his Messiahship, Christ appeals to his miracles. In estimating the value of the miracles of Jesus two extremes must be avoided: 1. The miracles are the divine seal and confirmation of the mission and message which Jesus bears to the world. To make the miracles the chief things in his activity, and to disregard his teaching, is making a use of the miracles which Jesus himself constantly discountenanced by rebuking those who came to ask signs and wonders of him. 2. To strip the message of Jesus of its heavenly attestation by the miracles, to treat the miracles as trifles or even to deny them, is also wrong. The miracles of Jesus are a necessary complement to the ancient prophecies concerning the Messiah. Jesus could not be the promised Redeemer, had he not performed them. However, the greatest of all his signs is that which, after Isaiah, he mentions last: "The poor have the Gospel preached to them." Every sinner shares in the blessing of this miracle. Luke tells us that in the very hour when Christ returned this answer to the disciples of John, he healed many. He followed up the assertion of his ability with the proof of the actual performance.

TUESDAY, July 21. Matthew 11: 6. "And blessed is he, whosoever shall not be offended in me." "The offense of Christ" is a prominent thought of the holy writers in the New Testament. Simeon remarked upon it when he met the infant Jesus in the temple. Jesus himself has referred to it many times. The apostles met with it in their preaching. What is this offense? The entire plan of salvation which God proposes for sinners in Jesus. It is an offense to reason to be required to believe the divinity of the man Christ and to accept his teaching, which passes man's understanding. It is an offense to men's pride to be told that their sins are so great that they could not be removed, except by the sacrifice of God's own Son. It is an offense to the carnal mind of men to be told that they must repent and receive forgiveness of their sins, like rebels suing for pardon. It is an offense to the flesh to be told that a life of godliness requires the mortification of the lusts and desires which men feel in them, and that those who would be saved must pass through much tribulation. "The reproach of the Gospel" is another name for this offense. Blessed indeed is he who, amid the insinuations, temptations, persecutions, doubts which come to believers in a wicked world, retains his faith pure and firm, that Jesus is indeed he that should come, and that to wait for another is folly and blasphemy.

WEDNESDAY, July 22. Luke 7: 24. "What went ye out into the wilderness for to see? A reed shaken with the wind?" The eulogy on John the Baptist which our Lord pronounced after receiving the ominous question from his imprisoned friend proves that he has not lost confidence in John. Though it is possible that John had begun to doubt—for no saint is immune from error—it is more likely that John addressed his question to Jesus in behalf of his disciples. Jesus now reminds the people of the firm character of the prophet whom they had gone to hear preach in the wilderness. Clear and strong, without deference to the great and without sentimentalities calculated to attract the small, fearless in his denunciation of sin, unqualified in his presentation of the Messiah—the message of John had come to all alike and to each according to his special need. Here is the type of a preacher after God's heart. Not the vacillating opportunist, not the spineless time-server who bends to every popular breeze and thinks his swayings and swervings the height of pastoral wisdom, tact, and skill, but men who stand amid the surgings of men's passions, the ebb and flow of men's religious opinions, notions, and fancies, solid and massive like Gibraltar, God wants for his prophets. Lord have mercy on the reeds! Behold, they are tossed with every wind.

THURSDAY, July 23. Luke 7: 25. "But what went ye out for to see? A man clothed in soft raiment? Behold, they which are gorgeously appareled, and live delicately, are in kings' courts." Clothes do not make the man, and the saying, "As we eat so we are," is more or less facetious. Yet men in general, and ministers in particular, have reason to examine their hearts in regard to their attitude on the question of garments and fare. What Jesus says about the hermit life of John is no endorsement of the imitation of that life which, as history tells us, has been attempted on a large scale by many in the early church, and is still advocated as the holy life by the Roman Church. Austere habits have never been conclusive evidence that the party assuming them had really subdued his proud and stubborn flesh. The disdain of the amenities of life sometimes exhibited by persons may be the manifestation of an unhealthy spiritual condition of the heart. What Christ arraigns in this account of the habits of John is the ease-loving life, a person's accommodation to the vanities of men, the fawning and toadying of attendants on great personages. Paul has likened the minister of Christ to a soldier who must endure hardness and be content with the lot of a warrior engaged in actual field-service. Unguarded and uncontrolled connections with the wealthy, the luxurious, the prominent men of the day, have wrecked many a noble servant of Christ.

FRIDAY, July 24. Luke 7: 26, 27. "But what went ye out for to see? A prophet? Yea, I say unto you, and much more than a prophet. This is he, of whom it is written, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee." The ancient prophets did not derive their distinction merely from the fact that they foretold future events. While it cannot be denied that they made a great impression by their predictions, still it goes without saying that those predictions must often have proven unsatisfactory to their audiences. For the prophets themselves studied diligently the messages for which the Spirit had given them utterance. Their greatest influence was due to the fact that they came with important announcements: "Thus saith Jehovah," and that they could not infrequently give unerring directions to the people regarding their present affairs. John the Baptist surpasses the ancient prophets, first, because he could point to the Messiah come, while they had spoken of the Messiah to come; secondly, because he was engaged in the difficult task of preparing the hearts of the contemporaries of Christ directly for a proper reception of the Lord. This faithful work of his forerunner brought to Christ his earliest followers, and, in general, John's message was the necessary antecedent to the ministry of Christ and gained for him his great audiences. To have done his work well was the joy of John's life. What a noble self-effacement is seen in his touching valedictory at the end of John 3! The greatest achievement of a Christian minister is to make himself disappear, in order that Christ only may be seen by his hearers.

SATURDAY, July 25. Matthew 11: 11. "Verily I say unto you, Among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist: notwithstanding he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he." The sun of John was setting in apparent gloom. A small band of faithful ones still held out with him, and these were sore pressed with doubt. Jesus does John a blessed service by his public remarks on the forerunner's closing career. The entire section of which our text is the concluding verse reads like a funeral oration. Jesus, who before the Father in heaven confesses those who have confessed him before men, here secures abiding esteem for the forerunner also among his contemporaries, who were about to forget him and his ministry. With solemn emphasis Jesus declares that John's had been a very great mission. Some of his hearers had depreciated his importance by saying: "We have Abraham for our father"; others had believed that they needed no teaching beyond that of Moses' law. Jesus tells them that, just as the Jewish nation had always esteemed the prophets who had brought them new and additional messages from the God of Abraham and Moses, so they must highly prize the ministry of John. For in him the ancient prophecy had reached its climax. John was the prophet of the fulfilment. And yet, the least follower of Christ who is able to study the grand truths of the redemption of Christ, surpasses John in clearness of understanding and in power. Where the full Gospel is proclaimed, there is the greatest glory to be attained to which men can come here below.

GOSPEL BREVITIES FROM VARIOUS POINTS

—Missionary J. M. L. Harrow, of Newaka, Liberia, Africa, writes: "I will be glad to get in touch with any one who feels called to West Africa. Native calls come in continually for some one to 'come to us.'"

Frederick Stanley Arnot, explorer and missionary, died in Africa of "blackwater fever," May 16. He was a pioneer worker in many sections of Africa, and was a great helper of other missionaries. Arnot was personally acquainted with Livingstone and Coillard and was the means of establishing Dan Crawford in his work in the Dark Continent.

The Stars and Stripes and Union Jack mingled their folds above the platform in the great auditorium of Spurgeon's Tabernacle, London, on Thursday, July 9, at two demonstrations in honor of the hundred years of peace between the United States and England, which have followed the signing of the treaty of Ghent. Dr. A. C. Dixon, the pastor, is an American. Among the speakers were Lord Blythswood, Dr. J. W. Ewing, ex-president, Baptist Union of Great Britain; Lord Kinnaird, Ambassador W. H. Page, and others.

Rev. J. L. Lillback is organizing the natives of Finland now residing in New York, for church work. There are 200,000, and Mr. Lillback, at the earnest solicitation of Christian leaders among them, has consented to head the movement for the establishment of chapels and mission houses and to lead them in their religious life. Mr. Lillback came to this country in 1895 at the age of fifteen years. He was ordained by the Congregational Council of Boston in 1906, and has been since 1908 in charge of the work for Finnish Christians in Quincy, Mass. His headquarters in New York are at 741 Forty-third Street, Brooklyn.

The Assassination at Sarajevo

IN THE killing of Archduke Francis Ferdinand, the heir apparent to the throne of Austria, and his consort at Sarajevo on June 28, another tragedy has been added to the long list of crimes against European royalty. Giving no heed to friendly warnings, the victims went into an alien section of the empire, unfriendly and bristling with enemies. Ferdinand's reckless courage seemed to invite the danger and furnished the opportunity for the attack, which was apparently the culmination of a Servian plot, deliberately planned and carried out, and not the result of a momentary outbreak. Ferdinand, as the coming successor of the aged emperor Francis Joseph, was everywhere regarded as a man possessing in a high degree those qualities of firmness, sagacity and equipoise which it was believed would qualify him for governing the varied elements that compose the Austro-Hungarian empire—the difficult task in which Francis Joseph has so long succeeded. That the assassination was carefully planned is declared by the Vienna Reichspost, the leading military organ, which says: "It was aimed, through the person of the heir-apparent, at the State itself. The conspirators pushed mere youths into the foreground and incited them to the murder." For decades, it affirms, "these mad Pan-Servian lunatics" have been trying to tear Bosnia and Herzegovina from the empire.

Unquestionably, the tragedy will knit the hearts of the Austrian people more closely to the aged Kaiser, for whom, in his sorrow and loneliness, there is universal sympathy. But the event bodes ill for the future peace of the heterogeneous empire. It is part of a dark drama which has been slowly unfolding for many years past. Servia has long cherished the hope of forming a great independent Slavic power. She regards the 12,000,000 Slavs, now widely scattered, as her legitimate allies by the ties of blood, nationality, tradition and kindred language. She hates Austria, and ever since the latter in 1908 arbitrarily annexed Bosnia and Herzegovina, she has conducted a propaganda which Russia and Montenegro have industriously aided in keeping alive and active. While Francis Joseph lives, the dream of a Slavic union may be deferred; but should the new heir, now next in order of succession—the Archduke Charles Francis Joseph, youthful, and totally inexperienced—come to the throne, there may be far-reaching changes.

Sunday School Workers At Home

IT DOUBTLESS seems a long way in more measurements than by miles from the great Medinah Temple in Chicago, where the thousands of Sunday school delegates met to plan for their work, and the modest Sunday school in some rural church or the busy Sunday school room of a town "back home" to which the delegates return. What can the days and hours of the convention do for the months and years of our Sunday school life? What can the addresses and resolutions of the big men do for the little children in our Sunday school?

One thing that no convention can teach us is love. But much was said about love at the convention and, in devotional hours and in moments of song, there were thrills of divine blessing which could awaken new love in the hearts of the workers gathered there. And this love can be carried back to bless and help the little people and the older people of our community. Another thing that can be carried back is faith. We should have new faith in the Master, new confidence that he will help us, even us, in our work of winning our pupils to a hearty allegiance to Christ and to a determination to help him in his vast work of winning the world. Another thing, and this will be easiest of all to take with us and to keep, is vision. Every one who heard Mrs. Bryner speak of the 1,056,000 babies on the cradle rolls of the Sunday school, of the 4,200 babies born every hour, throughout the world, every one who heard the descriptions of child life over the world and who felt the thrill of the world call to service and brotherhood, will find it hard to lapse back into indifference in anything that relates to the welfare of the children, the winning of their lives for God and the work of making this world a place where Christ shall reign. With vision will come zeal. Because the task is so well worth doing, and because of our new love for the children and all the people whom we can help, because of the new vision of the Saviour, more vigorous faith in him, and more ardent love for him, we shall strive more whole-heartedly to teach and guide and inspire those whose lives we can touch. Finally, there will be new skill. Mistakes we used to make will be avoided, and we shall find new success in carrying out the new plans presented, for filling the lives of the children with the life of God.

Above all, the convention motto will evermore gleam in our hearts as it gleamed in light above the convention platform. It must be truer than ever henceforth in our own lives, in our own work; and His grace can help us make it true in countless other lives: "Jesus Shall Reign."

A New Idea from Oklahoma

THERE is a little town in Oklahoma known as Carmen, which, by means of a good impulse tending to friendliness and square dealing, has suddenly found itself on the map, besides setting a good example, worthy of general application. It established on June 29 an annual "Take-it-Back Day," when everybody in town who had borrowed money or goods or anything from their fellow townspeople during the year should redeem the debt or return the articles loaned or their value. On that day the rural post office was piled up high with friendly letters, and the parcel post never did such a business in Carmen before. Not only were loans repaid and neglected obligations settled, but somehow the spirit of good fellowship, once let loose, fairly took the hearts of the townsfolk by storm, for old quarrels were patched up, neighborhood feuds were ended. And when the sun set on Carmen that day, the good people of the place felt better than they had felt in years. What wonderful and surprising things might happen if the Oklahoma idea should become infectious! If the population of any of our large cities were suddenly and individually to be seized with a desire to straighten out matters on a particular day each year, that date would become the central point of interest in the calendar. The ancient Hebrews had their year of Jubilee, in which bondmen, who had sold themselves through poverty, were freed, land sold under distress was restored, and the debts of those unable to pay were canceled—but their jubilee came only twice in a century. It is true that in the Carmen annual economic clean-up there is hardly a trace of resemblance to the ancient jubilee, but the same spirit of generous restitution, forgiveness and brotherliness is there. For this reason, if for no other, the new idea deserves to be commended and may serve as a hint to other communities that need a good, old-fashioned, economic house-cleaning and revival of good fellowship once a year at least.

China's Appeal for Help

CHINA, land of floods, famine, revolutions and sufferings such as probably no other nation has undergone in modern times, is again a suppliant for our generosity. Through the State Department in Washington we have received a telegram from the American consul-general at Canton, containing an urgent appeal from a committee of American missionaries for the sufferers from extensive floods which have taken place in that section. Here is the message, dated Canton, June 29:

> "Unprecedented floods two provinces South China. Over two million people starving, homeless. Crops totally destroyed. Relief imperative. Appeal Red Cross, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, all benevolent organizations. South China Missionaries Committee administer funds. Cable relief to International Banking Corporation, care American consul-general, Canton."

Eleven years ago, in June, 1903, a similar message was received from the American minister through our State Department and the readers of this journal responded generously and promptly. Their benevolence at that time saved many lives.

This new appeal, from the same section, should not be permitted to pass unheeded. China since then has been in the furnace of trial. Now that this sudden and overwhelming affliction has come, let us reach out quickly with hands of helpfulness. All contributions in aid of the sufferers, sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will be promptly forwarded to the Missionary Committee, as the cablegram directs. To be of real service in saving life, the response should be immediate and generous.

The President and the Suffragists

IT IS almost a pity that President Wilson did not submit to the interrogation of the suffragists who honored him with a visit in Washington the other day. "Heckling" is a crude art, but when kept within bounds it is not necessarily objectionable. Besides, the President is a skilled disputant, a master of verbal fence, and he mght easily have held his own ground, instead of withdrawing abruptly as he did. The women urged him to give his aid and influence in behalf of a resolution providing for a constitutional suffrage amendment, but he took refuge in the declaration that the suffrage issue is one for the States, and not for Congress. What he might have done, without any concession involving principle, was to have given the women the satisfaction of recognizing the remarkable success of their campaign in various States. This he could easily have done without specifically committing himself to their cause. They had no expectation of making him a convert. But instead of gallantly standing by his colors, and taking the situation in good spirit, he became disconcerted when his interlocutors pointed out a few inconsistencies. It was, no doubt, an ungracious thing to do, and Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, of the National Suffrage Association, has characterized it as "ill-timed" and uncalled for. Besides, it was wholly unauthorized, as the visitors only represented a local Washington club, which has proved unruly before. The President's answer, referring the whole subject back to the States, will probably be regarded as final, as far as his own attitude is concerned, so the episode is not likely to be repeated.

GENERAL NOTES

—IF THE LATE JACOB RIIS could have written his famous book, How the Other Half Lives, at the time the income tax was being collected, instead of many years ago, he would have found a new and remarkable parallel to his theme of riches and poverty in juxtaposition. One section of Lower Manhattan, covering an area of about two square miles, and bounded by West Fourteenth Street and the Battery, the Bowery and the Hudson River, is said to be to-day the richest area of its size in the whole world. In this limited territory there are some 15,000 individuals whose incomes aggregate $1,000,000,000, taxable for $10,000,000. Lying immediately alongside of it on the east is a smaller area of about one square mile, with some 600,000 population. It is the most densely populated square mile of territory on the globe, and it is a moderate guess that not one in 500 of its residents has an income liable to be taxed. It is the heart of the Lower East Side, abounding in homes of poverty and with a polyglot population representing almost every nationality under the sun.

Gives Cemetery to a Village

THE will of Daniel E. Merritt of Port Chester, New York, who died recently, directed that upon the death of his sister, who is now 75, his large fortune is to be used to establish a public cemetery for his village. Mr. Merritt for nearly half a century lived practically as a recluse with his aged and incompetent sister. Under the will the big colonial house where the two resided is to be kept up, and the servants and farm employees are to be retained. The document then directs that his executors must turn over to a board of trustees the residue and income from the estate, which is estimated to be worth $3,000,000, to establish and maintain "The Merritt Public Cemetery" on the Ridge Street farm. The cemetery is to be governed by the president of the village and the pastors of the various churches of Port Chester. Provision is made for free burial for the people of the village and vicinity. If this cannot be done legally, the will asks that a bill be passed by the legislature permitting such free burial. The average citizen, and especially the poor, will count it a privilege to have a decent burying place away from the potter's field, or the niggardly spaces allowed the pauper in the cities of the dead. Port Chester is a large and cultivated community and the gift of the graveyard is munificent. The desire to lie down in the last long sleep by the side of those dearest to us is expressed by Ruth in these tender words addressed to Naomi:

Where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried. (Ruth 1: 17.)

To Chart Ocean

TWELVE scientists, six officers and eighteen sailors, composing the J. Foster Stackhouse expedition, have signed for seven years to make a worldwide exploration of the seas. Soundings are to be taken in all latitudes, and careful charts of the bottom of the oceans will be prepared. The explorations in the Pacific will be of universal interest, now that the canal is opened. This keenyed search for the secrets of the seas and their mastery illustrates the authority given to man thus described:

Thou hast put all things under his feet; the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas. (Ps. 8: 6, 8.)

Sane Fourth of July

A BOY was killed a few days before the Fourth of July by the explosion of a brass cannon with which he had started his patriotic celebration. More boys sacrificed their lives on the anniversary of the nation's birth by the premature explosion of a giant cracker, the bursting of a cannon, a toy pistol or the poison from a piece of metal cap. But each year there are fewer fatal casualties than the one before, for the municipal and local authorities in the villages and country districts have compelled a sane and safe celebration of the Fourth of July. It seems impossible that a thoughtful nation like ours should have let fifty years or more go on with this slaughter of innocents, which is now fortunately being stopped. The greatest care is needed to guard young and old against the moral dangers of this life. This wise caution is taught in these words:

And what I say unto you I say to all, Watch. (Mark 13: 37.)

Alarming Illiteracy in America

MR. P. P. CLAXTON, United States Commissioner of Education, in an address in New York City lately, said that the census of 1910 showed that there were more than 5,500,000 persons in the United States ten years old or more unable to read or write, and that the economic loss to the nation was $500,000,000 each year. The increase of illiteracy in the Eastern States, and especially in New York, Mr. Claxton attributed to foreign immigration. Mr. Claxton insists that grown people can be taught very easily to read and write, and that it is the duty of the Federal Government to take up the matter practically. Our nation should never be satisfied with seventy to the thousand who cannot read or write, when in Germany, Scandinavia and some other countries the percentage of illiterates is only three to the thousand. Important, necessary as is education to the prosperity and perpetuity of our form of government, a knowledge of righteousness and of divine truth are of supreme importance. The thought is thus expressed:

Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom; and with all thy getting get understanding. (Prov. 4: 7.)

SALEM, MASS., SWEPT BY GREAT FIRE

A FEARFUL fire swept over the historic city of Salem, Mass., including in its path more than three square miles, consuming property worth $12,000,000, and rendering 18,000 of the 43,000 of the population homeless, 3,500 without food or means with which to buy it. It also threw 9,000 persons out of employment, and destroyed four precious lives. That there was as small loss of life under the circumstances is a marvel and a cause of congratulation. The fire started with an explosion in the leather factory of W. J. Korn & Co. in the Blubber Hollow district. One house in the neighborhood, "the Old Witches' House," where dwelt women in colonial days who met death on Gallows Hill, was fortunately saved. The fire thence extended over territory a mile and a half long by a half-mile wide, from Proctor and Boston Streets on the north to Jefferson Avenue on the south. The temperature was over ninety, a strong wind was blowing, the water pressure at first was weak, and then a main pipe burst and though firemen with their engines from Boston and other cities were there to help, the flames, with almost no resistance, licked up beautiful residence districts as well as factories and shabby foreign quarters. A long procession of the homeless and hungry went over the bridge to Beverly, where tents were provided and rations of food issued. The mayor of the city and governor of the State instantly called all their agencies into action, and President Wilson offered any government relief necessary. The heroism in the catastrophe, the benevolence of cities and individuals, and the enterprise that began clearing away the hot ashes of ruin on which to build a greater Salem, are the beautiful pictures revealed by the fierce fires of destruction. Most of the great fires have had their start from a lighted match, the overturning of a lamp in a cow stable, or the spark of a locomotive. What great fires in the moral and spiritual realm grow out of a small start! "Behold, how great matter a little fire kindleth!" James 3: 5.)

A GROUP OF THE HOMELESS

Medals for Heroic Firemen

WHILE governments and educational institutions were bestowing honors in recognition of great ability, broad scholarship, and distinguished public service, the second city of the world, New York, was awarding medals to eight heroic firemen who had saved life at the risk of their own. The Board of Merit recommended the medals. Fire Commissioner Adamson introduced the heroes to Mayor Mitchel, who made the awards. The following are the names of the heroes, and a record of their deeds: Captain Patrick Walsh rushed into a blazing field of gasoline to rescue Lieutenant Schoener, who had fallen unconscious in the flames; William McAllister aided Captain Walsh in this rescue and, with the captain, also received a medal; John F. Mooney, suspended head downward from a roof by a comrade, when rescuing a woman trapped by a fire from a fourth story window; Lieutenant Fred Simpson, who, lying on the roof, held the legs of Mooney while he saved the woman, was given a medal also; Frank Costello rescued two men who had fallen unconscious in a room on the sixth floor of a burning building; Thomas Lucas carried a two-year-old child from a fire to safety in his coat, and then restored him by artificial respiration; Julius Deja jumped into the Gowanus Canal in his heavy uniform and rescued Michael Leddy, a brother fireman; William McGrath rescued a woman from a fourth story window ledge and carried her to safety down a perpendicular ladder. These heroes, who guard our property and lives at the hourly risk of their own, shame our want of courage and interest in the rescue of precious, immortal souls from the moral and spiritual perils that surround them. The apostle has this estimate of spiritual life-saving:

He which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins. (James 5: 20.)

High Honors

WALTER H. PAGE, American ambassador to England, and Viscount Bryce, formerly British ambassador to the United States, received honorary degrees from the University of Oxford the other day. Mr. Page was created a doctor of civil law, and Viscount Bryce a doctor of letters. America naturally feels proud of the honor conferred on Mr. Page. In conferring the degree, the public orator dwelt on the hundred years of peace between Britain and America, and spoke of the closer union between Oxford and the United States knit by the Cecil Rhodes scholarships. Our people recognize the justness of the degree conferred on James Bryce. He is a prime favorite here, partly on account of his great book, The American Commonwealth, and also on account of his superb personality and brilliant service as the representative of his government at Washington. His name seems cheapened by titles, he is intrinsically so great as a scholar, author, diplomat, patriot, manly man and Christian gentleman. And yet the titles are the expression of a lofty public sentiment, and are becoming. The conferring of the degree at Oxford illustrates this truth concerning wisdom:

Exalt her, and she shall promote thee; she shall bring thee to honor, when thou dost embrace her. (Prov. 4: 8.)

Bubonic Plague

THE death of one person from bubonic plague in New Orleans stirred the authorities, State and national, to prevent the spread of this deadly disease. The most careful embargo has been placed on rats, carriers of the disease. Surgeon-General Blue, who was so successful in keeping out the plague from the Pacific door, has charge, and there is almost no likelihood that the plague will get a footing here. Using the most approved medical science we will rely for national health on the Lord,

Who healeth all thy diseases; who redeemeth thy life from destruction. (Ps. 103: 3, 4.)

ADVANCE BODY OF DELEGATES TO THE FOURTEENTH INTERNATIONAL SUNDA

SUNDAY SCHOOL HOSTS

the quarterly temperance lesson, has there been strife or extended debate, though the leaders trust the convention to handle all problems—withdrawing from a policy that has been in force for a few years and which was based on fear that so great a company might be swept off its feet into hasty action. There are very few conventions in which pure democracy and the unrestricted referendum so fully prevails.

Even the Committee on Resolutions, of which your correspondent is a member, had no restrictions or even cautions put upon it. "In the beginning God"—that is the first note of the resolutions. Then in the statement of principles, conversion is recognized as the bull's-eye of the target which is the association's symbol—the Bible studied for character, not for mere knowledge. Then the application of the Bible in individual and social ethics: abstinence, purity, Sabbath observance, industrial and international peace. The general observance of Peace Day, May 17, is advised, and a new Christian holiday on the third Sunday before Christmas, to be called "Bible Day," when the Book as a whole shall have a continent-wide emphasis. This naturally calls up the "All-Week Plan of Bible Study for All the People" that was outlined as the background of one of the seven addresses of your correspondent on "Restoring and Improving Bible Reading in the Schools."

They recognized in the resolutions what was pointed out in your correspondent's address, that on the old battlefield of parochial and public schools, a temple of peace is rising in scattered and independent fragments. Australia laid the first stone. Canada promises to lay the shining capstone, for in Saskatchewan, Catholics and Protestants are unitedly selecting not only Bible passages, but songs and prayers for use in the "devotions" of their public schools. These facts, and those given elsewhere about the co-operation of the three great religious groups, Catholics, Jews and Protestants, inviting non-churchgoers to "attend some place of religious worship and service," suggest that all who base their faith on the Bible may and should co-operate against heathenism at home and abroad.

Devotional Bible Study

This is a good place to say, following what has preceded, and climaxing our picture of the convention, that in Protestant churches as well as others, such a devotional Bible inlook for truth and outflow for power as Dr. F. B. Meyer gave the Chicago convention, and the Zürich convention previously, is the supreme need. It is a tribute alike to Dr. Meyer and to Sunday school workers that these deep and high spiritual expositions were the most popular part of the program. New York has a right to expect that the coming of its next International Sunday School Convention three or four years hence will profoundly reinforce both its religious and civic life. The Chicago convention was as nearly perfect as any the writer ever attended, but there are two things in which I have no doubt its leaders will improve upon it in New York—first, by providing in advance that every seat vacant ten minutes after the opening of any session may be occupied by local workers who are not delegates; second, by greater co-operation of speakers with the press by advance abstracts, giving the address a continent-wide reading.

The members of the Board of Trustees of the association for the next triennium are as follows: E. K. Warren, chairman; R. M. Weaver, W. N. Hartshorn, H. J. Heinz, A. F. Sitich, A. H. Mills, C. C. Anderson, George W. Bailey, H. M. Hamill, C. C. Chapman, William Hamilton, E. H. Nichols, John N. Peper, Theron Gibson, W. C. Hall, W. A. Eudaly, Fred A. Wells, W. H. Danforth, E. O. Excell, George M. Cook, George R. Merrill.

Messages from Japan's Great Men

"ON being told that I was honorary secretary of the Japan Sunday School Association," said Rev. H. Kawasumi in his address to the convention on Thursday evening, "and that I had been appointed a delegate to the International Convention in Chicago, Count Okuma, premier of Japan, said this was a very good opportunity to send a message to the people in America. Then he began at once to talk, and the following is as nearly as possible a correct translation of his message:

"The nations of the earth may be divided into two classes, the strong and the weak. Which is responsible for breaking the peace generally? Usually it is the stronger nations, because they can insist on their own interests, and it is the weaker nations that stand for justice, for they have no other arms than this appeal.

"Japan is a little stronger than the weak, and a little weaker than the strong, so she is in a good condition to be a good mediator between the two.

"Indeed, if the strong would be merciful enough to lead the weak as an elder brother, and if the weak tried to walk arm in arm with the strong, there would be no such thing as wars or war talk. In history we see some conflict between the white and the colored races, between the Christians and the heathen, between the Asiatics and Europeans, but these are different matters which have not concerned Japan. The Japanese are quite different from other Asiatics, not only in blood, but also in spirit. We have to-day about as much Western civilization as we do of the old Eastern, and Japan belongs both to the East and the West.

"Japan has no other ambition than to work as interpreter of the Eastern mind to the West and intermediator between the West and the East.

"I hope that the coming World's Convention in Tokyo in 1916 will be a great stimulus to the Sunday school work in Japan."

His excellency, Baron Kato, minister of foreign affairs, spoke informally but freely of Japanese-American relations, of which the following is a summary:

"Of course we shall be glad to welcome the next World's Convention of the Sunday school in Japan. Our friendship with the United States is traditional, and in spite of some unpleasant things that have arisen, and the yellow journals, we have not changed our attitude. While there are various questions that a arise, I do not believe ther reason why they cannot all b amicably.

"To express my opinion f do not think the Californian le ture did right in their le against our people. They r versed the doctrine they pre us fifty years ago. The people are a sensitive peo proud of their nationality, urally do not like to be disc against. I do not approve of emigration, but would rath would stay at home and work the benefit of the country, so ing the above opinion it is n want more people to go to th States. It is simply a matte ciple. I hope the people of nia will come to see their mis that they will come to give o better treatment.

"As to the work of the school, we feel the need stro of moral education for our In former times they had a v moral training through the of Confucius, but in recent t teaching has very much wa now we are really in a seri so far as our moral conditio cerned. For this and other we gladly welcome the moral that the Christian Sunday s give to our young people. I the best success in the under which you are connected."

of the largest audiences of the vention gathered to hear Presi- Booker T. Washington, whose and witty address was abun- applauded. In part he said:

e negro in this country got his tart in education in the Sunday The first text-book that he vas the Bible. I myself learned lphabet for the first time in a Sunday school in Malden, W. Nine mil- t least of this number live in our tern States, and of the nine mil- 85 per cent. live in the country ts. The problem, then, of reach- he negro through the Sunday is largely a question that re- itself to country life. At the t time 41,000 negro Sunday s have an attendance of about 000. But we must not be de- by these figures. Many of Sunday schools are poorly or- d and poorly taught. "The present in an especial degree is an auspicious time for pushing the Sunday school work among the millions of our people, because of the fact that a revolution is going on in the South that is bringing benefit to white and black people second only to the benefit conferred upon both races by the emancipation proclamation; I mean that revolution which is closing up the bar rooms in our Southern States. In proportion as the bar rooms are closed, the Sunday school should be opened for the negro, and he will repay you in more useful Christian living for every dollar that you expend in extending the Sunday school."

Two Great Moments

By Arthur H. Howland

THERE was an air about the convention the first day or two which seemed to indicate that things were not booming as they should. For one thing, the hundreds of empty seats, chiefly in the two great galleries, were a drag on enthusiasm. Not all the delegates had arrived, and the decision had not yet been made to admit the public to the unoccupied seats. Then, too, there had been considerable difficulty about hearing the speakers. A temporary platform, flag-draped, had been built for the speakers upon the great permanent platform where the choir and several hundred delegates sat. But the convention insisted that speakers who occupied this special platform could not be heard so well as those who stood down on the main platform and nearer the front.

But by Thursday morning these things were on the way to satisfactory settlement. Hosts of new delegates had come in over night, the delegations from Ontario and other provinces and States having arrived, so that there were fewer vacant seats in the galleries, while the main floor was fairly well filled. Then the "hilarious" and irrepressible Mr. Warren announced, amid storms of applause, that the galleries that night would be thrown open to the public. The convention, with volleys of affirmation, voted that they could hear better when the speakers stood forward on the lower platform.

Then Mrs. Bryner gave a charming, modest address, full of gentle mother-love, on the subject of the cradle roll and primary department. She could be heard perfectly. She closed with eyes tear-moist, and touching a deep, warm place in every heart, as she pleaded that life be planned so that we may approach the Master at last without remorse, able to say gladly: "Lo, I—and the children whom thou hast given me." Mr. John L. Alexander followed in a stirring appeal for the spiritual life of the boys and girls.

Then followed the great moment when the convention really "found itself"; when all the labors, pulling and tugging of getting ready and getting started had their effect; when the convention reached the top of the grade and started smoothly and swiftly along the broad level road of accomplishment and victory.

It was a hymn that did it. Rather, one should say, reverently, it was God who did it. And he did it through a hymn, as he has, by other hymns, done so many great things and started so many vast movements to final victory.

Big, genial, beaming Precentor Excell climbed up on a box placed for him on the higher platform. His great bass voice, barely raised above a conversational tone, called out jovially: "Can you hear me?" The convention laughed. Then he announced the hymn: "A Call for Volunteers." And while they were getting it under way and while he was urging them to sing still more heartily, he explained that this is the hymn sung at the Billy Sunday meetings, when the throngs of new recruits are crowding down the aisles to pledge their lives to Christ. So there was, beside the actual sight of this present great convention, met to train for the spiritual leadership of the boys and girls of North America, the vision of those other vast assemblies among which thousands of men and women were giving themselves to God.

And they sang:

A call for loyal soldiers comes to one and all.
Soldiers for the conflict; will you heed the call?
Will you answer quickly, with a ready cheer?
Will you be enlisted as a volunteer?
A volunteer for Jesus,
A soldier true!
Others have enlisted,
Why not you?
Jesus is the Captain, we will never fear.
Will you be enlisted as a volunteer?

The great auditorium reverberated with the mighty chorus—fresh, strong, hearty sopranos, resounding basses, strains of alto and tenor, and the pulsating chords of two grand pianos. The delegates meant what they were singing. No honor, no hope in all the world could equal the honor and the glory of this, to be volunteers for Jesus. They meant that no task is worth the doing, no task has any hope of success, least of all the task of winning the children of the world to become men and women of God, that is not founded upon faith in that name and allegiance to that Captain.

Still they sang; and still the heavenly blessings fell, fell with new confidence for future conquests, with new determination to be true to the great Captain at any cost. I happened to notice that F. B. Meyer, the London clergyman, was standing almost at my elbow. His face was looking upward; tears glistened on his eyes. A man near him, who I suspect was a Methodist preacher, said: "Hallelujah!" There were tears in the eyes of our singing master, and his big, hearty face was wreathed in smiles. Who could resist? Who could doubt? Who could falter? Who could do anything but join in that appeal to all the church and all the world:

Jesus is the Captain. We will never fear.
Will you be enlisted as a volunteer?

The other great moment occurred on Thursday night. Two representatives of Japan were being introduced, Rev. T. Ukai, of Tokyo, director of the

TELEGRAMS READ FROM THE PLATFORM

"It is a pleasure to send my cordial greetings to the delegates to the Fourteenth International Sunday School Convention and to express my hope that the richest measure of profit and success may attend your deliberations."—Woodrow Wilson.

"It is impossible to overestimate the influence of the Sunday school as a means for religious education. To it and to the several other organized young people's societies we must look for training for Christian service. It is my earnest hope that your assembly will devote its best efforts and thought to the matter of linking together more closely these great indispensible branches of Christian work among the young people of our churches."—William Jennings Bryan, Secretary of State.

"The great work being done by the International Sunday School Association cannot be overestimated. The good work done by such organizations as the Christian Endeavor, Epworth League, Westminster League, Order of Standard Baptist Young People's Union, and kindred organizations, with the Sunday School Organization, is felt in every national movement for moral reformation."—Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy.

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

Employers Insure Against Accidents

THE new Workmen's Compensation Act of New York State, previously described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, went into effect July 1, on which date it was announced that some 11,000 employers had applied for policies to the State Insurance Fund, to comply with the provision in the law that all liabilities for accidents to employees must be covered by insurance issued by the State, by a private corporation, or by the employer himself under fixed conditions. The rate charged by the State Insurance Department is much lower than that offered by private companies. It is estimated that annual premiums for compensation insurance may total $45,000,000. The big railroad companies, it is said, have disregarded the insurance provision and will test the constitutionality of the law upon the first claim for accident compensation. Twenty-three States and many foreign nations now have compensation laws similar to that of New York.

Report of United States Treasurer

FOR the fiscal year ending June 30, the general receipts of the United States Government were approximately $724,000,000, almost thirty-five million over 1913. Internal revenue receipts were $305,814,848, an increase around 17,000,000. Customs receipts were $292,158,627, or twenty-three million less than 1913. This latter falling off is supposedly due in part to the new tariff, in effect since October; the collections at the port of New York, however, amounted to $197,000,000, or but six million under last year's. The loss, however, cannot in more than offset by the income tax receipts of about $71,000,000. The total ordinary receipts were $724,343,760, disbursements, $698,559,348. Secretary McAdoo had predicted a surplus for the fiscal year of thirty million dollars, and the incomplete figures available July 1 indicate a slightly larger surplus in the general account, against which, however, has been charged all approximately thirty-five million dollars Panama Canal disbursements, as extraordinary expense, leaving an actual deficit of about $1,000,000. Delayed income tax payments, estimated at $7,500,000, had they been received, would have produced a surplus of $22,500,000, as against $11,297,000 in 1912, and a deficit of $400,000 in 1913.

Mexican Peace Dove Still Hovers

THE Mediation Conference at Niagara Falls, Ontario, adjourned for a recess June 30. Whether or not this board will reconvene depends much on the result of the supplementary conferences arranged between representatives of the United States, Huerta and Carranza, also upon the further progress of the revolution in Mexico. After the taking of Zacatecas, Villa is reported as withdrawing with his troops to the north, because of lack of ammunition. Strained relations with Carranza seemed to forecast a crisis in the Constitutionalist party. Zapata, the bandit ally of the Constitutionalists in the south, threatened to cut off the water and light supply of Mexico City early in July, causing panic in the capital, if reports are correct. Huerta was again said to be irrevocably fixed in the presidential chair, and preparing to fly from the country. As THE CHRISTIAN HERALD goes to press, the only definite thing to say about the Mexican situation is that peace is actually expected as the result of the mediation, Mexico's acceptance of state accompanying July 2 that the preliminary protocols have been signed by the delegates.

Oil Pipe Lines are Common Carriers

INQUIRY into the methods of the Standard Oil Company, prior to 1906, led the Bureau of Corporations to believe that control of pipe line facilities for carrying the raw product to market was the secret of Standard Oil monopoly. In that year the Hepburn rate law was amended to include pipe lines as common carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission. The commission was resisted by six of the twenty-eight principal pipe lines, who appealed to the Commerce Court, obtaining a ruling in their favor. The government appealed to the Supreme Court, and that tribunal on June 23 sustained the validity of the amendment, declaring pipe lines to be common carriers and under the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Uncle Sam Company was the one exception, as it carried oil only from its own wells to its own refineries. The decision was not unanimous.

Huge Gift for Medical Research

THE Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research in New York, established by him in 1902 and to which he has already given about nine million dollars, exclusive of real estate, has just received an additional donation of $2,650,000 from Mr. Rockefeller, for the extension of its laboratory and other facilities. This gift makes the institute the most amply endowed of its kind in the world. It is a pioneer in its field in this country. In connection with its research department there is a fully equipped hospital for the treatment of patients afflicted with diseases under investigation. To other philanthropic and educational causes Mr. Rockefeller has given approximately $110,000,000, the General Education Board leading with $53,000,000, the University of Chicago, $30,000,000, colleges, churches, missions and other institutions following with comparatively much smaller amounts.

Immigrants Pouring Into America

IMMIGRATION for the ten months ending April 30 indicate that the fiscal year ending June 30 will be the banner year of the Immigration Department, 1,038,856 immigrants having arrived in those ten months. In the record year, 1907, a total of 1,285,349 immigrants arrived, whereas the 1914 total may be about 1,350,000. Over 30,000 aliens have been deported in the above ten months, and we have received about 700,000 Italian immigrants, 170,000 Hebrew, 168,000 of Polish birth, Germans to the number of 61,000, English 43,000, Russian 40,000, Slavonian and Bohemian about 30,000, Scandinavian 21,000.

Preparing for Movement of Crops

TO PROVIDE for any possible need in handling the summer and fall crops, the Treasury Department is ready to distribute ample funds to the national banks of the country. In 1913 $97,000,000 was so deposited, but banks report little likelihood of a similar need this year because of a plentiful supply of money. The winter wheat crop of Kansas is said to be sixty million bushels above any previous record, approximating 164,000,000 bushels, or 70 per cent. of a full crop from an average of 89,000,000. The corn and oats crops show similar improvement over former records. Colorado, Nebraska and Oklahoma also report bumper crops.

The Claflin Failure

IN THE same issue of the press that reported President Wilson's strongly optimistic speech on business conditions, addressed to the country through a group of Virginia editors, June 26, the failure of the H. B. Claflin Company was announced. As this old house is the mainstay of about forty stores scattered over the country, a momentary shock was felt by the business world. Many of these stores also went into receivers' hands. There was quick recovery of business confidence, however, and a movement began on the part of bankers and the trade to work with the head of the firm, John Claflin, for the early rehabilitation of the company. Mr. Claflin retired from the presidency of the United Dry Goods Company and the Associated Merchants Company in order to devote his resources wholly to the re-establishment of the H. B. Claflin Company. Reorganization of this gigantic business may leave the stores formerly composing the Claflin chain independent of central management. The tying up of the resources of the Claflin stores for a time is the gravest feature of the situation; ultimate payment of one hundred cents on the dollar is not doubted by the trade. The suspension appears to have been caused by changing conditions of merchandise distribution which required more direct dealing with the manufacturer, the Claflin plan of an Eastern house with extensive retail connections proving unwieldy and expensive. This was the largest national dry goods house in the United States, and John Claflin is looked upon as one of the country's foremost and soundest business men. The company's indebtedness is said to be $34,000,000, with assets much in excess of that sum, but of course not quickly convertible into cash.

Uprising of Cities for Economy

EFFORTS are being made to organize a movement among all the mayors of the land for the overthrow of corrupt, extravagant and otherwise unsatisfactory public service companies. A central bureau of advice and assistance upon which any city may draw in its fight for better and fair-priced public utilities—gas, electric current, water, transportation, etc.—will be a feature. Philadelphia, New York, Dayton, Chicago and Cleveland are named as already enlisted. The move is in the direction of lower cost of living.

Our Volcano Insists on Volcanoing

LASSEN Peak in California, for the fourteenth time since May 30 has burst into eruption, the latest, July 1, being the most severe, throwing volcanic ash for a distance of thirteen miles. Scientists have differed as to the nature of these disturbances, but the undeniable presence of sulphur, evidenced for many miles in the direction of the wind, seems to determine the true volcanic character of this ancient volcano's convulsions.

Japanese Land Question Comes to Life

THE controversy between this country and Japan over the California alien land law passed in May, 1913, of which little has been heard since Japan's formal protest in August last, may be submitted to arbitration as a result of failure between the State Department and the Japanese Foreign Office to reach agreement. The dispute has to do with treaty rights under which Japanese citizens seek to hold real property in this country. The State Department is reported as confident that Japan has no case, and according to press reports the Japanese Government is becoming similarly convinced.

Department of Marine Disasters

TO THE news under this head we now add the good Anchor liner California, which went on the rocks off the northern coast of Ireland in a fog on June 28, necessitating the taking off of her 841 passengers by boats summoned by wireless. The vessel was far out of her course, according to the reports. There was much excitement, but no panic. Counting backward, we now have been able to report the following disasters: June 25, liner Gothland, on rocks off English coast in fog, no fatalities; June 18, liner Empress, same conditions; June 17, liner Kaiser Wilhelm II., rammed by grain steamer in fog, no fatalities; June 14, liner New York, struck by Pretoria in fog off our coast, no fatalities; May 29, sinking of Empress of Ireland, 1,029 deaths. No news as yet upon progress in movement for safety at sea.

AUSTRIA'S PRINCE SLAIN BY ASSASSIN

THE peace of Europe, the permanency of Austria-Hungary, were imperiled by the assassination on June 28 of the heir to the Austrian throne, Archduke Francis Ferdinand, and his wife, the Duchess of Hohenberg, at Sarajevo, Bosnia, by a Servian fanatic named Prinzip, possibly the agent of a widespread political conspiracy.

The archduke, with his wife, was on an official tour of inspection of Austrian troops stationed in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Because of hostility on the part of Servians, he had been warned against entering Bosnia. With characteristic courage, and perhaps not greatly impressed by the warnings, he undertook the trip, his wife insisting on accompanying him. As the party proceeded through the streets of Sarajevo, the capital, a bomb was thrown into their automobile. The archduke pushed it to the street, where it fell in the track of the following automobile, which was damaged and the occupants slightly injured. Proceeding to the town hall, where he was to be officially received, the archduke denounced the outrage before receiving the mayor's address. With his wife, he then started to visit the hospital where his wounded escort had been taken. As his car slowed down to make a turn, a Servian student leaped forward and emptied his revolver into the Duchess of Hohenberg and her royal husband, every shot, it is said, finding a mortal spot. Both victims expired with hardly any sign of consciousness, though taken instantly to the hospital for surgical treatment.

Gabrinovics, thrower of the bomb, and Prinzip, the assassin, were secured; they boasted of the deed as an act of great patriotism, taking all credit to themselves, and denying the existence of a plot. The police, however, declared later that many evidences of a well-laid plan to slay the archduke, that could not fail, were found. Elaborate precautions had been taken to protect the royal pair, but the fatal shots were fired in the very face of the Bosnian governor, sitting opposite the archduke. When informed of this, the fourth tragedy in his family, the aged Emperor Francis Joseph exclaimed: "No sorrow is spared me!" The bodies were prepared for transference to Vienna, a city of sudden mourning.

Ever seeking to extend the borders of his dominion, and to obtain unhindered progress to the Adriatic, the aged and masterful ruler of Austria-Hungary succeeded in 1908 in annexing the countries of Bosnia, Croatia and Herzegovina, the natural allies of Servia. This coup d'état, sprung at the close of the Young Turk revolution, has never ceased to rankle in the breast of Servia. That country, a great power now, had also long planned to extend her borders to the Adriatic. Servia, Bosnia and Herzegovina were joined in war against Turkish rule in 1875. Though unable to maintain such a union, those countries, Servia especially, had ever since dreamed of one great Slav empire opposed to Austria. The annexation of Bosnia and Croatia shattered that dream. The events following the Balkan War, in which Servia won such signal victories, almost indeed to the point of obtaining that long-cherished hope of reaching the Adriatic, but frustrated in that, too, by Austria, steadily increased the hatred of the Servians for their great neighbor to the north, until at last, resorting to the last resource of defeated ambition, treacherous death is dealt out to the foremost representative of that powerful foe. There is an unusual commingling of great political interests and simple domestic relations in this latest outrage against monarchy. On the one hand, the archduke was said to be the hope of that powerful faction which would extend the rule of Austria, and of the clerical party and the anti-Semites of the empire; the possibility of a triple, in place of a dual, monarchy, the vast Slavic population of the empire being given a share in the government, was also said to be involved in his succession to the throne. On the other hand, Francis Ferdinand, in order to marry the woman of his choice, whose rank forbade her elevation to the station of Empress, renounced the rights of succession of his children in favor of his brother the Archduke Otto and the latter's sons, one of whom, the Archduke Charles Francis Joseph, now becomes heir presumptive to the throne. His succession is already disputed, however, by friends of the son of the slain prince. Three charming young children survive this ill-fated pair, whose morganatic marriage, after long objection on the part of the aged emperor Francis Joseph, was regarded as one of the most romantic in royal circles. The press reports that the children remained awake all night sobbing in each other's arms, when their loss was made known to them.

The reigning house of Hapsburg has experienced horror upon horror. The emperor's only son, Rudolph, was found dead in his hunting lodge, January 30, 1889, in company with a woman to marry whom he had tried unsuccessfully to divorce the Princess Stéphanie. The mystery of these deaths has never been cleared up so far as the public is concerned. The death of Rudolph brought the emperor's brother, the Archduke Charles Ludwig, into the succession, which, however, he renounced because of age in favor of his sons, the oldest being this Archduke Francis Ferdinand. Before that, in 1867, the emperor's other brother, Maximilian, famous for his attempt to set up an empire in Mexico, was executed by the soldiers of that country. Maximilian's wife became insane as the result of her husband's fate and is living to-day, still insane. The emperor's marriage was itself an unhappy one, and his wife Elizabeth, at one time a beautiful woman, was stabbed to death by an Italian anarchist, September 10, 1898. Other members of this family have met violent deaths, or secured notoriety in one way or another, until this ruler, now in his eighty-fourth year, was fain to exclaim at the news of the death of the nephew upon whom he had leaned in his latter years: "Horrible! horrible! No sorrow is spared me."

IT WAS with an air of pleased satisfaction, and with renewed and increased assurance that he was not only the master of his fate but the terror of the camp, that Dead Shot Jackson dropped from his horse, swaggered into The Black Pup with his gun in his hand, stepped up to the bar, pounded upon it, and boldly demanded his liquor. His arrival caused a great surprise in that delectable resort. Naturally, the men in The Black Pup were the worst in the community. There were, of course, some among them who, subjected to better influences, would have been ready to join the respectable element. But the major part of the company was ready to extend a welcoming hand and support to the newcomer.

The Sunday school had aroused a constantly increasing antagonism in the minds of these men. Their opposition had been more or less impotent, but it was at once recognized that a leader had at last appeared who could make the opposition felt. Those who pined for the old lawless, reckless days thought that they saw a chance to re-establish them, and they welcomed it blithely.

Dead Shot Jackson, keeping the crowd well covered with his gun—for he was not yet sure of them—defiantly drank his liquor alone. While he did so, he studied the faces of the habitués of the saloon. It seemed to him, at last, safe to venture on an appeal. Their approval of his presence among them and their welcome was more or less obvious. As a test of their emotions, he turned to the barkeeper with a wave of his hand and threw down his last nugget, roaring out:

"If there's any gent here who's got the nerve to likker up at my expense, let him come up an' name his fav'rite brand of p'ison. These yere drinks is on me."

First one and then another and finally all, from the first to the last, came up to the bar in response to his invitation. The barkeeper, nothing loath, filled the glasses. One of the boldest among the group lifted his and said:

"Gents, I drinks to the health of Dead Shot Jackson, which he's a party as ain't afeared of no man. For one, I'm glad to have him come back to Cañon Creek to put down this crowd of psa'm singers an' prayers an' preachers jest a-bustin' up the camp an' interferin' with everybody's innercent pleasures."

"Hurrah!" cried one.

"That's the talk," said another; and amid a loud chorus of approval from all sides, the toast was drunk.

"Gents," said the delighted recipient of these honors to which he had long been strange, "you've come to the right man. I've heard about these re-ligious doin's an' I'm yere, with you all's help, to bust 'em up. Lead me to 'em. If there's a man in the crowd of blanked hypercrites as has got nerve enough to draw a gun an' pull the trigger, I want to see him. You all drove me out of yere 'cause of the testimony of a lyin' Injun an' a nameless brat who come from God knows where over the mountains. I never done nothin' I'm ashamed of, an' I don't bear no malice agin' you gents, but that kid an' that big brute called Parson Bill an' that goggle-eyed hound as acted as jedge, an' that Doc that was my counsel an' went back on me—I reckon I'll settle with them. Where are they to be found? Here, barkeep," he cried suddenly, "I guess we ain't drunk out all that chunk of gold yet; set 'em up agin."

"Me an' the boys have been a-thinkin' for a long time now that it's jest about time that somethin' or other was done to clean out this bunch of morylists, an' I guess anything you do we'll stand for an' be willin' to back you up in," said the pleased barkeeper, pushing a full bottle toward the crowd again.

"That's all I ask," said the desperado. "Jest gimme a little encouragement an' deal me a fair hand. I'll play it alone."

"The time to try it is to-morrer mornin'," said one of the men.

"Why not now?"

"'Cause you can't get at 'em to-night. To-morrer mornin' they'll git at their psa'm singin' an' prayin' under the trees. It's Sunday. I hearn tell that they're goin' to have a sure 'nough parson out yere from Denver, an' as all of 'em will be there, you kin—"

"I don't care how many parsons they git, or if they fetch a battery of artillery with 'em. I'm the quickest man on the draw around these parts, ain't I?"

"You sure are," assented the barkeeper.

"Well, then—"

"But I'm tellin' you the best way to get at 'em is to lay low, now," persisted the first speaker. "To-morrer mornin'—"

"There's a bunch assemblin' at the restaurant to take Dead Shot Jackson," interrupted a breathless man who burst through the throng around the bar at that moment. "I was passin' by an' I seed and heered 'em," he continued in great excitement. "They'll be here in no time. They're goin' to jail him or lynch him, or—"

"You see what I told you," said the man who had advised "layin' low." "Break for the hills quick, Jackson, an' git back down here early in the mornin' afore daybreak, when the excitement has kind a died down a little, an' then we'll have plans all made an'—"

"If I break for the hills they'll think I am afraid," said the man, hesitating.

"Nonsense, we all knows you ain't

WORK, RESPONSIBILITY AND REWARDS

*SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JULY 26

HERE is more good news for our Sunday school people. Two illustrious names are added to the list of contributors to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday School Department, Marion Lawrance, the beloved general secretary of the International Sunday School Association, and F. B. Meyer, equally well beloved, the great English preacher who has done so much to deepen the spiritual life of the modern Christian world. Mr. Lawrance will contribute from time to time "News Nuggets from the Field," and Dr. Meyer will write a series of Scripture expositions of the weekly Golden Texts. Arrangements have been completed with Rev. Frank E. Hoskins, of Beirut, Syria, who will, beginning next fall, contribute every week an explanation of the Orientalisms of the lesson. Frank L. Brown, general secretary of the World's Sunday School Association, besides, as already announced, writing a series of Method Lectures for Sunday school officers and the Sunday School Workers' Round Table, will furnish a series of articles describing Sunday school work in many countries of the world. Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts, long known and loved by CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, will continue to contribute, and with them will be associated, as already announced, Amos R. Wells, A. H. Howland, E. W. Caswell and others.

As to Vacant Lots

By Amos R. Wells

DR. E. W. WORK says that opportunities, like Yale locks and keys, are each after a pattern. Every man has his own peculiar opportunities. Every day has its own, even every hour. The pounds and talents are not our capabilities, which remain about the same except as we may hope they are gradually growing, but they are our constant chances to use those capabilities. With this understanding, Christ's parables of the pounds and talents take on a piercing urgency. They are for the instant, not leisurely for general purposes.

I like the nobleman's command in the old version, "Occupy till I come." "Trade ye herewith" is the revision; but "occupy" has a very modern flavor. You know what unoccupied houses mean to a real-estate owner: vexation and loss; no income, and the houses going to ruin. You know what vacant lots mean to a city: ugly waste spaces given up to weeds, tin cans, and bill-boards; little revenue from taxation; municipal stagnation. "Fill up the houses of your life!" is Christ's meaning; "build up the vacant lots! Crowd every hour with noble deeds, and rear upon every capability the edifice of some worthy achievement!"

Do not say that you have no empty house, no vacant lot. When Baron Cuvier was eighteen he became a private tutor in Normandy, near the sea. One day he found a stranded cuttlefish on the shore, took it home, dissected it, became interested in mollusks, and from that small start, faithfully followed up, he became one of the world's most famous naturalists. That cuttlefish was his talent, his pound. Look about you on your familiar, daily walks and you will find your cuttlefish. Do not let it lie in the sun to decay.

When we remember who Christ was, another point in the parables is full of stimulus: his statement that the nobleman required "his own, with interest." In our living we are handling what is another's; and on his terms, not our own. His terms are six per cent. In other words, God requires of us growth, progress, not merely "holding our own," but bettering his own. As Dr. Charles M. Sheldon says, "The sooner we wretched braggarts drop out of our vocabulary the word 'mine' and substitute the word 'thine,' the sooner may we expect to grow in the grace and knowledge of Jesus Christ."

Very suggestive are the Vacant Lots Associations which have sprung up in many cities. Beginning with "Pingree's Potato Patches," they have become elaborate agricultural and horticultural enterprises. They take these unsightly empty spaces, banish the tin cans and the bill-boards, and transform them into miniature paradises. They place good food on the poor man's table; but, far more than that, they teach him to use his muscle and brain and the opportunity near at hand. Every Christian should constitute himself a Vacant Lots Association of one. Every church and Sunday school should be a Vacant Lots Association of many co-operating souls.

Upon the death of the talented and beloved Mrs. Stevens, Miss Anna Gordon has become the head of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, a position of influence second to no queen's on earth. Every one agrees that she is just the one for the place. And how did she start in this glorious career? One day Miss Willard was to speak in Park Street Church, Boston, and there was no one to play the organ. A call was made for a volunteer, and a young schoolgirl came forward, timidly offering to do what she could. Won by the act, Miss Willard kept her near her. Anna Gordon "occupied" her position so well that she became indispensable. She planned every journey of the great stateswoman. She watched every detail of her large correspondence. She became her closest companion and most intimate friend. And she grew up into Miss Willard's largeness of soul and scope of service. She put her one pound out at interest, and now she has ten pounds to hand over to her Lord.

There is one way to succeed, and only one, but it is a sure one: follow Jesus Christ.

* THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON for Sunday, July 26, 1914. The Pounds and the Talents. Luke 19: 11-27; Matt. 25: 14-30. GOLDEN TEXT: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." Matt. 25: 21.

The Pounds and Talents

By Arthur H. Howland

OUR lesson includes two parables, that of the Ten Pounds, Luke 19: 11-27, and that of the Ten Talents, Matt. 25: 14-30. While the stories are much alike there are some definite differences. In the story of the pounds each man receives the same amount, one pound; in the story of the talents one receives one, one two, and one five. In the story of the pounds each receives a different reward; the man who has gained ten pounds gets ten cities; the one who has gained five pounds five cities. In the story of the talents no figures of reward are mentioned: each one is promised authority over "many things."

We might say that in the parable of the pounds the amount given stands for life. The question is: What are you going to do with the gift of life? Make gains out of it for the Master of Life, or clutch and hide and save, and so lose it? In the parable of the talents the amounts stand for gifts or capabilities. Some can do many things; some a few things; some only one. But all can do something. And the question is: What are you going to do with your gifts and powers? Use them and so get more power, or hide them until they are lost?

Notice again the fact which the New Testament frequently states and emphasizes: that increase depends on risk and loss and sacrifice. The industrious servants put out their money; they let go of it; they had to do that or it would not have come back to them with its increase. It is so with almost all gains; they come by surrender, by sacrifice. The seed is thrown into the ground and comes up in grain; time and practice are expended and come back in skill; service is given to others and comes back in gladness and love. The lad gave his loaves and fishes to Jesus; they became enough for the multitude, and he himself had plenty. We give ourselves in glad surrender to Christ, and he fills our souls with his Holy Spirit and gives us back our lives and our talents to be used gloriously, powerfully, victoriously for others, in his name.

But the last man wanted to hoard and hide his treasure. He would not part with it to make it grow; so it was taken from him altogether. We have all heard many illustrations of that truth: a talent unused is lost. If you can sing and don't sing you will lose the power of song. You remember Darwin's complaint that because he neglected music he ceased to care for it; he lost his taste for it, his power to appreciate it. If a strong person thinks he is ill and goes to bed he becomes weak. Perfectly sound people are sometimes kept in bed by their own whims or the whims of others till their limbs lose their power.

A word about the rewards and punishments of these parables. Life expended in work brings back more life; strength expended brings more strength. "Practice makes perfect." Gifts used become greater gifts. It is the law of the universe. The men who had shown themselves faithful traders could be trusted to be faithful rulers. Those who had gained most could rule most. The man who had shown himself unable to be trusted with a little gift had not only lost his capacity to receive more, but his capacity to retain what he had.

Many have resented as unfair Christ's words: "Unto every one that hath shall be given, but from him that hath not, even that which he hath shall be taken away." Yet Christ is here not making a vindictive threat; he is merely stating, as we have seen, what actually and inevitably takes place in human life. Gifts used bring greater gifts; a gift neglected is altogether lost.

OUR COVER PICTURE

GALILEE! The very name brings before us the whole story of our Lord's life on earth. The scene reproduced upon our front cover was photographed in our day, and yet it is practically identical with those that met his gaze on more than one well remembered occasion. In such a group might he have found Simon and Andrew his brother, for they were fishers; in this manner might "the other disciples" have dragged their net with fishes back there in the 21st chapter of John.

This little lake, shimmering blue in the sunshine, lies in the very depths of the Jordan Valley. Through it flows from north to south the Jordan. Upon it in these stirring days a steam launch moves in and out among the unchanging boats of the fishermen, to carry tourists from point to point. But the little boat does not change the Orientalism of this historic inland sea, the Sea of Tiberias, the Lake of Gennesaret, Kinneroth, the Sea of Galilee.

Japanese Sunday School Association, and Rev. H. Kawasumi, general secretary of the National Sunday School Association. After Mr. Ukai had spoken and Mr. Kawasumi been introduced, he arose, and—what might have looked strange to one who could not catch his words or foresee his purpose—turned his back upon the audience. But he was turning his face towards something. Up there behind the platform, flooded with the dazzling light from many electric bulbs, was draped an enormous American flag and, at its side, the Union Jack. Other United States flags were spread aloft. The electric lights blazed upon them. And there between the two great flags, American and British, gleamed the convention motto, spelled in lightning: "Jesus Shall Reign."

"I want to salute the American flag and the Union Jack," said this Christian gentleman from Japan. "I give the Japanese salute." And waving his hand aloft, he shouted:

"Banzai! Banzai! Banzai!"

Marion Lawrance leaped to his feet. He called upon the convention to return that salute to Japan, not in English, but in Japanese. He explained that Banzai means "ten thousand years of life and happiness." Then he showed us how to do it, shouting forth the three Banzais, his voice rising on the last almost to the pitch and dimensions and prolongations of the "rebel yell." And the delegates wanted to yell. They were thinking of Japan, and of the ugly and dreadful rumors that she hates us and wants to fight us. They were remembering that some of her people believe some of our people are dealing unjustly with them. They had heard the hearty Banzais of the Christ man from that island empire and they saw with him stood thousands of Christian brothers and many true and neighborly friends of the United States. They were looking forward and upward into that blaze of light, into the folds of those great flags, representing the vast American family and the Canadian branch of the British race. They were looking into those words: "Jesus Shall Reign." They were thinking of Him, the Prince of Peace, the bringer of heaven's love to earth, the welder of nations, the great world Brother, calling all men to brotherhood in his name. They were thinking of the millions of little children, of boys and girls, of young and older men and women who make up the world-wide Sunday school hosts, of which Jesus is King. They were believing in the Sunday school as a great creator of Peace and Love—and they shouted:

"Banzai! BANZAI! BANZAI!"

ULSTER, HOME RULE AND CIVIL WAR

THE return of the anniversary of the Battle of the Boyne (July 12, 1690) brings to mind a significant remark that was recently made in the Presbyterian. An exchange of opinion on the Ulster opposition to the Irish Home Rule Bill in the British Parliament had been begun by Rev. S. J. Fisher, D.D., in the Presbyterian for February 18. Dr. Fisher, writing under the caption at the head of this article, had defended the bill and declared "the present attitude of Ulster unjustifiable." He was replied to under the same caption in the Presbyterian for March 11, by Rev. W. McNally, D.D., who defended the opposition of the Protestants of Ulster to Irish Home Rule, and in the course of his remarks made use of the following determined language:

Rev. Gerald O. Nolan, M.A., B.D., of Maynooth (where they educate the priests), said: "Irish Ireland, if the ideal is realized, will, please God, in the twentieth century be the Irish Ireland of the sixth, seventh, eighth and ninth centuries. This is a Catholic country, and if we do not govern it on Catholic lines, according to Catholic ideals, and to safeguard Catholic interests, it will be all the worse for the country and all the worse for us. Here it is that religion and nationality meet, and may, and should, go hand in hand. We have now a momentous opportunity of changing the whole course of Irish history." From these candid words, it is surely quite evident what the Roman Catholic Church thinks about Home Rule. I therefore take these words of Dr. Nolan as the expressed opinion of the priesthood of Ireland, and I take them in preference to the dream of Dr. Fisher. The Covenanters will be fully justified in taking up arms against being thrust out of the empire, where they are prosperous and happy, and where they have the British Parliament to appeal to for their rights, and being placed under the heel of their inveterate and cruel foe—the Roman Catholics of Ireland. "Derry" and "Boyne" will be fought over again before that happens.

The battle at the Boyne River (a small stream that runs through the counties of Kings, Meath and Louth in southern Ireland, and empties into Drogheda Bay) terminated a movement that would have been fatal to the cause of Protestantism throughout England, if it had succeeded. With the accession of James II to the English throne in February, 1685, an ardent Catholic had obtained political power over the Britons. The four years of his reign were spent in persistent efforts to make England Catholic, and their history, as recorded, for instance, by Green, should prove very instructive reading to Catholics and Protestants in the United States just at this time. It seems incredible now that a monarch should so completely have misjudged the temper of Protestant England and should so daringly have risked the fortunes of his own Catholic religion as did King James II. He came before the people with the bland assurance that he respected the rights of his subjects in state and church, and would hold them inviolable, and then proceeded to let everybody in England know and feel that there was now in the land a thing that demanded primary consideration from all the inhabitants, viz., "the king's religion." Mass was celebrated openly at the chapel where the king when still Duke of York had worshiped behind closed doors. The Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London were reminded by the king that they must hinder all preaching against Catholicism as a part of their "duty" to their king. Every office of the government the king filled with Catholics. By a system of oppression he scared some Protestants and by unblushing favoritism he lured others into embracing Catholicism. "Catholics were admitted into civil and military offices without stint, and four Catholic peers were sworn as members of the Privy Council. The laws which forbade the presence of Catholic priests in the realm or the open exercise of Catholic worship were set at naught. A gorgeous chapel was opened in the palace of St. James for the use of the king. Carmelites, Benedictines, Franciscans, appeared in their religious garb in the streets of London, and the Jesuits set up a crowded school on the Savoy." The king "regarded his ecclesiastical supremacy as a weapon providentially left him for undoing the work which it had enabled his predecessors to do. Under Henry and Elizabeth it had been used to turn the Church of England from Catholic to Protestant. Under James it might be used to turn the church back again from Protestant to Catholic."

By unusual acts of tyranny James II sought to coerce men into yielding themselves to his religio-political schemes, but he only arrayed against himself, first, the entire old English aristocracy, next, the gentry, lastly, the clergy. One is reminded of the recent resignation of British army officers at the Curragh station when reading the following, which happened 225 years ago: "A yet fiercer irritation was kindled by the king's resolve to supply the place of the English troops whose temper proved unserviceable for his purposes by drafts from the Catholic army which Tyrconnell had raised in Ireland. Even the Roman Catholic peers at the council table protested against this measure; and six officers in a single regiment laid down their commissions rather than enroll the Irish recruits among their men. The ballad of 'Lillibullero,' a scurrilous attack on the Irish recruits, was sung from one end of England to the other."

The opposition to his campaign of making England Catholic finally drove James II from England and brought William of Orange and Mary to the British throne. The Battle of the Boyne was fought by William against the Jacobites, or followers of King James, who had made a landing on Irish soil with the aid of the French king Lewis, and with his faithful Irish was trying to recapture his lost throne and kingdom. Green gives the following account of the Battle of the Boyne:

Schomberg (William's general) was strengthened during the winter with men and stores, and when the spring came his force reached thirty thousand men. Lewis, too, felt the importance of the coming struggle. Seven thousand picked Frenchmen under the Count of Lauzun were despatched to reinforce the army of James, but they had hardly arrived when William himself landed at Carrickfergus and pushed rapidly with his whole army to the south. His columns soon caught sight of the Irish forces, hardly exceeding twenty thousand men in number but posted strongly behind the Boyne. Lauzun had hoped by falling back on Dublin to prolong a defensive war, but retreat was now impossible. "I am glad to see you, gentlemen," William cried with a burst of delight; "and if you escape me now the fault will be mine." Early next morning, the first of July, 1690, the whole English army plunged into the river. The Irish foot, who at first fought well, broke in a sudden panic as soon as the passage of the river was effected, but the horse made so gallant a stand that Schomberg fell in repulsing its charge and for a time the English center was held in check. With the arrival of William, however, at the head of his left wing all was over. James, who had throughout been striving to secure the withdrawal of his troops to the nearest defile rather than frankly to meet William's onset, abandoned his troops as they fell back in retreat upon Dublin, and took ship at Kinsale for France.

Ranke, in his History of the Popes, seems to refer to this battle when he says: "By these events, limits were imposed at once and forever to the extension of Catholicism, which has now its appointed and definite bounds: that universal conquest formerly projected could nevermore be seriously contemplated."

At a meeting of patriotic orders at Willard Hall in Chicago on June 24 the Messenger, third edition, 1914, was distributed at the door. On the third page it contained the following remarks, which invite attention as reflecting the temper of the parties resisting Irish Home Rule in our day:

What is the matter with Ulster? Those unintelligent people who speak of Orangemen as something of the past should once attend a Twelfth-of-July gathering. The truth recognized by Macaulay and other great historians, that the Battle of the Boyne changed the religious, political, and social complexion of not Ireland alone, but of Great Britain, Canada, and the United States, is not known to many Americans. Had King James won in Ireland and continued king of England, the influence of popery in the American colonies would have been all-powerful. . . . The men of Ulster know that home rule for Ireland means the black rule of Rome for Ireland. They are intelligent enough to prefer the imperial rule of Protestant England to nominal home rule which would be in reality subjection to the ecclesiastical domination of an [Italian] pope. . . . No wonder they declare their intention to shed every drop of their Protestant blood before they will submit to such degradation. Great Britain has temporized with the papal power too long. The liberality of the British people toward political refugees has attracted Jesuit scheming with the results that now appear.

The press of our country has in some instances expressed itself editorially on the opposition to Home Rule in the province of Ulster. The opposition is not infrequently denounced as medievalism, atavism, revival of seventeenth century religious antipathies and bigotry. These writers do not stop to consider that the force which the Ulsterites have to resist is the most rigidly "medieval" element in modern life, and flaunts as its motto: Roma semper eadem, Rome never changes. So far as the hierarchy is concerned, the Protestants of Ulster have the same fight before them in the twentieth century as their fathers in the seventeenth. We agree entirely with Dr. McNally, who in his reply to Dr. Fisher says: "Let us come down to the present and see if the old spirit of Rome is not as of yore, and that it is the moving and directing spirit in the present movement. Mr. Redmond said not long ago, that Ulster would be dealt with by an iron hand if she refused to submit to an Irish Parliament. Another Nationalist M. P. said: 'Leave them to us, and we will take care (?) of them; they are not Irishmen at all, but English and Scotch that have settled among us.' Another ex-M. P., speaking in Dublin on Friday, February 2, 1912, declared regarding the Irish Protestants and Unionists: 'If they challenged a government founded for the first time on the will of the Irish people (he should have said on two-thirds of the Irish people), then it is best to let them know, for to be forewarned is to be forearmed, that the wind will be let out of the Orange drum, even if it should have to be done with bullet and bayonet.' This is what Ulster may expect from an Irish Parliament. . . . It would be church, papal decrees, and priest, first, last, and all the time. The same would be true of education, and every other interest to the end of the chapter. That the fears of the Ulsterites are well grounded on facts, past and present, may be known and read of all men who will take the trouble to investigate.

The press of July 1 contained despatches from Belfast and London concerning the situation in Ulster of a disquieting nature. From Belfast Mr. S. S. McClure, president of the publishing company in this country, a native of County Antrim in Ulster, was quoted as saying: "Ireland is entitled to Home Rule—that is, each of the opposing sections is entitled to choose its own government by ballot. Unless Ulster is excluded under these terms from the operation of the Home Rule Bill, I fear we shall see the worst civil war in modern history." Mr. McClure had been in Ireland studying the situation for several weeks.

Via London, news from Belfast stated that Lieutenant-General Sir George Richardson, commander-in-chief of the Ulster Volunteers, has issued a general order permitting volunteers to carry rifles on the street. Previously volunteers had drilled with weapons only while on private property. Their force in Belfast is numbered at 30,000, much in excess of the number of police and regular soldiers there. Expectation of relief to the tension by the Home Rule Amendment now before the House of Lords, is not strong.

Both sides upon this historic question, the Irish (Nationalist) Volunteers and the Ulster (Unionist) Volunteers, have been steadily making preparations for a possible armed conflict, since the final passage of the Home Rule Bill in the House of Commons. Colonel Maurice G. Moore, C. B., the commander-in-chief of the Irish Volunteers, is the head of an old Irish Roman Catholic family, and has distinguished himself in British wars. This body includes many old soldiers, and also a number of Protestants among its leaders. They have increased rapidly and already greatly outnumber the Ulster Volunteers. While the Irish Volunteers will doubtless go to any lengths to preserve internal order in Ireland, it is stated that should the Ulster Volunteers find themselves opposed by British soldiers, the Nationalist body may go to the assistance of their countrymen.

'Neath the Old Home Tree

THERE'S a dear old elm 'twixt the road and the gate,
That my grandfather planted when he was young:
It has now arrived at a great estate,
Since the birds at its century birthday sung.

From its sheltering branches, spreading wide,
Comes a blessing from those who have gone before;
And we gather beneath, in our love and pride,
And the older I grow I but love it more.

Now the cows are home, and the milking is done,
And the white-dressed table is set for tea;
There the china shines in the setting sun,
While the kettle is singing right merrily.

There's a smiling face at the open door
Where the sunshine enters the hall beyond,
And it smiles for me as, my labor o'er,
My reward awaits in her greeting fond.

From the barn comes laughing, then voices sweet—
'Tis the music of all that I love to hear—
As the children come trooping. O joy to meet,
And to know with each evening we all are here!

In the perfect shade by the home-tree thrown,
By the world shut off, and its garish glare,
All life's pleasures take on a sweeter tone
And its beauties breathe in a purer air.

Here is treasure measureless, free, unbought;
Here is tender friendship that waits no call;
Here is balm to calm every restless thought;
Here is love to prove it is all in all.

GEORGE BIRDSEYE.

A Golden Opportunity for You

Never till now have we made so tempting an offer to our readers and their friends for the sole purpose of increasing the membership of the Christian Herald Family, as that which we printed in our issue of July 1, pages 634 and 635. This is a golden opportunity for all who love their favorite weekly to unite in rolling up a big list of new members, by sending us their names and addresses with 35 cents each for a six months' subscription. You have your choice for yourself of a number of attractive presents, which are fully set forth in the issue mentioned above, and which include a splendid American flag, 4x6 feet, The Fundamentals of the Faith (set of ten valuable books), our new Up-to-Date Dictionary, 700 pages, and many others. Take up this offer at once. Send in as many new subscriptions on these terms as you can. Select your own rewards from the published list. Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

The Sanctification of Labor*

DOUBTLESS many readers deem the subject of labor a very dull one indeed. The names of many great and most virtuous, and a difference of opinion or a complaint against labor stirs a storm of indignation and disdain.

As in almost the case where any matter is being discussed, it is a good thing to follow the above precedent, to inquire: What did he say about it? What is he saying about it today? It is being widely recognized, among other circles, that Jesus has a right to speak on this subject not only because of his divine authority, but because of his authority as a laborer.

His fellow townsmen did not recognize Jesus' claim upon them as their Lord because they said contemptuously: "Is not this the carpenter?" The man said to be found to have been a carpenter. It gives him the right to be the Labor Leader of the world.

He first taught by his example that labor was a right and holy and necessary thing. He elevated dignity among the workers. He showed, by his contentment not only his belief in labor but his sympathy with the cares and problems of labor. We know that Jesus hated injustice and oppression. He came, he said, "to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives—to set at liberty them that are bruised." He said his followers should imitate and do nothing which will lead to the deliverance of those who are kept under unjust conditions of toil. Christ taught that labor is holy, but he did not teach that labor which is oppressive, unfortunate, unjustified, victim of poverty, misery and death, and nothing to rise and relieve, is holy.

The Scriptures inculcate also that Christ's friend and servant Paul, as well. The rich leaders do not love or friendly toward Paul to reward him, but they do him an injustice. Paul was a friend of the workers. He, too, knew what work was. He labored hard himself, night and day, he worked as a tent-maker. And he laid down a great principle. "He who will not work neither should he eat." That is positively the position of the labor leaders. They object that so many get paid sums of money for which they do not work. They will often hear a street corner labor orator say: "Whenever you see a man get a dollar for which he did not work you have had somebody steal hard-earned for a dollar that he did not get."

Jesus, Paul and the present-day leaders stand together. We cannot live without labor, and we must work if we would eat and live. Each one should receive the benefits of his work—no one more than those benefits from another, but each for himself. Finally, we must all work together in the true co-operative spirit of neighborliness, helping one another, in the spirit of Christ and to the limit of our ability to promote the kingdom and the glory of God.

[illegible] Missions*

THE history of education has been very closely linked with the history of religion. Nearly all of the pre-existing universities of Christendom have had as college aims that part of their endeavor to train and equip men for Christian service.

John Wesley said he wished men to labor for souls not greater in their [illegible]

From the Foreign Field*

WHAT the leader wants most for this meeting are facts. Here are a few:

A recent [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

CHRISTIAN HERALD PRAYER LEAGUE

"I WANT to acknowledge God's goodness in answer to prayer. I asked the prayers of the League three months ago in a financial distress, and that a son might regain health. The Lord has wonderfully led us through, and the son is much improved." This good testimony comes from Mrs. E. C. L. of Fort Collins, Colo.

R. V. McC. writes from Francistown, N. H.: "Three requests for prayer which I asked of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Prayer League are answered." Mrs. M. E. T. of Pomeroy, Pa., writes: "Some time ago I asked for the prayers of the League in our afflictions, and I wish to thank God that we have been relieved." J. W. H. writes from Mount Pleasant, Mich.: "Some time ago I requested the prayers of your circle that God would give me back my old place. I am pleased to state that I am back at the old stand." Mrs. C. F. B. writes: "The requested prayer for the restoration of a loved grandchild who was in the hospital has been answered." Mrs. J. D. T. writes: "I thank God that my request of some time ago has been answered. My brother-in-law has not been drinking now for three months, and had been drinking before that for twenty-five years." Mrs. G. I. T. writes from Northampton: "I want to acknowledge God's answer to prayer in the selling of our farm, and other blessings." H. A. L. writes from Newton, Kan.: "I prayed that one might find work, and that very day he was offered a good position."

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have also been received from:

R. V. M., Francestown, N. H.; Mrs. C. T. B., Pennsylvania; Mrs. N. O. E., Lynchburg, Va.; A. H. T., Petersburg, Va.; Mrs. M. E. T., Pomeroy, Pa.; L. C. T., Northampton, Mass.; Mrs. R. S., Brooklyn, N. Y.; Mrs. C. H., Saegerstown, Pa.; G. B., Dickey, Idaho; Mrs. E. C., Ypsilanti, Mich.; Mrs. W. S. M., Townville, S. C.; H. A. L., Newton, Kan.; Mrs. A. E. P.; Sanford, Fla.; Mrs. E. L. K., Wing, N. D.; Mrs. J. C. P.; G. C. W., Wellsburg, W. Va.; Mrs. B. B., Portland, Ore.; Mrs. C. M.; Binghamton, N. Y.; Mrs. B. F. T., Ousted, Mich.; M. C. F., Gardiner, Me.; Mrs. L. C., Osceola, Neb.; Mrs. G. O. S., Emporium, Pa.; Mrs. J. C., Binghamton, N. Y.

Mrs. W. F. P. writes: "Please pray that my boy may return home. He has left us without a word, and we fear the worst. But I know God answers prayers, and I believe he will bring our boy back if we trust him." A "Constant Reader" asks prayers for a wayward sister whose whereabouts are unknown."

Mrs. B. H. B. asks prayer for a revival in the community of York, N. D.; Miss S. A. O., that Christian workers be sent to a community near Pauline, Neb., where the people never hear the Gospel.

The following friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing:

Mrs. E. O.; A Constant Reader, Gloversville, N. Y.; H. M. H.; S. E. G.; Mrs. J. S. D.; Mrs. M. A. N.; E. McC. (that soul may be made beautiful and Christlike); G. W. S.; M. V. (for deeper desire to win souls and for a complete victory over sin); R. & A. & L. F.; E. Y.; E. E. M.; I. S.; M. S.; F. A.; Mrs. J. C.

A Constant Reader asks prayers for healing of eyesight; C. C. P., that daughter may be saved from blindness; Mrs. S. E. D., that daughter's eyesight may be restored; Mrs. A. D., that eyes may be healed; Mrs. D. A. McD., Mrs. J. A. W., W. H. B., Miss M. C., Mrs. A. J. K. and Mrs. C. A. R. that eyesight may be restored.

The following friends ask prayer for the conversion of sons:

Mrs. S. H. B.; Mrs. R. S.; P. H. N.; H. A. L.; M. R. D.; Mrs. C. A. R.; Mrs. M. E. McD.; Mrs. B. S.; Mrs. F. L.; Mrs. J. M.; Mrs. R. W. W.; A. M. S.; Mrs. R. A.; E. F.; Mrs. A. D.; Mrs. S. E. C.; Mrs. M. R. C.; C. C. P. (that son may be converted and overcome drug habit); B. I. S. (that two sons who were once Christians may be converted and one overcome drink habit); Mrs. M. H. —MR. AND MRS. SHERWOOD EDDY and Mr. J. Hartley Fowler sailed from San Francisco on the 6th of June to conduct a six months' evangelistic campaign in China, Japan, and Korea among government students and officials. A campaign for women will be conducted by Mrs. Eddy. A province-wide campaign will be held in the secondary cities of the south of China. Missionaries, Chinese leaders, and even many of the officials have already pledged their co-operation in the meetings. A chain of student conferences and of missionary conventions will be held during the summer to relate the Chinese students and missionary body to the evangelistic campaign, the itinerary of which is as follows: June 12, Honolulu, Hawaii; June 23, Yokohama, Japan; July 1-3, North China Student Conference; July 5-7, Mid-China Student Conference; July 8-10, Conference at Hangchow; July 12-31, Kuling Missionary Convention and Conferences; August 9-30, Peitaiho Missionary Convention and Conferences; September 15 to December 6, China Evangelistic Campaign as follows: September 15-20, Tientsin; September 23-27, Peking; September 29, 30, Paotingfu; October 1-10, Hangchow; October 11-13, Soochow; October 20-30, Fukien Province-wide Campaign; November 5-11, Hongkong; November 13-17, Canton; November 20-30, Shanghai; December 1-6, Nanking; December 6-30, Evangelistic Campaign in Japan and Korea.

Four new subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one-half year at 35 cents, sent in by a present subscriber, will earn a reward of a Red Letter Testament—a beautiful New Testament, and the only one containing the words spoken by our Lord printed in red. For one, two, three, five and six subscriptions other valuable rewards will be given. Send to us at once for this interesting offer, and help us extend the influence of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by this remarkable method. Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Try Serving Them Together

Try mixing Puffed Grains with your berries—Puffed Wheat or Puffed Rice.

Believe us, the blend is delicious.

Imagine nut meats toasted and puffed into bubbles—thin, flaky, fragile morsels with a fascinating taste. That's about how Puffed Grains taste with berries. They add more than sugar and cream.

These are more than mere breakfast cereals. Use them in candy making. Scatter like nut meats over ice cream. Douse with melted butter, and note how the children prefer them.

But serve above all in bowls of milk—for luncheons, for suppers, for a "good-night dish." The grains will float. They are crisp and airy—porous, toasted, delightful in flavor. And they do not tax the stomach. Prof. Anderson's process has made every atom easy to digest.

CORN PUFFS 15¢

These Are the Fittest Foods

There are other ways to make cereals inviting, but no other way to so fit them for food.

Here every food granule (there are millions per kernel) is blasted by steam explosion. The best other methods will rarely break half of them. And unbroken granules usually fail to digest.

So Puffed Grains are not mere enticements—not merely new forms of great foods. They have solved, for the first time, complete, perfect cooking. They have made every atom and element available as food.

Prof. Anderson has now found a way to accomplish this in three grains. First came Rice, then Wheat, then Corn. Now all of these grains may be served on your table in this only ideal form.

Keep all in the pantry—for variety's sake. And serve them in different ways.

afraid of nothin' nor nobody, an' if they think you are, so much the worse for 'em. They'll think you won't come back if they believe that."

"They're a-comin'," said a man who had been watching out of the door. "Looks like the hull blame town is with 'em. There'll be trouble right now if you don't light out!"

"Make a quick get-away," said the barkeeper urgently; "come down here at daybreak to-morrow mornin'. I'll be up an' let you in; an' here," he handed him a bottle of liquor, "this'll keep you up."

"An' I kin count on all of you?"

"You kin," said the crowd unanimously.

His horse had been led around to the back of the saloon, whence a narrow, difficult trail led up the mountain through the pines. Without another word, Dead Shot Jackson bolted out of the back door, swung his leg over the saddle, shook by the hand the barkeeper who had followed him, and striking spurs into his tired horse, galloped up the trail and disappeared. The barkeeper rushed back to the saloon and resumed his place behind the bar.

"Git back to your tables, gents," he exclaimed. "Go on with your games, an' try to look jest as if nothin' had happened, an'—"

The interior of The Black Pup presented its usual aspect when the door was thrown open by Old Four Eyes, who entered, followed by many others, all with their guns drawn and ready. Mr. Morrison had come, too, although they had protested against it. He was the only man of the party who was not armed to the teeth.

"Good-evenin', gents," said the barkeeper with specious geniality. "I ain't seen many of you in yere for a long time. What'll you all have to drink?"

"Which we ain't come yere," answered Old Four Eyes sternly, "as your reg'lar customers, but—"

"Well, what have you come fer then, an' why?" asked the barkeeper, who knew very well the answer, but was playing for time.

"It's been reported to us that Dead Shot Jackson is in this yere saloon. We've come to arrest him an' try him for murder accordin' to due process of law, him bein' a fugitive from justice."

"He ain't yere."

"What!"

"That's what I said."

"Where is he?"

"Gone," answered the barkeeper laconically.

"He was yere, then?"

"Yep, come in with his gun out, got the drop on all of us, took his likker, went out the back door, an' that's the last we seen of him."

"Do you mean to tell me he is gone?"

"I do."

"You kin judge for yerself; he ain't yere."

"Where's his hoss?"

"I led it around to the back door," answered one of the men in the saloon, "him a-threatenin' to fill me full of lead if I didn't do it. Not that I was afeared of him, but I thought it was best for all of us to git him out of the camp without no trouble, an' so I done it."

"And you all saw him go?"

"We sure did. He hit the old trail as fast as he could make his bronco carry him away."

"That beats the case," said Old Four Eyes regretfully. "I reckon we all gents has got nothin' further to do yere. But I jest got a few words to say. We wants no blackguards like Dead Shot Jackson in this yere camp, which if he comes back to Cañon Creek we'll try him an' we'll hang him. If we all gits our hands on him again, he won't get away no more. Without namin' no names, an' without wishin' to be offensive to any gent, I p'ints out that if he's got any friends around yere, to give him this word: tell him that we all don't stand no more for any sich as he, an' if he comes back to Cañon Creek he'll git his, good an' plenty. In conclusion, I invites you all to the Sunday school to-morrer mornin' an' I announces that we are goin' to have a perfessional, a kind of a boss preacher, which they calls him a bishop, to talk to us after the school is over."

"Oh, go to—" roared out a voice in the back of the room.

"My eyesight not bein' good, I don't recognize the gent who wished me that kind wish, but I wants to say that me an' these gents ain't a-goin' that a way. You gents is headed that away, an' take it from me, you'd better look out. Now we all wishes you all 'good-night,' an' we all leaves you peaceful an' quiet. Jest remember, if any of you do come across Dead Shot Jackson, to repeat the warnin' words I've jest uttered," said Old Four Eyes with deep gravity, turning away, followed by all the others.

CHAPTER XIII

OLD FOUR EYES, the Doc, Parson Bill, and other influential men of the camp were by no means satisfied with the situation. It seemed almost beyond belief that Dead Shot Jackson should have come back to Cañon Creek merely to get a drink and then should have left so precipitately as the men at The Black Pup had declared. Perhaps in other times a posse would have been organized, and there would have been an all-night hunt over the mountains for the desperado. A man-hunt, with the prospect of lively shooting at the end of it, would have been an opportunity which would not have been lightly passed by; but now a new spirit had come over the community. They were determined to enforce the law, and they did not intend that any shooting up of the town or any bullying of the place should be allowed. But they were not looking for trouble as in days gone by. If he had gone, it would be better not to hunt for him. They were willing to let sleeping dogs lie. And it was hoped that Old Four Eyes' warning would serve to prevent his return.

There had been a serious impression made upon the minds of the better sort by the work of the Sunday school, and by the presence of a good man and a good woman and their family, and so they were rather relieved at being spared the unpleasant necessity of dealing with the outlaw. They fervently hoped that he had gone for good, or trusted that if he came back, the message they left for him would suffice to send him away again and to keep him away. They were not very sanguine, however, that their hopes would be realized; in fact, they expected trouble. They had not so far got rid of the old leaven of malice and wickedness as not to have a pretty keen idea of the feelings and emotions of the outlaw. That he would make trouble sooner or later was a foregone conclusion.

They, therefore, dispersed after a time upon their several errands, going about their business with somewhat dubious thoughts for the morrow. Old Four Eyes and the Doc and Parson Bill kept together after the rest had separated, and they all went up to the Morrison home to talk over the matter further. The Morrisons were, of course, greatly interested, and not a little perturbed. But their feeling was not one of personal fear in the least degree.

Mr. Morrison was a small man who could have made little resistance to any physical attack, but there was not a drop of coward's blood in his body. Naturally, however, he did not want the peaceful and happy course of events which had followed the arrival of his family in Cañon Creek to be disturbed. He wanted very much indeed to continue his worship and instruction without being compelled to resort to violence for the protection of himself, his family, his friends and followers in their civil and religious liberties.

"'Pears to me," said Old Four Eyes, "that this yere murderin' Jackson party has got wind of the comin' of our e-vangelist,"—for so he called the expected ecclesiastic—"an' he's goin' to make trouble for we all. I don't believe that bluff of the barkeep's about him a-runnin' away. I'll say this for him, he ain't that kind."

"If the news we have received is correct," said Parson Bill, "the bishop ought to hit the trail near the railroad crossing about midnight. I reckon it wouldn't be a bad idea for some of us to go down and meet him there. Dead Shot might try to intercept our preacher friend."

"God will surely protect his messenger," said Mrs. Morrison.

"Yes'm, in course; but sometimes he uses men like myself an' my friends for that purpose. Therefore," said the big miner, "I'll go down the trail myself and meet the bishop."

"I'm with you," said the Doc.

"I'd be willin' to jine that party," said Old Four Eyes.

"No, you'd better stay here and round up the boys in the morning. It may be nine or ten o'clock before they can get back with the bishop," said Mrs. Morrison.

"Yes, I couldn't think of having you all go. You know you are the pillars of the little church," said Mr. Morrison earnestly. "I'm not in the least degree afraid to stay alone, but—"

"We all knows that," said Old Four Eyes heartily. "Parson Bill an' the Doc ought to be good enough for one desperaydo even if it's Jackson or anybody. They won't need me. I'll stick around yere all right."

"You will not go armed?" asked Mrs. Morrison to the two men preparing to leave.

"Ma'am," returned the Doc, "it ain't safe on sich an errand for us to be without our guns. In fact, I ain't never been without mine since I kin remember. I usually takes it to bed with me. I reckon I must 'a' been brought up on it, like a kid on a nussin' bottle."

"We won't use our weapons, Mrs. Morrison, except as a last resort, you may be sure of that," said Parson Bill.

"I am sure of it," said Mrs. Morrison. "You have not confessed Christ before men, but I would trust you both anywhere and with anything."

"Seems to me if anything could persuade me to what you ask your confidence would make me do it," replied Parson Bill, very much touched.

"I have the same trust in you all," said Mrs. Morrison. "I never met with braver, truer men or more devoted men."

"Which Bill has expressed our sentiments with regard to them statements of yourn," said Old Four Eyes, the Doc thereto agreeing also.

"Well, then, if we're goin', we'd better start now," said Parson Bill.

"Yes, I suppose so," said Mr. Morrison. "Good-night to you."

"Wait," said Mrs. Morrison.

THE SECRET OF YOUTH

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

LONG years ago, when the Eden Tree was fresh and green, and men carved their thoughts on rough stone with rude chisels, the ancients had a saying that ran like this:

"Whom the gods love die young." (Perhaps our modern slang "The good die young" comes from it.) On account of this line of writing, folk got the superstitious idea that the favorites of the heavenly rulers died while they were innocent of the wickedness of this world. So the children, the girls in their freshest bloom, the hardy young athletes, were called heroes and saints when they passed away.

Years after, a wiser race of people came to live on the earth. They saw the carved inscriptions and translated the sentence, "Whom the gods love die young," in this way:

"The favorites of the gods die still young — or young in heart."

So they found the secret of youth.

MRS. PETER LONGROD (96) AND DESCENDANTS

I know a boy in his early twenties. He has a great deal to make him happy, and comparatively few cares and troubles. But his forehead, which should be smooth, is covered with innumerable wrinkles, and a deep line defines each corner of his mouth too clearly. His years are few, but his heart is the heart of an old man because he worries. If the stars don't come out on time in the evening, he worries about the thunder storm that may happen next day. If the stars do come he knows that it is going to be dry and hot. If he buys a new suit, he worries about how long it will last, and if he makes some money, he worries about how soon he will spend it. As a chum of his told me, "He has the weight of the world on his shoulders."

People nowadays do not seem to live as long as they used to. Before the Civil War one often heard of folks who lived to be a hundred and over. But now, if a person grows to be a few years over the average, the papers print columns about it, and wonder exceedingly on the ways of Providence. One of our readers, however, sends in a picture—the picture of five generations—that is a comfort.

"See them," exclaimed a man who looked at the picture with me; "don't they all look healthy? five of them!"

"See them," my heart echoed. "See them. Don't they all look happy?" Perhaps that is the secret. I want you to see the picture, too, the picture on this page.

There was once a man who inaugurated a society called the "Don't Worry Club!" A little, round-faced, happy-looking man he was, with a perpetual smile on his face, and the unclouded blueness of old china in his eyes. He had a whole bookful of by-laws for his society, and on the tip of his tongue he had many reasons for not worrying. He had a nice home, and a wonderfully attractive family, and plenty of money — in fact, when you came right down to the most solemn truth, he had small reason to worry. A few years after the club had been started, however, the man began to have trouble. He applied his rules vigorously and repeated his little happy sayings to himself. He smiled and he joked and he told funny stories. But back in his mind a little seed of worry sprouted and grew, until a strained look took the place of the happy one, and the smile grew forced. Finally, the man died—and oh, the tragedy of it! for he died of worry!

"Whom the gods love die young," says the ancient writing. "Whom the gods love die young in heart."

I suppose that now I should say, "Don't worry." But instead I will say, "Try not to worry." It's rather impossible to tell a person point-blank to stop what is in many cases the habit of a lifetime. Our world is improving slowly—surely. But to some people the many new inventions and conveniences mean not a great help, but just more things to worry about.

Ponce de Leon has long been dead, but his name is one that will live forever, deeply graven on the pages of history. For, although he did not find the fountain of youth, he discovered a land—a new land filled with flowers, and rare fruits, and the music of song birds.

It goes that way, friends of mine. There isn't a fountain of youth. There never was a fountain of youth and never will be; but if you start out on your voyage of discovery with the vision of a pure life, and the ambition of noble purposes, and the light of love shining before your eyes, you will in time discover a new land with flowers and song birds and the gold of sunshine. For if the heart is right, you will have found the secret of youth.

Resinol Soap
for natural skin beauty

When you wash your face do you realize that it is not enough to remove the dirt—that your skin needs a soothing, healing influence to preserve the natural beauty of your complexion?

Ordinary toilet soaps do not assert this influence. Many of them contain free alkali, which tends to dry the skin and destroy its delicate texture. Even the best of such soaps can only clean, they cannot heal and protect the skin. Resinol Soap, besides being an absolutely pure toilet soap, contains the same soothing, healing, antiseptic balsams as Resinol Ointment, the value of which in the treatment of skin affections is known throughout the medical profession.

That is why Resinol Soap does for the skin what cosmetics are supposed to do—it insures not only a clean skin, but a healthy skin, and a fair, clear complexion.

Resinol Soap is not artificially colored, its rich brown being entirely due to the Resinol balsams it contains. Twenty-five cents at all druggists' and dealers' in toilet-goods. You will never know what good soap is until you pay a fair price for it. For guest-room size trial cake, with miniature box of Resinol Ointment, write to Dept. 25-G, Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

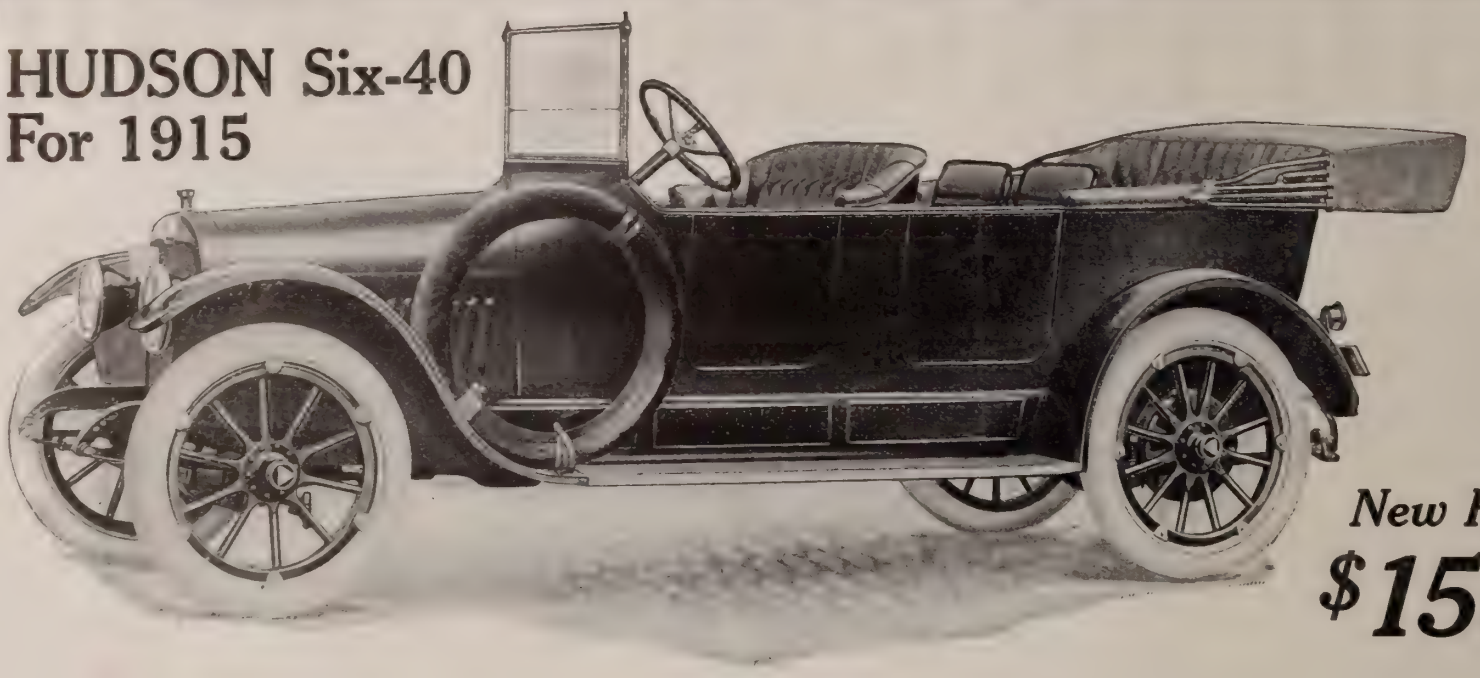
HUDSON Six-40 For 1915



New Price
$1550

The New Criterion

In the HUDSON Six-40 for 1915 we present a new standard for quality cars.

Go see how other cars measure up to it.

Here are new attainments in lightness, in beauty, in utter refinement. Here are new comforts, new conveniences. Here is new economy in operative cost.

And here, above all, is a new quality price. Howard E. Coffin's finest production—the finished model of his ideal Six—is sold for $1,550.

It will force revision in the ideas of what high-grade cars should cost.

Every detail of this car conforms with HUDSON standards. And no man thinks those standards would be compromised for price.

Our 48 engineers, including Mr. Coffin, have devoted four years to this model. They have given one year—the year just past—to nothing but final refinements. It is hardly probable that other men in other cars excel them. If not, our price is the proper cost today for motor car perfection.

It will alter old-time ideas of what stanch cars need to weigh.

Good engineers never sacrifice strength to lightness. They use Aluminum in place of iron. They use drop forgings in place of castings. They use finer grades of steel. They employ better designing. One example in the HUDSON is our tubular propeller shaft.

The new HUDSON Six-40 weighs 2,890 pounds. You used to expect at least 4,000 pounds in a 7-passenger car. We have saved that difference—the weight of seven adults—by sheer good engineering. It means immense saving in fuel and tire cost. And the thousands of light cars we sent out last year proved the ample strength of every part.

It fixes new economy standards.

In the HUDSON Six-40 we adapt from Europe a new-type small-bore motor. It immensely reduces operative cost. That motor in this light-weight car has increased miles-per-gallon about 30 per cent for cars of this capacity.

It establishes a new ideal of a handsome, distinguished and well-equipped car.

The HUDSON Six-40 looks the jewel among cars. Its lines are artistic, its finish superb. Our whole engineering corps spent all last year on just the final touches. Every detail shows a master hand. And, in some respects, no other car on the market is so perfectly equipped.

How We Saved You $200

The last HUDSON Six-40 sold for $1,750—a record for this-class car. The new model brings out 31 improvements—some costly, all important. Yet this year's price is $200 less.

That is due to the car's popularity. Last season men overbought our output by 3,000 cars. For 1915 we have trebled our capacity, and the saving is deducted from our price.

HUDSON cars are not built to a price. Could we build better in any respect we would do so. But we don't quote an overprice just to prove class.

Go measure up this model. We consider it America's representative car—the model for coming types. And we are sure that most men will agree with us.

Phaeton, seating up to 7 passengers, $1,550 f.o.b. Detroit. Standard Roadster, same price.

MONT-LAWN CELEBRATES THE FOURTH

THE TWENTY-FIRST INDEPENDENCE DAY AT THE CHILDREN'S PARADISE

IF ONLY the editor would let me have my own way, I would tell this story very differently. For example, I would begin by taking it for granted that you do not realize that Mont-Lawn is one of the great sights in this country. Then I would excite your curiosity by saying that three hundred slum children, by the time they ave been there five days, can sing in harmony in a manner to win our unstinted admiration. Three hundred waifs gathered from ere and there in a big city, taught in five days to sing our best-oved songs in concert, correctly? Yes, and beautifully.

If I began that way, wouldn't you want to know more bout the place? Then I would go on and say that three undred children of the very poor, unused to any of the ice ways of life, assemble after their play, tired and hun-ry—oh, so hungry!—in the big open-air dining-hall, and tand without a sign of greed before the long tables of appe-izing food and sing a grace; then they seat themselves and -grab for everything in sight? Not one grab. Happy and erene, they wait for the passing of their portion, and eat t with remarkably little evidence of haste. How are these hings accomplished—these and many other delightful ffects? That is the question I would like to prompt, and nswer. It would make a wonderful story. Instead, I must ecount the doings of the Fourth at Mont-Lawn. Oh, well!

The Fourth of July is gala day at Mont-Lawn, as perhaps ou know. Supported as it is by friends all over the United tates, Mont-Lawn is really a national institution, and so it s fitting that the Fourth should be its great day. But visitors re apt to forget that the things enjoyed by them that day are nerely a selection from the routine daily or weekly doings. It s well to remember that Mont-Lawn is just the same in its heery spirit, its deportment, its play and its special exercises, he whole season through. You may go there any day of the ummer and witness the remarkable working out of the "city's oor children problem" that astonishes you on the Fourth.

Of course, on such a special day, there is bound to be an air of pleasurable excitement which even the children share. Guests arrive at all hours during the morning, coming by automobile and carriage and on foot, or in the conveyances of the Home, from the railroad station at Nyack. Some of them are from quite distant points, New York and intermediate places; many come from Nyack and surrounding country. The spacious veranda of the Homestead and the broad sweep of lawn are soon dotted with groups. Usually, by the time the day's program begins, these groups have become one pretty large crowd of men and women and some children. Every one has been welcomed by Mont-Lawn's very efficient and gracious superintendent, Miss Emma Goering, of the CHRISTIAN HERALD staff. Miss Goering, by the way, is the explanation of the perfect working of the whole institution. Guided by one or another aide, many of the guests have inspected the buildings, and are trying to understand why there are not a hundred such institutions scattered through the land. A social worker of prominence, after his trip through the little colony of dormitories and other buildings this Fourth, thankfully exclaimed, "At last I have found the solution!" Well, it has been there for twenty years.

Besides the stable, empty of horses to avoid drawing flies and other unhygienic things, the forty-thousand-gallon water tanks with their fine filtering system, and the cozy Homestead, which is an open house to visitors at all times, there are ten dormitories, the gifts of loving friends; the Lodge; the beautiful Children's Temple; the fine new workers' dormitory; and Fort Plenty, the big open-air dining-hall with sanitary kitchen, a large rainy-day playroom above. Covered passageways connect Fort Plenty and the Homestead and all the dormitories, so that exposure to bad weather is unnecessary. Then there is the big playground with its outdoor gym equipment and bathing pavilion. This is the "plant." And this is about all I may say about it, because it isn't special to the Fourth. Every day of the summer you can see the same entrancing orderliness of the twenty or more little iron beds standing in rows in the dormitories, just as you see them in your tour of inspection on this great day. These dormitories—I am bound I will get in this extra word—are practically open-air sleeping quarters, capable of being emptied in the twinkling of an eye in case of need. From force of habit some new arrivals insist upon sleeping under the snowy cots, until their first enforced repose between the glistening sheets: after that, habit loses all power over them. But to return to our story.

Where were we? Oh, yes: the groups merged into one big crowd on the lawn. It is just past noon. The children have gotten back from their daily walk in the country in care of their teachers. They have had their dinner. They are doing their best now to wear out the swings, the slides, the teeter-totter boards, the ladders and what not over on the playground. The sound of their gaiety floats up to the visitors. More automobiles arrive. On the Homestead veranda, where many are seated enjoying the marvelous view of the Hudson, a Nyack band plays. A perfect day sheds a perfect peace over the whole scene. The scene, by the way, includes the Stars and Stripes floating from two flagstaffs on the lawn and one above the tower.

A bell sounds a signal. The climbing-poles, the swings and whatnots are suddenly empty. A long, double row of children has formed across the playground. Led by the boys and officered by the white-robed teachers, the column begins to march up the road that leads through the grounds. Did I say that the ten dormitories faced a broad gravel walk called Sunshine Alley? The boys flank this walk and halt, and the girls pass sedately between. Sunshine Alley leads to the Temple. Thither they go, the boys falling in behind. Thither the entire crowd of visitors goes. The curved oaken seats facing the pulpit are filled by the children. Visitors fill the platform, a balcony above it, and the wide ambulatory along one side opening into the Temple by doors and windows. Mr. Noll, the singing instructor, is at the organ. Rev. Arthur H. Howland, chaplain of Mont-Lawn, presides. There is a reverent repeating of "Our Father." Then for a half hour the children sing. And as they sing the faces of the grown-up guests shine with an inner emotion that only the melodious voices of childhood, raised in such trained unison, can awaken.

Presently it was time to close the service of song. An aged man, very good to look upon because of the goodness in his face, Rev. Dr. Babbitt, rector of Grace Church, Nyack, rose to pronounce a blessing. For nearly twenty years Dr. Babbitt has been at every celebration of Independence Day at Mont-Lawn. He said: "I have spoken from this platform to the little folks who came here before you were born." The juvenile auditors heard and wondered. With deep feeling Dr. Babbitt read from a letter written to him by Dr. Klopsch six years before, in which the founder of this far-reaching beneficence referred to the work at Mont-Lawn as affording him greater joy and satisfaction than anything else he had ever undertaken.

After saluting the Stars and Stripes draped above the platform, repeating their oath of allegiance, the host of children formed line and marched back along Sunshine Alley to the big lawn. The grown-ups followed on behind. Everybody found places in front of the speakers' stand, the children en masse, visitors in easy groups all about. The scene was inspiring, and the speakers measured up to it. Dr. Ferdinand C. Iglehart, who has attended these gatherings for at least fifteen years, stirred the patriotism of every hearer by his eloquence and his noble apostrophe to the flag. He was followed by Pastor William Schoenfeld, of New York, who won the hearts of all his audience by a masterly application of timely stories.

Followed most graceful folk dances by thes children of New York's streets. Mont Lawn ha skilled calisthenic teachers to instruct the childre and the evolutions performed on the lawn thi Fourth were delightful. But the afternoon wa getting on. A special treat of daylight firework had been provided, and after they had been cheere to the echo by the youngsters, the happy sound o the supper bell was heard. Again the lines forme right where the Mont-Lawn children were in th midst of their play. With excellent order the marched into Fort Plenty. Standing for a mo ment in silence—and there was absolutely no evi dence of "discipline" being exercised at the tim —they with perfect unison lifted up their youthfu voices and sang:

> Back of the loaf the snowy flour,
> Back of the flour the mill,
> Back of the mill, the wheat and the shower,
> The grain and the Father's will.

Then they fell to upon a perfectly deserved Fourt of July supper. And the guests departed for their

Probably you might not know the people wh were there, even if I named the most prominent But you will be interested to know that Mrs. Klopsc was present as always, happy, proud of the wor and the workers and of the worker who has gone Her daughter, Miss Mary Klopsch, officers an members of the CHRISTIAN HERALD staff and o their families, Assistant Superintendent Hunt o the Bowery Mission, and oh, a great many othe interesting and vastly interested people were there The day was wonderful. CONFUCIANISM AS MISSIONARIES VIEW IT EVER since the official proclamation by President Yuan Shi Kai, announcing the restoration of Confucianism and heaven-worship in the new Chinese republic, there has been a wide diversity of opinion both in this country and Europe as to the probable outcome. Many have regarded the new edict as a menace to Christianity. Others, better informed, have viewed it in the light of a movement for a political purpose. President Yuan himself took the ground that it was meant for the moral uplift of the Chinese people, who had deteriorated.

In order to ascertain from the most reliable and practical sources the probable influence of the re-establishment of Confucianism on religious work in China, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD wrote to the missionaries themselves. A number of their replies are given below.

THE PRESIDENT OF CHINA

A Political Move Purely

WE HAVE had only a short time in which to judge; but as far as Nanking is concerned, Christianity has never before been so favorably received as now. The literati, who before the last revolution could scarcely be reached at all, are now turning in large numbers to Christianity. Last year after the revolution there was organized in the Y. M. C. A. a Bible study campaign with the object of reaching this class. Some hundreds agreed to study for three months, at the end of which time about two hundred indicated their desire to join the church, while many others indicated a purpose to further study of the Gospel. It would seem to indicate that the movement in favor of Confucianism in Peking is looked upon merely in the light of a political move, since these literati are naturally the priests of Confucianism.

All classes of the Chinese are receiving Christianity with an eagerness which was never found among them until after the second revolution.

Bishop Huntington's View Hopeful

I CANNOT see how it can fail to have some effect on mission work. If the intention is merely that officials throughout the country should undertake the Confucian worship, but not that they should be forced to do so, while this will somewhat retard the progress of Christianity or at least of nominal conversion, I think it will tend also to somewhat retard the progress of Western materialism, which is quite as serious a danger as Confucianism. In any event, the whole reactionary movement, and not simply the establishment of Confucianism, is the thing that must be studied.

The attempt at the revival of Confucianism is by no means a purely political move. It is led by a band of earnest and learned Confucianists headed by Mr. Chen Hwang Tsang, who, in addition to being a fine Chinese scholar, is a Ph.D. of Columbia. They publish a magazine, the Confucian Association Monthly, which is a much abler production than anything published by the Christian Church, and their propaganda is widely extended and well organized throughout the country.

As I see things here locally in Anking, there is certainly not the same spirit of inquiry that there was a year ago, although there is nothing that I should call hostility. Take it all around, I think it is fair to say that the reactionary movement has, up to the present time, had a very slight evil effect upon the church. How long the present reaction will last or to what extreme it may go, it is of course quite impossible to say.

D. T. HUNTINGTON.

Missionaries Not Discouraged

WHEN we consider China's internal political condition there is seen an alarming state of confusion. It is absurd to think of this country as a republic in any true sense. Yuan Shi Kai is at best a dictator. Whatever else may be said, he is certainly not a president, the chief executive of a constitutional republic. There is now no representative government. The president is really the state. All power is centered in him and all authority goes forth from him.

So in matters where the government has expressed itself in affairs pertaining to religion. Here there seems likewise not the slightest evidence of a guiding principle. At one time the Christians in China, and indeed all over the world, are requested to maintain a day of prayer for president and republic, and thereupon many think that the land has been practically won for Christ. A few months later it is proposed that Confucianism, which is, after all, merely a system of ethics, be made the state religion. Be it noted that at the very time these mandates were being sent forth, there is the best authority for believing that the president was actually privately suggesting to Christians that they send in their protests against those very mandates. To our strictly logical Western minds such ar fatal inconsistencies and must foreshadow destruc tion. This is not necessarily the correct view. T the Oriental mind and to those of us who come un der its spell there is still a reasonable feeling tha all may mean only stages in real progress towar the desired goal.

If there is going to be any feeling of discourage ment or of dismay or any shrinking back, th writer for one is glad that all such attitudes ar practically confined to other parts of the world, fo they are certainly not much in evidence amon Christian workers here. J. W. PAXTON.

Confucianism Not a "State Religion"

CONFUCIANISM has not been and I presum will not be adopted by China as a state religion Every religion will have the same right of way, an the Christian religion could take China for Chris in a remarkably short time if its friends woul only improve the opportunity. If there ever wa a time when the whole Christian Church was cha lenged and when it should accept with all its God given powers, that time is now and China is th place. GEORGE S. MINER.

Will Not Impede Christian Missions

I BELIEVE the effect upon missionary work an upon the public life of the country will be prac tically negligible. The decree is simply an acknowl edgment by the government of China's very grea and abiding debt to Confucius for what his teach ings have meant for the moral life of the natio during many centuries, and a recognition of th ethical basis of national and political life. N official is obligated (as under the old régime) t bow to Confucius, or to pay him such respect a constitutes worship, if his conscience is opposed t it, as there is no compulsion upon anybody.

No; let me emphasize it, there need be no fea for the future—if the church at home is faithfu to its great trust. The Chinese want us here, an they are taking the Gospel as fast as they can as similate it. Just now it is reaching the educate classes with an impact that is irresistible.

Will Not Affect Missionaries Materially

AS for the common people, it will not affect them very much, but it will affect those Christians who are in official positions. Opinions differ very much as to what the outcome will be. Our opinion is that this will be better for the growth of a healthy Christian church; whereas, if the Chinese government would recognize the Christian religion as the state religion, many would wish to join the church just for face, as the Chinese say.

PRESIDENT'S IDEAL FOR AMERICA

IN Independence Hall, Philadelphia, there was a great gathering on July 4 which was addressed by President Wilson. He stood beside the chair which had been occupied 138 years before by the chairman of that august assemblage which adopted the Declaration of Independence. The President's address, while largely patriotic, dealt with the immediate problems of our time. He said many notable things touching on business conditions, the banking system, "dollar diplomacy," Mexico and American enterprise abroad, and he lifted up the standard of the higher patriotism of unselfish service to the nation and to the world. We quote the following notable passage from the address:

"Patriotism consists of some very practical things; practical, in that they belong to everyday life, in that they belong to no extraordinary distinction, but to those things which are associated with our everyday commonplace duty.

"It is patriotic to know what the facts are and to face them with candor. I have heard a great many facts stated about the present business conditions in this country, for example—a great many allegations of facts, at any rate—and it is strange that these facts as stated do not tally with each other.

"Now the truth always matches the truth, and when I find gentlemen insisting that everything is going wrong when it is demonstrable that most things are going right, I wonder what they are trying to do. Are they trying to serve the country or are they trying to serve something smaller than the country? Are they trying to put hope into the hearts of men who work and toil every day, or rather are they putting discouragement and despair into these hearts? If they love America and anything is wrong, it is their duty to put their hands to the task of setting it right. And when the facts are known and acknowledged, the duty of all patriotic men is to accept them in candor and address themselves to common counsel and to work in harmony and universal concert.

"You know the Declaration of Independence has in one sense lost its significance. Nobody believed we could be independent when that document was written. Now, nobody would dare to doubt we are independent. As a declaration of independence it is a mere historic document. The independence is a fact so stupendous that it can be measured only by the size, energy, ability, wealth and power of one of the greatest nations of the world. But it is one thing to be independent and it is another thing to know what to do with your independence. It is one thing to come to your majority and another thing to know what you are going to do with your life and your energies.

"One of the most serious questions for sober minded men to address themselves to in these United States is, What are we going to do with the influence and power of this great nation? Are we going to play the old rôle of using that power for our own aggrandizement and material benefit? You know what that means. That means that we shall use it to make the people of other nations suffer in the way in which we said it was intolerable to suffer when we uttered the Declaration of Independence.

"The Department of State of the United States is constantly called upon to back up commercial enterprises and the industrial enterprises of the United States in foreign countries; and it at one time went so far in that direction that all its diplomacy was designated as 'dollar diplomacy.' It was for supporting every man who wanted to gain anything anywhere if he was an American.

"But there is a limit to that which has laid upon us more than any other nation in the world. We set up this nation and we propose to set it up on the rights of man. We did not name any differences between one race and another; we did not set up any barriers against any particular race or people, but opened our gates to the world, and said, all men who wish to be free come to us and they will be welcome. We said this independence is not merely for us—a selfish thing for our own private use—but for everybody to whom we can find the means of extending it.

"Now we cannot with that oath taken in our youth; we cannot, with that great idea set before us when we were a young people and practically only a scant three million, take upon ourselves, now that we are a hundred million, any other conception of duty than what we entertained at that time.

"So if American enterprise in foreign countries, particularly in those foreign countries which are not strong enough to resist us, takes the shape of imposing upon and exploiting the mass of the people in that country it ought to be put to a stop, not encouraged.

"I am willing to get anything for an American that money can buy, except the rights of other men. I will not help any man to buy a power he should not exercise over his fellow being.

"You know what a big question there is in Mexico. Eighty-five per cent. of the Mexican people have never been allowed to have a look in in regard to their government and the rights which have been exercised by the other 15 per cent.

"Do you suppose that circumstance is not sometimes in my thought? Every patriotic American is a man who is not niggardly and selfish in the things he needs that make for human liberty and the rights of man, but wants to share it with the whole world. And he is never so proud of the great flag as when it means for other people as well as himself the symbol of liberty and freedom.

"I would be ashamed of this flag if it ever did anything outside of America that we would not permit it to do inside of America. We stand for the mass of the men, women and children of every nation.

"Would you rather be despised by all the nations of the world as incapable of keeping your treaty obligations, or would you rather have free tolls for American ships? The treaty may have been a mistake, but its meaning was unmistakable. When I have made a promise to a man I try to keep it. The most honorable and distinguished nation in the world is the nation that can keep its promise to its own hurt. I want to say, parenthetically, that I don't think anybody was hurt. I am not enthusiastic for subsidies to a monopoly and nobody can get me enthusiastic on that subject. But, assuming that was a matter of enthusiasm, I am much more enthusiastic for keeping the integrity of the United States absolutely unquestioned and unsullied.

"The way to success in America is to show you are not afraid of anybody except God and his judgment. If I did not believe that, I would not believe in democracy. If I did not believe that, I would not believe people could govern themselves. If I did not believe that the moral judgment would be the last and final judgment in the minds of men as well as at the tribunal of God, I could not believe in popular government.

"AND MY DREAM IS THIS—"

"And my dream is this: that as the years go on and the world knows more and more of America, it also will bring out this fountain of youth and renewal; that it will also turn to America for those moral inspirations that lie at the base of human freedom; that it will never fear America unless it finds itself engaged in some enterprise inconsistent with the rights of humanity; that America will come to that day when all shall know she puts human rights above all other rights, that her flag is the flag not only of America, but of humanity."

BAPTIST CONVENTION HONORS JUDSON

BOSTON entertained one of the greatest conventions in the history of the Northern Baptist bodies, June 24 to July 2. The celebration of the Judson centenary, of course, an extraordinary feature, marked this, the seventh annual gathering, as a red letter event. A great deal of other important and interesting matters also occupied the sessions, which were held in Tremont Temple, and nearly 2,000 delegates were in attendance. The Southern Baptist Convention sent Dr. E. C. Dargan as fraternal delegate.

The addresses of the leaders in the many departments of work were keyed up to a high note of co-operative effort for the advancement of the great work of the Baptist body. It was pointed out that Dean Shailer Mathews has been chosen by the Federal Council of Churches as its representative to Japan to interpret American Christianity. The Wichita movement, which originated in Wichita, Kan., in the form of teams of business men doing evangelistic work, was reported by W. C. Coleman, of that city. Mr. Mornay Williams presented the report of the Baptist Laymen's Missionary Movement, and emphasized the opportunities for expansion in the Middle and Far West. Secretary F. W. Padelford, representative of the Education Society, declared that while the first call is to evangelism, the second is to education. This society was founded twenty-five years ago, and Dr. H. L. Morehouse, who was then present, expressed the opinion that the convention was having an old-time educational revival. Some discussion followed the report in regard to the denominational colleges, and the necessity of keeping them true to the faith.

In the report of the Home Mission Society by President George R. Hovey, stress was laid on the need of ministerial education for negroes, among whom the Roman Catholic Church was said to be making many converts. Many encouraging facts were brought out in this department. A novel feature of the convention was the introduction by S. C. Barnes of representatives of twenty-six foreign nationalities. The report of the commission of foreign-speaking Baptists, using foreign languages, showed twelve such bodies, having 862 churches and over 70,000 members. They include Germans, Swedes, Norwegians, Finns, French, Italians, Hungarians, Poles, Bohemians and Slavs.

The question of ministerial emolument was given much attention, and betterment in regard to salaries paid Baptist ministers was considered to be imperative. City mission work received a large share of attention and recommendation was made that $10,000 be expended for evangelical literature to be used among foreigners.

Much important business was transacted in connection with the many reports, in all of which keen interest was manifested by the delegates. The Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society held its preliminary annual meeting the Tuesday before the opening of the convention, Mrs. A. G. Lester, president, presiding. Woman's share in the activities of the Baptist body was shown, by all reports, to be very large.

The crowning event of the convention was the enthusiastic celebration of the Judson centenary. The opening resolution adopted in this connection began: "There was a man sent from God whose name was Judson." The great work inaugurated by Adoniram Judson was reviewed in full by the speakers. Outgoing missionaries were presented to the audience, and most impressive devotional exercises were held. Dr. Edward Judson, "loved for the blood in him, for his father, but best of all for himself," received a great ovation when he arose to speak. The scene at the close of his address was declared to be one never to be forgotten. Great impetus was undoubtedly given to the missionary activities of the denomination by the centenary services.

A noteworthy incident was the reception of fraternal messages from other missionary boards and from foreign lands. The closing address of the centenary session was made by John R. Mott, who declared that our best days lie ahead of us. The entire convention is spoken of as one of climaxes. There were many stirring moments when enthusiasm could not be restrained.

The newly elected officers of the Northern Baptist Convention are: President, Judge Edward S. Clinch, N. Y.; first vice-president, R. B. Griffith, Grand Forks, N. D.; second vice-president, F. Wayland Ayer, Camden, N. J.; corresponding secretary, Rev. W. C. Bitting, St. Louis, Mo.; recording secretary, Rev. Maurice A. Levy, Brooklyn, N. Y.; treasurer, Frank L. Miner, Des Moines, Iowa.

FORGET NOT

TEXT: "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits." Ps. 103: 2

A SERMON

BY

PASTOR CHARLES WAGNER*

OUR memory of the dead has been the object of crying abuses; we have exploited the dead, as we exploit the living. We have exploited them under the influence of that pride which, as far as to death itself, strives to make a show of wealth and generosity. And even religion has exploited death for gain or domination. Death has been made a bugbear to urge men on by the influence of fear. Yet the emotion of fear is one of the least worthy of all human movements. What good can come of fear? It is an evil counselor, even in ordinary affairs. In the religious world nothing noble has ever been accomplished by terror.

Religion has abused the cult of the dead by imprisoning men in a constant tête-à-tête with the idea of the end, as if we came on this earth solely for the purpose of preparing to leave it. What a religion it is, this religion of blackness, of mourning, of sadness, of cemeteries, of skeletons and tombs! And it is certainly against such religion that our fathers meant to protest when they said with the Master: "Let the dead bury their dead!" That word was spoken as a sort of resurrection summons to enslaved humanity, dragging the burden of an existence which contemplation had transformed into a nightmare. But if there are low, sad, inhuman aspects in the cult of the dead, there are also elements that are lofty and grand. Among the shades are the rays of light, the side which is nobly and eternally human.

The Alchemy of Memory

There is a way of thinking of the loved ones who have gone, which is the sacred religion of memory. This way of regarding them is helpful. It is one of the most religious forms of the worship of life and of that adoration in spirit and in truth which the Gospels have taught us. How could we forget those who have gone on? How could we efface their image from our joys, as well as from our tears and sadness? It would be impossible, even if we could wish it! We follow the dear departed ones still with the eyes of the soul. We follow them because we cannot do otherwise. An irresistible movement draws us after them. In this movement religious men and men who have made no profession of religion, if only they have loved profoundly, find themselves alike. For the emotion that prompts us here is not one that differentiates us, but one that binds us all together. It is the human heart in its beautiful simplicity, in its truth, instinctively obeying a direction implanted in its very being. There can be nothing better for a man, a family, a church, a city, than to guard piously the memory of those who have gone on. In the ancient religions, in which patriotism was always mingled with the veneration of the gods, ancestor-worship plays an important part. The first Christians, so different in point of view from the followers of the old pagan religions, nevertheless have left us the example of the sacredness of memory. When the disciples of Christ were still only a trembling and persecuted little flock, what was their support? A memory, the loved memory of the Master. Assembled together with the doors closed, they evoked his figure and his spirit. Their beautiful communion, in which they took, with the bread and the wine, the very spirit of him who died for all—was it not, in its penetrating simplicity, the most magnificent rite ever created in memory of the departed? The Master, performing the rite first himself as a model, had taught it them on the last evening of his life, saying: "This do in remembrance of me!" By so familiar and yet so powerfully spiritual a means, they possessed him still when he had left this world of the senses. Across his brutal and terrifying martyrdom, their souls, their vacillating faith seeking a support, found the immortal Friend again, and found such grateful warmth in his mysterious presence that they enjoyed a foretaste of the eternal reunion.

Our feeling toward the dead is the most vivid proof of our absolute solidarity with them. And to feel thus we have no need to have attended the school of some special philosophy or to have accepted a particular brand of dogma. Materialist? Spiritualist? When the love of our dead dear ones lives within us, how these distinctions pale! Here is elemental man at his best. And viewed and understood thus, the memory of the dead is one of the purest and noblest forces in human life.

And in the first place, our memory of them is a purifying influence. Every day, in our banal and vulgar life, we brush against the low and base. Our souls are clogged with scoria; they are troubled with impurities, and they cry for deliverance. The memory of the dead exerts a direct influence on our sentiments. Living in touch with the Invisible brightens our souls and strengthens our hearts. Thanks to their society, we are less rabid after visible things, less bitter in our passions, our interests, or our animosities. The Eternal acts upon us through them; they are instruments of the divine Power; into the mazes of a complex life they send their guiding rays. O marvelous power of the closed eyes, by which our own see more clearly! Sweet, gentle warmth of the hearts which have ceased to beat and which turn our hearts toward charity! Power of calm and action, given our hands by the hands joined forever in death! There is something in the affirmation of these facts which contradicts the data of the exclusively positive in experience. And yet these psychic facts are more real than all the massive realities, more firm than rocks of granite, the firm sites of mountains. Their weight surpasses all that can be weighed in balances, and their value everything that can be written in figures.

The memory of our dead makes our hearts more just, more respectful, more fraternal. Memory makes an object which was once ordinary or indifferent, flower, letter, picture, into a sacred relic. Memory transforms an empty place by the fireside into a holy place. When, seated at table beside a chair henceforth unoccupied, a poignant or luminous memory penetrates your soul, it holds you back from unkindness toward those who are still about you. You could not, with the Invisible upon your soul, be hard or unjust or even disagreeable to the visible who are with you. You feel that time is too short for that. The delightful hour of social enjoyment passes too quickly. Every instant, when the family is together, is an instant won from the inevitable separation. You would not spoil this short and precious moment by unkindness. The absent one whom you love pleads the cause of all the present. He says to you: "Be kind, in memory of me."

If man could understand all that is said by those who cannot speak, he would change his life. He would know no longer the cynical pride of the living who make unfair use of their life and their superior strength. A helpful tenderness would come into all his relations with his fellows. He would see more clearly along his dark path; he would no longer need to fathom bottomless abysses in search of fleeing truth. He would cultivate simply justice, pardon, kindness. Marvelous result of piety toward the dead—it furthers love for the living!

Memory and Faith

Man is constantly struggling for freedom. We are slaves, tragic at some points, comic at others. But slavery to great misery and great sorrows has a certain grandeur.

When man, crushed by the present hour, attributes to the hour eternal duration, and under the compulsion of the moment, bending under its tyranny, he believes himself held by chains which will never fall—it is that black, incurable misery which defines hopeless slavery. But there is something grand in it which forces respect. But there is a comic slavery, which consists in bowing under ridiculous burdens! Slavery to petty fears and petty calculations, to trifling conventions and wretched interests, to prejudices, to narrowness in which absurdity is allied to pretension.

All that is necessary in a life bound in this ridiculous slavery is that the lofty and silent majesty of death enter and be understood, and the chains will fall of themselves. Life is too short to deprive oneself of the most legitimate satisfactions for the sake of form; to fail of one's duty for fear of ma ing people talk; to fail of kindness to loved on for fear of what the indifferent might think. Th dead teach and inspire liberty, and impart th courage of conquest. They give us a glimpse the silent majesties which deliver us from the wo ship of false lights, and of all that smoke of vani which superficial men in their ignorance are pro to exalt. And what a reservoir of force are the memories! Life, as you know—it is proved to y every day—is a constantly renewed battle in whi one is never the decisive victor. The hour nev comes when we can be sure of peace, and can la aside our arms. In high and noble forms whi stimulate our courageous resistance, and st softener in the irritating and demoralizing form pin-pricks and tongue-pricks, life renews its a tacks and its bitterness.

But in the midst of the great struggles and the trifling annoyances, if you could feel, fixed o your soul, the calm gaze of those who have falle asleep after having suffered and fought as we a doing, God would give you the infinite peac through them. This terrible fever, in contempl tion of which certain trials have been compared t a furnace, which invades your being and threaten to destroy you, is allayed by the presence of you dear dead. Their foreheads are bound wit serenity. A pure, fresh breath is wafted to us fro the world which they inhabit. They are in th harbor; they have reached their goal, and we, wh are still in the middle of the journey, will rejoi them at last. And with this in mind we see the en of the tempests, the repose which awaits God' people. Faith sees the end of our sufferings; ther will no longer be cries, nor mourning, nor torment God will wipe away all tears from our eyes. Thes thoughts lift us above the anguish that tortures u to-day. The eternal silence speaks louder tha these vociferations and tumults. The divine peac floats above the confusion, as the stars shine abov the earth.

Voices from Eternity

To awaken the inner voice, to build in the breas the inviolable citadel in which we may find refuge no means is more precious than the dear memor of the departed. In the most fruitful lives it is thi hidden influence which gives them their best Memories of parents in the tomb, memories of chil dren who left us when young, or even from th cradle. Each has his saints in the sanctuary o the soul. They throw about us, now an atmospher of sadness, now one of sweetness. They make u stronger, more indulgent, more merciful, simple with children, kinder even to those who are unkin to us.

Who has not known poor old men and women bent by the storms of life, bearing on their forehead the scars of bereavement? They have lowered int the tomb with the sons or daughters they loved th most precious thing they had on earth. But ther was so much kindness in their eyes and so muc peace in their faces, that we are won, we know no how. And before the peace which their loved dea have shed about their heads, we bow as low as th hills bow before Mont-Blanc. For you, young me and women, who perhaps have lost a father or mother, no precept, no book, no example, howeve great it may be, can do as much as their memory a the bottom of your heart, if you keep it sacred They are here no longer to follow you, to consol you, to point out the way for you, nor to rebuk you by raising their voices against your errors but in the silence their memory speaks to you hearts, and if you are responsive it will be seen tha this compelling voice of absent loved ones is able t accomplish more with you than ever their direc advice and their material presence was able t effect.

And shall we train our batteries in the name o religion or free thought in an attempt to destroy the worship of memory? It would be to dismantl one of the strongest fortresses of Spirit. No mem ory, no family! No memory, no country! N memory, no church! Where the dead are no longe anything, humanity is ruined. If the dead are dus and nothingness, what are the living? Candidates

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, July 26. Matthew 11: 12. "And from the days of John the Baptist until now, the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force." John's ministry is here estimated by its powerful effects. A comparatively short time had elapsed since he had begun preaching under circumstances which seemed to repel rather than attract men. And yet a great commotion had been caused by his simple and earnest call to repentance. His proclamation that the kingdom of the Messiah was now to be set up among men had been seized with eagerness by many seriously disposed persons. These people determined that the kingdom of which they had heard must become theirs at all hazards. They must obtain their places in it. In the ardor of faith, begotten by the ringing appeals of John, they rushed forward as if they meant to take the kingdom by storm, and capture its mercies with the bravery of men who mean to conquer. This bold figure of a friendly warfare upon the kingdom indicates that true Christianity is never an easy-going affair. No one ever entered the kingdom who was not in earnest. No one ever kept his place in the kingdom who became a spiritual sluggard. "Woe to them that are at ease in Zion," cries the prophet.

MONDAY, July 27. Matthew 11: 13-15. "For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John. And if ye will receive it, this is Elias, which was for to come. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." This is the climax of our Lord's testimony in behalf of his forerunner. The work of John was of such immediate consequence to that of the Lord himself, that Jehovah had made John's coming the subject of a special message of the last prophet of the old covenant. Malachi had concluded his prophecy by pointing to the coming of the Elijah of the new covenant, the prophet who was to stir Israel once more as it had been stirred in the days of Ahab. When Zachariah pronounced the Benedictus at the circumcision of his son, he referred to him as going before the Lord in the power of Elias. If John is Elias, then the Lord is now come to his temple. Jesus implies that there is danger that his hearers may not accept his statement. In that case, he warns them in impressive language that they are casting not John but Him aside. Those who refuse the grace that prepares for salvation, refuse also the salvation. Those who slight the call to repentance will not heed the invitation to the kingdom of Christ.

TUESDAY, July 28. Luke 7: 29, 30. "And all the people that heard him, and the publicans, justified God, being baptized with the baptism of John. But the Pharisees and lawyers rejected the counsel of God against themselves, being not baptized of him." Our Lord has been an interested observer of the people's attitude toward his forerunner. He has seen the crowds of eager persons from the ranks of the lowly flocking to the desert preacher. He has beheld those social outcasts, the publicans, or tax-collectors, who were notorious extortioners, take heart and go to meet John, from whom they could not expect anything but a very unpleasant reminder of their unholy state and practice. Still they came and justified God. They declared, by their oral profession and by accepting John's baptism, that they had, on the one hand, fully deserved John's rebuke; and they rejoiced, on the other hand, because in his plan of salvation by the Messiah, who had now come, God had revealed the highest wisdom and righteousness. But the upper classes—the great churchmen of the nation, to whom the same counsel of God for their salvation had been revealed by John's preaching—scorned John's message. They neither bowed in contrition to John's impeachment of their sinful condition, nor did they believe it possible that so simple a ceremony as being baptized could be made the door of entrance to the comforts of Messiah's kingdom. They spurned both the law and the Gospel that was preached to them. Jesus still observes the attitude of every person toward his messengers.

WEDNESDAY, July 29. Luke 7: 31-34. "Whereunto shall I liken the men of this generation? and to what are they like? They are like unto children sitting in the marketplace, and calling one to another." In dealing with fallen man, the grace of God is so great that he will often vary his method of approach, in order to gain his merciful end with the sinner. His messengers come, now with somber mien and indicating to their hearers, by their whole deportment, the sad necessity of their mission; now with a spirited and cheering manner, indicating the pleasure they take in delivering their message and the joy that will follow upon its acceptance. They may exhibit by their austere ways one side, and by their sociability another side of the life in the kingdom. But what is meant as condescending kindness is often made the basis of whimsical complaints. Even God cannot please all. When his Son comes with the smile of a friend, men accuse him of levity; when he comes in sober fashion, they declare him tedious. How much greater, then, does the sinner's guilt become who has declined God's gracious visits every day!

THURSDAY, July 30. Luke 7: 35. "But wisdom is justified of all her children." "Wisdom's children" are "justifying wisdom"—what this means was shown by the example of the common people and the publicans who accepted John and Christ. Personified Wisdom had met them with precious offers of peace for their salvation. By accepting them, they had shown themselves wise. The preaching of Christ crucified is the power of God and the wisdom of God. Let Greek and Jew scorn and reprobate the plan which God has adopted for man's redemption and reclamation from sin and sorrow; let them ridicule the means of grace, the Gospel and the sacraments; let them contemn the conditions of the covenant as an unreasonable proposition and as an offense to their self-respect. Nevertheless, those who piously enter into the thoughts of God regarding fallen man, who think after God in the business of their salvation, have declared in times past, are declaring now, and will ever declare that "Christ Jesus was of God made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption, that, according as it is written, he that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord."

FRIDAY, July 31. Matthew 11: 21, 22. "Woe unto thee, Chorazin! woe unto thee, Bethsaida! for if the mighty works, which were done in you, had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes. But I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon at the day of judgment, than for you." We are confronted in this and the following text with the majesty of our Saviour's indignation. Do not these very terms "Saviour" and "indignation" contain a contradiction? Can the Saviour be angry with men and still be their Saviour? Let us alter the question slightly, and the dilemma will vanish. Can a father chide a reckless son and still remain his father? Surely. The scene that meets us in our text is not that of judgment day, for of that the Lord speaks as of a future event. Chorazin and Bethsaida still have the sun of grace shining for them, as for other localities. While the Saviour invites them to consider that their responsibilities will one day be measured against their splendid opportunities, and their punishment will be balanced with their iniquity, by telling them this harsh truth he is really showing them a great kindness. Like sharp arrows, these poignant words must have pierced the crust of callousness that had grown around the hearts of the indifferent people in those towns, and like coals of juniper they must have burnt on the ungrateful recipients of so many favors of the Lord. The grace of God wrestles not only with common, but also with gross and inveterate obduracy. Bow to him, ye wanton and reckless, even when he meets you with flaming eye, and in accents vibrating with deep emotion reminds you of your wasted mercies.

SATURDAY, August 1. Matthew 11: 23, 24. "And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell: for if the mighty works, which have been done in thee, had been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day. But I say unto you, That it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment, than for thee." Bethsaida had three of its citizens in the Lord's college of apostles. Chorazin had witnessed his marvelous works. Capernaum had been selected for the earthly residence of the King of kings. The everlasting Light had risen in noon-day splendor on these cities by the Galilean Sea. On the other hand, Tyre and Sidon had been left shrouded in the darkness of paganism, and the buried cities in the plain to the south had been left to be engulfed in a tide of lust. Did all this happen according to blind chance? Are the movements of divine grace governed by fatalism? No. The ways of God with individual men and localities are inscrutable. No mortal will ever write a complete history of the movements of saving grace among men. But Christ makes us understand that God has a just cause against every man and society of men upon whom his judgments are visited. The silted harbors of the once wealthy seaports to the north, the submerged towns in the valley of Siddim, were regarded with abhorrence by every devout Jew, and Moses and the prophets had taught the Israelites that divine justice had meted out punishment to these cities for the hardness of heart of their inhabitants, and had made them warning examples to deter others from pursuing the reckless course they had pursued. Our Lord here uses the fate of those cities to point another lesson: their wicked state had already been surpassed by the towns which had heard and seen the Son of God, and had not repented of their sins nor believed the Gospel. Rejecting Christ—that is the last stage of wickedness, and those guilty of this sin will be put to utter shame and confusion at the final judgment by having their unbelief declared worse than heathenish. "How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation?"

FORGET NOT

for dust and nothingness. We must remain men, in the face of the tomb as well as in the face of the cradle. For if the tomb no longer knows either love or hope, what irreparable disaster is threatening the cradle! One thing only can serve us—never to deny our humanity; to have the courage to be men in death and beyond death, and by the piety of memory to lift the standard high, the sign of our sublime destiny, the banner under which the living march and in which the dead are shrouded.

Ah, how I love the dead! How I love mankind asleep! I love them for themselves, for myself, and for all others.

O cheerful, health-breathing procession of friends who have preceded us beyond the veil! Not only art thou powerful to free us from brutality, from inferior utilitarianism, from mediocre loves and ambitions without nobility; thou wilt serve us still when the final solitude comes near to wrap itself about us. All the invisible ones, friends on the other side, shall come about us at the hour when the living vanish from our sight and we from theirs. With them, we shall feel ourselves in good company, gently drawn and lifted toward that world of light and peace whose King invites us, whose distant brightness has long sustained us, and to which, through all our sins and our tears, we never cease to aspire!

An Unbearable Burden

A RECENT letter to the Prayer League asked prayer for relief from an "unbearable burden." It is impossible to pass lightly over such an expression.

But, as the expression is further considered, another fact is realized. There is no such thing as an unbearable burden. The expression, sad and honest as it may be, cannot be true. Listen! "There hath no temptation [or trial] taken you but such as is common to man. But God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able, but will with the temptation make a way of escape, that ye may be able to bear it."

Perhaps you are still unconvinced. You still say: "I cannot bear it." What then? The answer is the same. There are no unbearable burdens. But there are different ways of bearing them. And there is one best way: "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee." Those outstretched hands of Jesus never waver; that voice never falters: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

And the rest will come in one of two ways. He may take the burden away. He can do it. If it is best he will do it. Or he may do that other thing, which many have found far better. He will show you how to bear it; he will give you grace to bear it; he will himself, with his own infinite power, help you bear it. Charles E. Parker, the apostolic missionary in the Vikarabad district of India, has the habit of saying, about any trouble or burden he meets—and there have been many of them—"I know that my Lord is bearing the heavier part of it." We cannot shrink, then. His love and sympathy will put new joy and undreamed-of courage and power within us, and we shall declare with Paul: "Most gladly, therefore, will I glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me."

Now

THE beginning and the ending of the world's greatest endeavor are comprehended in that little word. It is short, but it stretches all the way from inception to completion. It is little and it indicates but an instant; yet it fills all time and it will fill all eternity.

NOW is the secret of filling our days to repletion. All that you are or have, all your dreams, hopes, possessions, loves, associations, are yours by virtue only of that slender thread of an instant now.

NOW is all we have. The past is gone, the future is yet to come, but NOW is ours. The value of the time we use we can measure; but who can ever know the value of the time that has been lost?

True, there are some things that cannot be done now. We have not the material for them. We have not the skill. It is not yet time for them to be done. But commonly even these can be begun now. To begin a thing is to make yourself a part of it.

NOW is ours. It is all we have. And we shall never have it again.

Improve the Hymnal

ABOUT this time of year, when woods are green and inviting, and when the summer religious assemblies and camp-meetings are in full tide, the attractive power of Gospel song is everywhere in evidence. Choirs that sometimes number hundreds of voices, quartettes and soloists, vie with each other in drawing the multitudes. Some of the familiar songs have done efficient service through two or more generations, which may be regarded as a test of their quality and musical worth. The music seemed to be wedded to the words. That the later hymnology as a whole does not find equal favor with the old, is evident from the sharp criticisms to which it is subjected at frequent intervals. The latest attack was made at a meeting of the Ministers' Forum during a great Methodist camp meeting in Chicago a few days ago, when it was declared by one of the speakers that a good many of our modern hymns are "nothing more than doggerel which would be just as good sung backward," adding that not a few were full of theological untruths.

While such a denunciation of the average up-to-date hymnal may be too sweeping, it must be admitted that there is ground for criticism. In a literary sense, not a few of the hymns read like rhapsodical love-songs, rather than songs of praise and worship. There is neither dignity nor reverence in such productions. But if publishers were agreed, it would not be difficult to get rid of the unduly sentimental. The vastly harder task would remain of raising the standard of musical composition, so that we need not be ashamed of our song services. It is pitiful to think that some of our recent songs of the sanctuary are merely adaptations of the commonest sort, the very singing of which in the Lord's house is a species of profanation. We are not surprised that there is a growing feeling that such stuff should be cut out of the hymnal, together with the sentimental and all that is aimless, pointless and indefinite. And let the composers take courage. The prizes to be won in the field of hymnology should be made sufficiently attractive to command the best musical talent. Until this is done, the modern hymnal will not rise to the lofty dignity and spiritual power of the older collections, whose sweet and noble strains come down to us like conquering voices from the past.

When Angry—Wait

OUR country, in fact the whole world, has been having during the past few weeks a striking proof of the soundness of the principle which Mr. Bryan has been advocating among the nations and which he has already succeeded in having incorporated into a number of treaties. Before war—hesitation. If any difference arises let diplomacy be tried at least a year before war is declared.

Observe the complete change in the atmosphere since our differences with Huerta began. The newspapers declared that the boys on board our men-of-war sailed down the ocean crying, as they polished their guns: "Show us a Mexican!" Hatred of Huerta, antagonism to the Mexicans, eagerness to fight, were in the air.

Yet during these brief weeks all this has changed. No one wants to fight now. Our boys are having a merry time with the Mexicans at Vera Cruz, playing baseball and showing them what American fun means. It would be almost impossible to stir up the war fever again. There seems to be a nation-wide conviction that the way of peace will be found, and everybody is glad.

When angry—wait. It is an old rule, but perfectly sound. In the peculiar tangle the Vera Cruz incident seemed, to the administration, unavoidable. But the constant insistence that war had not been declared, the careful waiting, the strenuous effort for peace, these are bearing their fruit. Neighborliness has won. Let us all remember, then, in home and village, in factory and office matters, in national and international affairs, when angry—wait!

IN THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING June 30 the American people spent for liquors, all kinds included, $1,724,607,519, which is a gigantic total even estimating our population at 100,000,000. Here is food for serious thought, not only for the Nation-wide Prohibitionists, but for the friends of temperance everywhere. It shows what a tremendous hill has yet to be climbed before we can look out over the land and say we are becoming a sober nation.

THOSE WHO SEEM TO TAKE a gloomy view of the business outlook should look at the latest crop reports. Corn at 2,800,000,000-bushel crop; winter wheat, 655,000,000 bushels; spring wheat, 270,000,000 bushels; oats, 1,200,000,000—all of them far above the ten-year average. The crops are the bright redeeming feature of the business situation. And the promise is even better than the figures show. Even the pessimist must bow before the splendid gifts of bountiful Nature, and confess that God is gloriously good to this nation.

THAT SEX HYGIENE SHOULD not be taught in the public schools is the judgment pronounced by the National Education Association, which met in St. Paul, Minn., recently. The speakers were unanimously of the opinion that the responsibility for "imparting fundamental truths of life should not be shifted from the parents to the teacher." Apropos, it is worth noting that the subject has lately been dropped, apparently by general consent, in various schools where it was taken up during the agitation of the question some time ago. There seems to be a growing conviction that the new method would not be conducive to morality.

DURING THE TIME OF SOLON, the famous lawmaker, he secured the passage of a statute compelling every able-bodied adult man in the nation to give proof once a year that he was earning a decent living and was self-supporting. Somebody has written to us suggesting that this would not be a bad example for Uncle Sam to follow, since the class of those who have learned to live "gracefully in idleness" is constantly on the increase. By the way, Solon was not the originator of this unique law, which went out of existence shortly after his death. The man who had the "happy thought" first was a certain king Amasis, who, before he became monarch, was by turns soldier, freebooter, and vagrant, living on the plunder he gained from others. He probably based the law on his own experience, not desiring to have his subjects idle and lawless as he once was.

IT IS AN OLD SAYING THAT DEEP down in the human heart there lurks the old savage nature, which only needs opportunity to leap to the surface. The veneer of civilization and the restraints of social convention cannot always keep it under. It came out, the other day, when eight thousand spectators, including many aristocratic ladies and men of title, wealth and social position, surrounded the ringside at a pugilistic contest at Olympia, near London, cheering and screaming together just as the crowds may have done in the old Roman amphitheater. Stranger still was the fact that a priest of the Anglican Church acted as master of ceremonies and defied criticism by announcing that most of the London clergy were favorable to the sport. There are many admirable forms of athletics that merit encouragement, but pugilism is not among them. Pastors who respect the dignity and high character of their vocation must condemn the spectacle at Olympia, at which the popular love of sensation seems to have been cleverly utilized in an attempt to revive the fading glories of the prize-ring.

THE MISSIONARY SPIRIT RUNS in certain families down through the generations. It was so in the famous Judson family. Speaking before the Northern Baptist Convention in Boston recently, Dr. Adoniram B. Judson, eldest son of the great missionary, related this beautiful anecdote: "I recall something that occurred sixty-nine or seventy years ago, on our voyage from Burma to this country in 1845, when my father and mother, returning missionaries, brought home to America three of their six children. Mother was an invalid and couldn't complete the voyage. We buried her on St. Helena. But a long way the other side of St. Helena, when crossing the Indian Ocean, one night, when the wind had died and the stars were out, the family gathered on deck, and mother sang to the group, which included some of the sailors and officers, a hymn which seemed strangely appropriate:

'Hark, hark, to God the chorus breaks,
From every host, from every gem.
But one alone the Saviour speaks,
It was the Star of Bethlehem.'

The calm sea, the sweet voice, the sky brilliant with stars, made a scene not easily forgotten. . . . A few months later I saw my father's face for the last time as he leaned from the window of the train speeding to Boston on his way back to Burma."

Boy Apprehends Kidnappers

FRANK LONGO, eight years old, son of a banker in New York City, was recently kidnapped, and on the payment by his father of the $700 demanded, he was returned to his home. The metropolis has been so cursed with this sort of crime that the police authorities were unwilling to let the matter rest there. The boy gave the police captain a clue which landed in prison eight persons charged with the vile deed. The little fellow said: "Big man met me in front of school. He said my father sent him. He took me to a street car with doors in the middle. The car went under a bridge. He got off and took me to a house. It had a stoop in front—all wood. Then I went upstairs and he shut me in a room." The police took the boy along and, approaching a house, he said, "That's the house, that's the house!" It was, and on the inside they found the horsewhip that frightened the child. It is claimed that one of the eight men arrested admitted he had received the $700. The limit of the law should be meted out to these miscreants. There are few crimes more heartbreaking and wicked than that of kidnapping. For years the Italian districts of New York have been preyed upon and distressed by such bands of vile wretches which, the authorities say, the revelations of the boy will enable them to break up. Satan leads many children and grown people captive at his will, and never voluntarily returns his captives. The apostle voices the cry of one carried into this captivity:

O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? (Rom. 7: 24.)

A Veteran Letter-Carrier

WHEN Broadway was a dirt road Peter T. Linden, on his rusty horse, used to carry the mail through the wilderness of the upper west side of New York. He is still doing so, through the same district, not green with grass, but white with stone and crowded thick with tall houses filled with thousands of people. Peter is seventy-two years old, a veteran of the Civil War and an active and efficient letter-carrier. His comrades of Station N, Sixty-ninth street and Broadway, tendered him a banquet recently in celebration of his forty-five years of faithful service as a letter-carrier in that section of the city. What a story his mail-bags could reveal if they could speak—a story of joy and sorrow, of success and failure, of life and of death! What a debt of gratitude the public owes the letter-carriers of the country, who, in all kinds of weather, serve us faithfully! The forty-five years of service is a tribute to the good health, industry, integrity, ability and constancy of the veteran letter-carrier. There is a wide difference between the transmission and delivery of letters now and that of olden times, when letters were sent by a man on foot or on the back of an animal, or in a cart drawn by an animal. The transmission of a letter by horses and chariot is thus recorded:

And the king of Syria said, Go to, go, and I will send a letter unto the king of Israel. And he brought the letter to the king of Israel. (II Kings 5: 5, 6.)

Dies of Broken Heart

AN OLD man, seventy-three years of age, paid his weekly visit to the grave of his dead wife in the cemetery of one of the great cities of the country the other day. He remained very long, kneeling by the grave. The keepers, at closing time, approached to tell him he must go. As they drew near he arose suddenly with a cry and, reeling, fell back dead upon the grave. The physician at the hospital said that his heart had literally broken. His wife had been gone only six months before he joined her in the better land. All forms of heartbreaking sorrow are but the faintest imitation of the One who said:

My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death. (Matt. 26: 38.)

In Washington's Footsteps

A PATRIOTIC exercise of unusual character was carried out June 23 to July 3 by representatives of Sons of the American Revolution, with their families, who traversed the route taken by Washington from Philadelphia to Cambridge, Mass., in 1775 to take command of the Continental Army. The party aimed to duplicate Washington's trip day for day and hour for hour as nearly as possible, and to erect commemorative tablets at points where he stopped en route. Their progress was marked by enthusiastic receptions, unveiling of tablets and oratory. Services were held at the grave of Abraham Clark, Rahway, N. J., a signer of the Declaration of Independence. At Newark a thousand school children greeted the party, who traveled in automobiles, with waving flags. A public school drum corps assisted in the exercises in New York, where a great-great-granddaughter of General Philip Schuyler unveiled a tablet at the historic building, 198 Hudson Street, where in 1834 Sarah McFadden began the manufacture of American flags, a business which is still continued there. Psalm 105 is such a pilgrimage of memory concerning God:

Make known his deeds, . . . talk ye of all his wondrous works. (Ps. 105: 1, 2.)

THEIR OWN BOMB KILLS ANARCHISTS

THE long line of frictions, clashes, and threats between the Industrial Workers of the World and the authorities reached a climax on the morning of the Fourth of July in the fearful tragedy of a bomb explosion, which wrecked a six-story tenement house on Lexington Avenue, New York City, and blew almost into fragments the bodies of Arthur Caron, Carl Hanson, Charles D. Berg, professional anarchists, who occupied the same room, and Mrs. Mary Chavez, who occupied an adjoining apartment, besides injuring many others. Ten members of the I. W. W. had been apprehended for a demonstration at Tarrytown against Mr. Rockefeller, and the day of trial was nearly at hand. A conference of the I. W. W. and anarchists was held on the night before, and it was determined, so the police say, to make some dangerous demonstration of force, if the arrested men should be convicted. Late that night, the three men who were killed and Michael Murphy, the only one in the room escaping, went to the apartment on Lexington Avenue, which the authorities believe was a place for the manufacture or storage of bombs and infernal machines. There, by the premature explosion of a bomb, they were hurled into eternity. There are industrial wrongs that must be righted, but not by force. The trades unions of the country are opposed to the I. W. W. because, while having some good men in it, it stands for force and dynamite and murder. The working men of the country do not favor such things; they are for law and order, and count the murderous anarchist the worst enemy labor can have. The tragedy of the misguided men is shocking and pitiful. The law is unerring that the ill we plan for others will eventually in some way or another fall on us. The thought is thus expressed: "His mischief shall return upon his own head, and his violent dealing shall come down on his own pate." (Ps. 7: 16.)

Two Centuries of Good Behavior

A CHURCH in Provincetown, Mass., recently celebrated the two hundredth anniversary of its foundation. The citizens were sure that the church was older than that, but the church records preserved only went back two hundred years, and they celebrated events from that time. They did not forget to mention that Provincetown was the place where the Pilgrim fathers landed on our shores and where the Mayflower compact was entered into. They pointed to the imposing monument commemorating the historical fact, the foundation of which was laid with impressive services in 1907. But the thing most significant and most to be proud of was the fact that during the two hundred years not a single murder has been committed in the whole of Provincetown, and no native inhabitant has been committed to the State prison. There is little doubt that the old church, with its rigid Puritanism, and other churches like it, springing up in later years, have had much to do with this public moral uprightness and immunity from the crimes that afflict and disgrace most communities. These people had a serious kind of religion. God was very close to them, and they feared to displease him. This old church and the Puritanism back of it voiced the half of the Gospel too often overlooked:

Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man. (Eccles. 12: 13.)

Indian Nation Dissolved

A LAW went into effect the other day abolishing the tribal government of the Cherokee Indians. Henceforth the Cherokees are to be citizens of the United States only. They are the most numerous and prosperous survivors of the American aborigines. There is no record of their savagery. They have always lived in houses and villages and had an orderly government and a written language of 85 letters. They have been farmers first, and fighters afterward. During the Revolution they favored the British. In the Civil War they were about equally divided as between the North and the South. A number of prominent men, among them Senator Owen, of Oklahoma, boast of Cherokee blood in their veins. In 1820 the Cherokees adopted for themselves a constitutional form of government, while they still inhabited the mountain districts of the Carolinas, Georgia, Tennessee and Alabama. After their forcible and tragic removal to Indian Territory, they renewed this form of government and happily maintained a nation within a nation; now they are full-fledged American citizens. This act of governmental adoption recognizes somewhat the great law of human brotherhood thus expressed:

And hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth. (Acts 17: 26.)

Little Children Save Train

AN ATTEMPT to wreck a pay train on the Lehigh Valley Railroad, near Raven Run, Pennsylvania, was made on the last day of June. Had it not been for three little children, John Band, Edward Stiney and Mary Burds, aged ten, nine and ten years respectively, who had come over from Girardville to pick huckleberries, the train with its crew and the wages of two thousand men employed at Centralia and Cayre collieries, amounting to $100,000, would have crashed down a fifty-foot embankment. Robbers had dynamited a bridge near where the children were picking the berries and, hearing the explosion, and seeing the wreckage, the children ran down the road as fast as they could to warn the approaching train; and so the lives and money were saved by the intelligence, diligence and courage of these little children. We have here suggested the necessity of warning people of impending spiritual dangers. The prophet graphically enforces this lesson by the description of the office of spiritual watchman:

So thou, O son of man, I have set thee a watchman unto the house of Israel; therefore thou shalt hear the word at my mouth, and warn them from me. (Ezek. 33: 7.)

EPWORTHIANS IN CONFERENCE

THE Ninth International Convention of the Epworth League convened in Buffalo, N. Y., on July 1 and continued in session until July 5. During that time delegates from twenty-nine States, the Dominion of Canada, and various other countries were addressed by leaders of work among the young people of Methodism from all over the world.

The platform meetings of the convention were held in the Broadway Auditorium, the Elmwood Music Hall and the Plymouth Church, the same program being followed in simultaneous meetings in these three places. In addition, conferences in various phases of Epworth League work were carried on in Buffalo churches, and morning watch services were held at three central points.

Two days before the opening of the convention the Board of Control, which has power to amend the constitution of the society, met and perfected plans for the development of the work among the young members. The constitution of the Junior League was revised, and an Intermediate League projected. The control of the Knights of Methodism, a boys' organization, was turned over to the Board of Sunday Schools of the Methodist Church.

Many of the delegates attending the convention from the Western States came to Buffalo by way of Cleveland. In that city, in the church which stands on the spot where the League was founded twenty-five years ago, a great gathering was held in commemoration of that event, which was addressed by the general secretary of the League, Dr. W. F. Sheridan; the editor of the Epworth Herald, Dr. Dan B. Brummitt; and the pastor of Epworth Memorial Church, Dr. Worth Tippy.

At the opening rally of the convention, held in the Auditorium, Bishop Burt welcomed the delegates to Buffalo, and Dr. H. M. DuBose, of Atlanta, Ga., a former secretary of the League in the Methodist Church South, responded. The Rev. J. W. Aikens, of Toronto, Canada, made the first address, his topic being, "What Shall I do to Be Saved?" Bishop Quayle, of St. Paul, Minn., struck the keynote for the entire gathering with one of the brilliant deliverances of which he is capable, his subject being, "What Wilt Thou Have Me to Do?" Bishop Quayle emphasized the way in which Jesus had revolutionized history. He declared that at his coming Christ flung mankind ahead a million years.

Of the three most rousing speeches delivered on Thursday morning, two were not on the program. At the Auditorium Professor Harry F. Ward, the secretary of the Methodist Federation for Social Service, answered the question "How Can the League Aid in Righting Industrial Wrongs?" in a way which gave his hearers such a vision of the possibilities in this field as they had never had before.

At the same time Dr. Merton S. Rice, of Detroit, was called from the audience at the Elmwood Hall, and spoke on the "Value of a Human Soul." Dr. Rice has the ability to make the message which grips him so completely grip his audience as well. When he had finished he had produced an impression which is bound to result in increased personal work on the part of his hearers.

At Plymouth Church an extemporaneous speech by the Rev. Christian F. Reisner, pastor of the Grace Methodist Episcopal Church in New York, proved the event of the morning. Dr. Reisner is a believer in church publicity, and a distinguished exponent of its use. He told of ways in which the Leaguers can secure attention for their churches and chapters in the newspapers, and claimed that the advertisements in the papers of to-day constitute a standing challenge to the forces of the Gospel.

Friday evening was devoted to missions, both at home and abroad. At the Auditorium Bishop Burt, of Buffalo, who was for many years the head of the Methodist work in Rome, spoke on "The Challenge of the Alien." The bishop, whose activities in the Eternal City have earned for him the antagonism of all the forces of Romanism, brought the great gathering to its feet cheering when he declared, "I believe, and I believe it with all my heart, that Uncle Sam ought to have the keys to every schoolhouse in the United States in his pocket, so that he can enter them at any time."

At the Elmwood Hall, Brenton T. Bradley, speaking on "The Challenge of the Changing East," stirred the audience to unsuspected depths when he told of the great mass movements now on in India, and challenged his hearers as to what they were willing to do to make possible the baptism of the millions seeking salvation.

Saturday was the great day of the convention from a spectacular point of view. It was the Fourth of July, and all the exercises had been carefully planned with that in view. In the morning such men as William H. Anderson, the superintendent of the New York State Anti-Saloon League; ex-Governor J. Frank Hanly, of Indiana, and the Hon. Henry J. Allen, Progressive nominee for governor of Kansas, spoke on the relation of the League to the civic problems of the day, supreme emphasis being placed upon the temperance fight.

But it was in the afternoon that the convention reached its climax. Under a broiling sun the delegates, reinforced by representatives of other young people's societies, men from the Bible classes of the city, other Protestant denominations, and the Methodist Sunday schools of the city, marched from the McKinley monument to the Niagara Front Park, where a patriotic celebration occurred. Before leaving the monument the crowd sang the martyred President's favorite hymn, "Nearer, My God, to Thee," but the bands kept playing "Onward, Christian Soldiers" and "America" most of the time while on the march.

Just how long the procession was i impossible to state. Long before th last division had left the monumen the first division had completed it march. The numbers seemed endless Except in the Canadian division which led the procession, and wa decked with Union Jacks, the Star and Stripes were universally used a decorations. It is probable that Buf falo's streets never before saw suc profusion of the national colors.

Saturday evening was taken u with a concert by the Clef Club, o Buffalo. The music of this organiza tion attracted a large audience an was much applauded, as was the sing ing of Mr. Reinald Werrenrath, o New York, the soloist assisting.

The final day of the convention Sunday, was given over to lifewor decision services. Such men as Wil liam H. Morgan and W. F. Oldham, o New York; Bishop McDowell, of Chi cago; Bishop Berry, of Philadelphia Bishop Henderson, of Chattanooga and General Superintendent Chown of the Canadian Methodist Church conducted the services. Before th convention closed more than thre hundred of the delegates had pledge themselves to enter the ministry, th foreign mission field, or some form of active Christian service; parent by the score had offered their childre freely for the same great causes; an great numbers had made, for the firs time, an open confession of Jesu Christ.

These were, of course, the most im portant immediate results of the con vention. Next to them in importanc were the adoption of memorials favor ing the unification of the Methodis Episcopal Church and the Methodis Episcopal Church, South. What th final results will be only time ca demonstrate. It seems impossible that any life present at Buffalo coul have departed without receiving ar impulse to increased work, which i sure to be felt throughout the Epworth League and the church at large.

THE MONEY-MAKERS' CLUB PIN

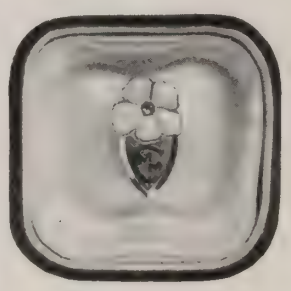
BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

IT isn't exactly an easy thing to choose the club pin that is going to be worn by hundreds, perhaps thousands of girls. First there is daintiness and charm and coloring to consider. Then there is the symbolism of it, and then—perhaps the most important of all—there is the comfort to be derived from wearing it.

We were, on the whole, rather late in the choosing of our pin. But then there were so many designs with so many absolutely commonplace stones and colorings that we hesitated, hoping to find one day exactly what we were looking for. Different jewelers sent in drawings by the dozens—some just like every other club pin in the world; others pretty, but lacking the indescribable something that we searched for.

The time went on slowly, draggingly, until at last one day we were about to give up. We had studied designs until our eyes ached, we had visited museums to trace queer arabesques, we had bothered librarians with questions, and consumed books on early symbolism of every sort, but to no avail. And at the moment that we sighed, head on hands, the mail brought in a simple little drawing that was dainty, and original, and comfortable to wear, and full of meaning. A few days afterward the manufacturer had started on our pins and now, girls, they are here—ready for you.

The pin is not large—it is the size of the average fraternity pin—the size of the illustration at the head of the article. The flower is white, faintly tinted with blue, and set with a small cut sapphire that sparkles in every stray bit of light. The little shield is fourteen karat gold, and the club initials, M. M. C., are done with fine black enamel. And to insure the comfort of the wearer, each pin is equipped with a safety catch that, in my eyes at least, doubles the value of it. Furthermore, there are no rough edges to catch the dainty dresses that are so often picked and torn by a sharply cut, fantastic design.



HERE IT IS!

I think the paragraph above will tell you plainly why I think the pin has everything that we were searching for—charm, originality, daintiness and comfort. Now I am going to explain its significance.

While I was looking at the first club pin and admiring it, an old school friend of mine happened in, and I showed her the result of our search.

"Isn't it sweet?" she murmured enthusiastically. "I wish that I had one—can I join the club? I'm jealous of every girl that will be able to wear one! Isn't that a wonderful little stone, and the flower—by the way, what kind of a flower is it?"

Blindly I groped about in my mind for a suitable answer. I remembered that other flower pins had regular names. The four leaf clover pin, the daisy pin, the rose pin, and, as I looked at the dainty, shimmering blueness that lay in the palm of my hand, I remembered the name of the only flower that seemed to harmonize with its shape and color and daintiness.

"Why," I told my chum, "don't you know? It's the flower of happiness."

Not a great while ago I read a beautiful book of short stories called The Blue Flower, and the title story told the tale of a young lad who was searching for a certain blue flower that bore the image of a dream. A flower so sweet, so infinitely precious that folk hungered for it, and fought for it, and loved for it, and died for it—if need be. And standing out through the thread of the story ran an allegory—for the youth was mankind, and the blue flower was happiness.

But the little blue flower is not the only thing in the pin that has a meaning. The stone that we have set it with is full of meaning, too—meanings that I want every wearer of the pin to live up to. For the sapphire is the symbol of fidelity, of virtue, and of truth.

Girls, dear, we have searched a long time for the little pin, and now that we have found it, we are satisfied. We hope that you, too, will find pleasure in it—that you will earn it and wear it. If you could see it in its true colors, instead of in the cold grayness of a photograph, you would be mighty pleased with it, for to me it seems the Happiness Flower indeed. The sunshine of summer time could not be more golden than the quaintly shaped shield, while the blue of the sky and the sparkle of water are reflected in the heart of the flower. It is a pin well worth working for and wearing.

And now, last of all, for the benefit of some of our new girls, I want to speak about the club that our pin belongs to. I want to repeat what I have often told you, that every one is welcome and that I will be glad to send an explanatory booklet to any one who inquires about our work. I want every girl member of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family to have one of the blue flowers of happiness for her own, and I will be glad, GLAD in capital letters, to show her the way to find it.

A little blue flower with petals so dainty,
A little blue flower so tiny and sweet;
No other is like it—the roses or daisies
Or violets that spring from the ground at your feet—
For deep in its heart glows the blue of the heaven.
Oh! girls, as you go on your work or your play,
Take heed to the message of joy that it brings you,
And work for the Happiness Flower to-day.

FIELD DAY OF THE YOUNG WOMEN'S CONFERENCE, NORTHFIELD

YOUNG MEN AND WOMEN AT NORTHFIELD

ONE of the seven fundamental principles in architecture, according to John Ruskin, is that of life. A building should reveal even in its architecture the very spirit of life itself. The principle applies even more truly in the building up of a work, and nothing testifies more eloquently to the God-given genius of the late D. L. Moody than the continued growth and expansion of the work which he established at Northfield. There was no arrest in the growth of the work when he laid down the leadership fourteen years ago, and the present season at Northfield has thus far seen the largest attendance not only in the Northfield Schools, but in the summer conferences, in the history of the work.

The Student Conference which closed on June 29 was attended by the largest delegation ever sent from Yale, 150 being enrolled from that one college; while Harvard and the other New England colleges were represented by not only large delegations, but also by the best ability and leadership in the student body.

With only two days intervening, there assembled the Young Women's Conference, which has now grown to be the largest conference of its kind in the country. Over 700 young ladies, representing thirty schools and colleges, as well as delegations from city churches, convened for a week's Bible study under the leadership of experienced Bible scholars, such as Dr. Charles Erdman, of Princeton; Rev. John McDowell, of Newark, N. J.; Mrs. John Meigs, of Pottstown, Pa., and Miss May Howard, of Hartford, Conn. While the Bible classes were restricted to the delegates, the general meetings were open to the public at the 11.30 hour in the morning, and the 8 o'clock hour in the evening, and were addressed by the Rev. Charles Jefferson of New York, Rev. Floyd Tompkins, of Philadelphia; Rev. Henry Sloan Coffin, of New York; Dr. Robert E. Speer, and Mr. George Wharton Pepper, of Philadelphia. The delegation from Boston conducted a Bible class each day led by a different member of their party, who in turn had conducted a similar class with unusual success during the Lenten season in Boston.

The latest development at Northfield has been the opening of a girls' camp, which will serve as a holiday camp during the summer months. This camp has been the special object of care of the Northfield Young Women's Conference, the property having been purchased by the young ladies who have attended the Conference, and the whole plan originating with them, and being conducted under their auspices. It is named the Louise Andrews Summer Camp, and is a memorial to a young lady who for years was active in the Northfield Conference, and whose influence was widely felt in Christian service among her companions. Here are congregated thirty girls, although the camp has been opened less than two weeks. Already the applications are in excess of the facilities. Other interesting Northfield conferences will take place during the summer.

A LITTLE ANGEL OF THE MOUNTAINS

CHAPTER XIII—Continued

THE four men looked at her a moment. She knelt down on the rude floor. Her example was followed by the others. In simple words she prayed for God's guidance for his messenger, and those who were to meet him, and she prayed further that the worship on the morrow might be undisturbed and that there might be some testimony to God's power and influence given through Jesus Christ, his only Son. There was a little silence when the words of the woman died away. Presently Parson Bill got to his feet slowly, followed by the others. They shook hands solemnly all around and then went out. For a long time the Morrisons and Old Four Eyes sat talking together. The newcomers were urging something upon the old man.

"I tell you, ma'am," he said at last, "'tain't reason'ble to ask a man to give up his gun. In course, if things was goin' on as usual at the Sunday school there wouldn't be no use for we'pons. I ain't never seen a gun draw'd there from the time you come, 'ceptin' when them fellers from the other camps tried to bust up our school. There ain't never bin no 'casion for it since then, an' that's some time back. But you never kin tell when you might need 'em. 'Pears to me that if there'd been a few men quick on the draw an' handy with their we'pons around, that murderin' mob of lynchers which you has often told us about might not have got our Lord so easy when they took him from the garden an' nailed him up to that cross."

"You remember that Peter smote with a sword and the Master reproved him."

"Yes, I know, an' I s'pose it had to be that a way. I kept a-wishin' when I first heard it, an' I can't git it out of my head now, that I had been there with my we'pons. I'd sure have shot up some of them Roman sojers, an' I'd have marked that low-down traitor, Judas, especial. He wouldn't have had to hang hisself after I got through with him."

The old man spoke earnestly and without any possible idea of irreverence. Indeed, there was absolutely no irreverence whatever in his heart. The Morrisons had sense enough to see it, too."

"An'," continued the speaker, after a little hush which no one cared to break, "suppose them fellers come around here shootin' us up! It wouldn't make no difference 'bout me, 'cause I suppose I'll never be no more fit to die than I am now—which I'm a blame sight more fit than I ever was afore—but we all don't want to have no shootin' up of you all an' the little gals, an' Olaf."

"But don't you believe that the Lord will protect his own?" asked the woman in deep earnestness.

"Yep, as a gener'l principle," I reckon we can't go agin' that idea. But I've obsarved that the Lord does his work gener'ly through men. I takes it that there ain't goin' to be no miracle goin' to happen if Dead Shot Jackson presses his loaded we'pon agin' you, an' pulls the trigger. The only thing that would stop that would be some one who could git a leetle mite of advantage over him on the draw. In course, you all knows more about those things than we all does, but on gener'l principles I don't like to lay aside my we'pons, Christian or no Christian. Once I used to sleep with 'em, like the Doc. Sometimes I didn't know I had 'em on when I tumbled into bed, but of late I've took 'em off when I ondress, but I always takes pertic'lar care to have 'em near by an' handy so's I kin grab 'em without no loss of time whatsomever if they should be needed. I am a marked man now, you kin see, I think, but still—"

"My only fear," said Mrs. Morrison, "is that if this man Jackson comes back and arouses the lawless elements of the town and they strive to break up the services, there will be a general battle resulting in an appalling loss of life and followed by sorrow indescribable."

"Yep, that's likely to happen, I admits," said the old man.

"Mrs. Morrison thinks," said Mr. Morrison, "that if we Christians lay aside our weapons and come to the services absolutely unarmed, that these people, shall I call them the men of Belial?"

"I don't know nothin' about that there Belial party, but he sounds bad, an' if I takes your meanin', it's him all right, so go ahead."

"If they come here to make trouble and they see that they have nothing to fight against, since we are unarmed, I do not believe they would shoot any one down in cold blood."

"Well, I wouldn't put it past Dead Shot Jackson, an' it's more'n possible that his blood ain't so cold as you think, by a long sight. By the time he gits well tanked up with that Black Pup p'ison, he'll be pretty warm-blooded," said Old Four Eyes sagaciously.

"You might put it up to the rest of the men to disarm while you and a few of the older men keep your weapons as a sort of a police force," suggested Mrs. Morrison as a sort of compromise.

"Cañon Creek ain't got no use for a police force, ma'am," replied the old man, waving aside that suggestion. "If one man keeps his gun, all of 'em does it. Now I leaves it to you. If you says no guns, no guns it is. It's agin' my judgment, but mebbe your way is right."

"My dear, it may be that our friend is right. Self-defense, you know," said Mr. Morrison. "There are two sides to the question. I can see arguments for both sides."

"So can I," admitted the woman. "Let me think." She put her face in

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

A New Invasion of China

INVESTIGATION reveals the fact that China is terribly in need of modern medical and surgical skill. The native doctor with his impractical methods holds the confidence of the populace, and to meet the vast need of scientific methods the Rockefeller Commission now on the ground proposes training native doctors on a large scale. Dr. Harry Pratt Judson, of Chicago; Dr. Francis W. Peabody, of Boston, and R. S. Greene, consul at Hankow, but assigned by the government to aid the others, constitute the commission. It is possible that the innovation may be introduced through medical missionaries.

American Agitates Europe

AS MENTIONED in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of last week, the American minister to Greece and Montenegro, George Fred Williams, expressed himself vigorously in the foreign press on the subject of the treatment of Albania by the great Powers, alleging that gross injustice alone keeps that newly created State subject to outside control, and prophesying a new war chargeable to European duplicity. The United States Government has accepted Mr. Williams's resignation in consequence, and has informally expressed regret to the European Powers. The views of that diplomat appear to be shared by some foreign observers of events. Albania continues in a state of ferment.

Ulster Watchfully Waiting

THE bill in the House of Lords to amend the Irish Home Rule Bill has been advanced by overwhelming majorities in the voting, amendments looking to the total exclusion of Ulster without a referendum being offered in the hope of averting civil war in Ireland. Financial aid is being sought in this country in the interest of the Irish Nationalists by various Irish organizations.

New York's Senior Senator to Retire

THE political world was taken rather by surprise and in some quarters with consternation by the announcement that Senator Elihu Root had notified the New York Republican State Committee that he would be unable to serve as United States Senator for another term after the fourth of March, 1915. Already several names have been mentioned for his successor, while at the same time nation-wide efforts are afoot to induce this statesman to reconsider his decision. Mr. Root has been a world figure for fifteen years, a noted leader in the cause of international peace, and, since his election to the Senate in 1908, a dominant figure in Congress. His work as Secretary of War and Secretary of State places him in the foremost rank of cabinet officers. He has represented the United States in many international cases and is a member of the permanent Court of Arbitration at the Hague. Mr. Root is sixty-nine years of age and has based his intention to retire from public life on the advice of his physician.

Teachers Confer for Progress

AT THE convention in St. Paul, Minn., of the National Education Association, beginning July 7, teachers from all over the country discussed equal pay regardless of sex, woman suffrage, teaching of sex hygiene in the schools, Federal aid for vocational training, establishment of retirement funds, out-of-doors classes, the practicability of the great educational foundations' pensioning systems, besides many proposals looking to radical changes in high school courses. Dr. David Starr Jordan of Leland Stanford University was elected president.

Roosevelt Returns to Politics

THE Outlook has lost the services of Colonel Roosevelt as contributing editor, and the Progressive Party will have the undivided attention of its founder for the immediate future. Great efforts are being made to induce Mr. Roosevelt to accept the nomination for governor of New York State. It is currently reported that Colonel Roosevelt received $30,000 a year for his editorial work. According to the press, Colonel Roosevelt has created a "buffoon club," placing therein Henry Savage Landor as the first member because of his attitude toward Roosevelt's contributions to natural science.

Workers Increasing in United States

AN ANALYSIS of the Thirteenth Census Report on Occupations (just published) by the Evening Post, New York, shows that 41.5 of the total population and 53.3 of the population ten years of age and over are "gainful workers." Of the 38,167,336 workers 8,075,772 are females. Two-fifths of all persons, considerably over three-fifths of all males, but considerably less than one-fifth of all females, were engaged in gainful occupations in 1910. Eliminating workers under ten years of age, more than every other one in the remaining population was engaged in gainful occupation; four out of five males and one out of four females. About one-third of the total were engaged in agriculture and allied occupations, over one-fourth in manufacturing and mechanical industries, the remainder in mining, transportation, trade, public, professional, domestic, personal and clerical occupations.

Important South American Move

THE South American countries of Brazil, Argentina and Chile are understood to be negotiating an offensive and defensive alliance in the interest of their territorial integrity and political independence. The proposed treaty is said to define the limits of the armies and navies of the respective countries and to make arbitration between these states compulsory.

Opposed As Class Legislation

THE Senate on July 8 by a decisive majority tabled a motion to strike out the clause in the pending Clayton Sundry Bill which exempts labor and farmers' organizations from the operation of the Sherman anti-trust law, and rejected an amendment to insert the words "by lawful means" to qualify the exempted acts of such organizations. This important step in the proposed legislation is opposed to the President's belief that the exemption is "unjustifiable in character and in principle." The motions brought out sharp debate in which the exemption provision was freely characterized as class legislation.

Imitation Election in Mexico

BY AN election generally regarded as a farce, General Huerta was re-elected president of Mexico, July 5, General Blanquet standing second; the present members of the Congress were returned. The real importance attached to this result is the possible succession of General Blanquet to the presidency in case Huerta actually flees the country, as authorities here believe he has planned to do. It is positively stated that his family is leaving Mexico, and that Huerta has made heavy deposits in gold abroad. On July 8 Acting Minister of Foreign Relations Ruiz announced to the Mexican Congress the results of the Niagara Falls mediation. The Constitutionalists still appear to be disinclined to making any peace compact, especially with Huertistas. A news despatch printed July 9 reported the rumor that General Villa had been slain in Torreon by a woman. His agents at El Paso, Texas, denied its truth. The rumor has not been repeated nor confirmed. The second largest city in Mexico, Guadalajara, capital of the State of Jalisco, was taken by the Constitutionalists under General Obregon, July 8, after fierce fighting. San Luis Potosi is the next point of attack.

Southern Railway Improvements

PLANS are announced for double-tracking the main line of the Southern Railway from Washington to Atlanta and between other points during the ensuing five years at an expenditure of twenty million dollars or more, the funds to be provided by bond sale of the Atlanta and Charlotte Airline Railway Company approved by the Georgia Railroad Commission. Operations have already been begun and will be pushed.

Brilliant Career Ended

ONE of Britain's great men, Rt. Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, died at London July 2. He was born in that city in 1836; his father was a screw manufacturer, and by the invention of pointed screws, instead of blunt ones that required the aid of a gimlet, Joseph Chamberlain laid the foundations of his fortune. He entered political life and applied his gift for business methods to government. Three times mayor of Birmingham, and since 1876 member of Parliament, Mr. Chamberlain left the mark of his genius on much of England's modern history. He opposed Irish Home Rule against Gladstone, assailed free trade, was a factor in fomenting the Boer War, it is supposed, and was a menace to the existence of the House of Lords and even, it is claimed, to the monarchy. Seven years ago he was stricken with paralysis and has since been an invalid, always attended by his wife, who, with their son, Austen Chamberlain, survives him. On May 6 last the aged statesman entertained hundreds of constituents at a lawn party. His death was unexpected by the public. His funeral service was simple. He was a Unitarian.

Austria Buries Her Prince

THE state funeral of the murdered Archduke Francis Ferdinand of Austria and his wife took place July 3 in the presence of a limited number of dignitaries, the services being purposely devoid of that pomp generally attending royal funerals. The populace made a great demonstration of grief, and of sympathy for the Emperor Francis Joseph, who with the new heir-apparent, Archduke Charles Francis Joseph, occupied seats opposite the foreign ambassadors. Since the tragedy it has developed that the murderous plot was most complete in its arrangement, and that the archduke and his wife could not possibly have escaped, humanly speaking. The existence of a plot of Pan-Slavonic origin to assassinate the German Emperor and dating back many months has also been announced.

The Fourth Gains in Joyousness

STATISTICS gathered by the Chicago Herald and published in the press show a total of 15 deaths and 306 injuries resulting from the Fourth of July celebrations throughout the country, and fire losses aggregating $125,000, as against an average of nearly twice that number of deaths, six times the number of injuries, and four times the amount of fire damage during the preceding ten years. To the number of injuries probably many minor accidents may be added, but the report as it stands is taken as evidence of the great gain made during the past few years by the safe and sane movement. In New York the number of injuries and the number of fire alarms turned in were greatly below the average there.

WITH OUR CHINESE ORPHANS

WE are happy in telling the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family that the support coming in for the Chinese orphans under our care is most encouraging. Some of the cases especially described have touched the hearts of many. If, however, our readers would but realize that these examples of childish misery are not exceptional, but, on the contrary, are typical of these unfortunate little ones, we are sure that there would be a steady inpouring of gifts sufficient at all times for all the needs of this host of a thousand and five orphan children.

An accident in selecting a picture for our story of the work in the issue of April 8 resulted in the use of part of a group of Chinese children who are not orphans at all. We are rather glad that that occurred, because it gives us the opportunity now to show the entire group from which that picture was taken, and to call attention to the significant fact that the excellent work being done among Chinese children who are not homeless and parentless is duplicated for the outcast orphans taken up by CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. Mrs. A. Gallaway, who is shown in the center of the picture on this page, conducts a missionary school at Hoiping, Kwangtung, China. The interesting children in this school have none of the disadvantages of abject poverty. We understand that in some cases they come from reasonably good homes. In fact, on the left of Mrs. Gallaway is her pastor's wife; the dear little tot first at Mrs. Gallaway's right is the pastor's daughter. This is a charming group, such as can be found in the missionary schools throughout China. We are glad to make this allusion to Mrs. Gallaway's work. The picture originally became confused in our files with the many photographs of our orphan children.

Lovable as are the children in this picture, those for whose support we appeal to our readers are every whit as winsome and, in addition, have the compelling attractiveness of their utter hopelessness unless we provide them with food, with raiment, and with Christian care and education. We want these thousand and five orphan children who look upon the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family as their own to have all the advantages of these children of better circumstances. It is a worthy cause indeed for which we urge the generous gifts of our readers, the preparation of this small army of Chinese children for the service of our common Saviour; children who otherwise must go back to misery.

From the many letters received we select a few as fair samples of all. They reflect deep interest and often evidences of much sacrifice on the part of the writers:

CHINESE CHILDREN, NOT ORPHANS, IN A MISSION CLASS, WITH THEIR TEACHER

Find enclosed $10 for the China Orphan Fund in memory of our dear son, called home last September. R. E. P.
Williamsport, Ohio.

I enclose $5 for the China Orphan Fund. I am an old subscriber, and have been accustomed to send you checks from time to time, and nothing gives me more pleasure. Every time I devote anything for such worthy causes I think to myself it's one more deposit in the Bank of Heaven. I am an old veteran, seventy-seven, and it is not much longer I will have such an opportunity, but I want to improve it as often as possible. N. W. M.
San Diego, Calif.

Feeling the great need of aid to these orphans, we enclose $21.10, raised by saving up the money for our Sunday eggs.
MRS. J. E. S.,
MRS. J. T. M.,
Kingsville, Texas. MRS. THOS. S.

Am sending $1.35 for your Chinese Orphan Fund. My two little girls saved most of it by going without candy. It is given with thankful, loving hearts. MRS. J. C. F.
Ludlow, Mass.

Enclosed $5 to aid the CHRISTIAN HERALD orphans. It must not be that these children must be turned into the street unprotected, when a few dollars rightly used would result in intelligent Christian men and women.
Climax, Mich. MRS. L. A. M.

My class of little girls have been saving their pennies for mission work, and as we now have $1 we are going to send it to you for the China Orphan Fund. (MRS.) F. E. B.
Concord, N. H.

It rejoices us to know that these gifts are well expended. The money is devoted exactly to the purpose for which it is sent, the care and education of these orphan children. It costs $20 a year to provide wholly for one child. Several hundred of the children now have their individual patrons, who receive regular reports of the progress of the child whose care they have undertaken. Some prefer to do this by quarterly payments of $5. The great majority of the children are provided for by the smaller gifts. Do what you can. Every gift is welcome here and is thrice welcome in China. Address, The Chinese Orphan Fund, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

THE NEWLY FOUND FLOOD TABLET

A CONFUSION OF THE IDENTITIES OF ADAM AND NOAH—PROFESSOR LANGDON'S THEORY DISCUSSED

BY PROFESSOR EDGAR J. BANKS

IN THE year 1845, Austin Henry Layard, a young Englishman, was hunting in the valley of the Tigris and Euphrates. He was not an archeologist; yet he became so intensely interested in the excavations carried on by the French in the ruins of a buried city near Nineveh, that he abandoned his hunting trip, obtained funds, employed Arab workmen, and began to dig into the ruins of Nineveh. There he met with such wonderful success that now he is frequently called the "Father of Assyriology."

Layard continued his excavations at Nineveh and at other Assyrian cities for several years. Those who have seen the great sculptured marble slabs adorning the walls of several galleries of the British Museum, or who have read his fascinating book, Nineveh and Babylon, are familiar with his work. He was succeeded by other excavators sent out by the British Museum. The most remarkable among the discoveries made was that of the great national library of Assyria, consisting of about one hundred thousand tablets of clay, all covered with cuneiform writing. It was a wonderful discovery. Weeks were required by the Arab workmen to dig out the tablets carefully, and to box them up to send to the British Museum, and so many were the tablets that even yet, after more than half a century, some of them have not been read.

In the year 1872, long after the Nineveh library had been discovered and carried to the British Museum, George Smith was employed to catalogue the tablets. He had learned to read the wedge-shaped writing upon them, and, one day, taking up the fragment of a broken tablet, he read these words: "I released a dove. It flew about, but finding no resting-place, returned." At once Mr. Smith recognized that he had found a Babylonian story of the Flood. It was a great discovery, and realizing its importance, he became so excited that he fell senseless to the floor. The report of the discovery spread rapidly throughout the world. Intense interest in the excavations was awakened, and a London paper sent Mr. Smith to Nineveh to search for the missing fragments of the tablet containing the story. Mr. Smith had hardly reached Nineveh and opened the excavations in the chamber of the palace where the library was preserved, when he found the tablet he most desired. Since that time, among the tablets which had been taken to the British Museum, several other copies of the Deluge story have been found. All of them are fragmentary, yet enough remains to preserve the entire story.

The Babylonian story of the Deluge—which has already been told in these pages—should be too familiar to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to be repeated here. Its outline is identical with that of the Bible story. Because of the wickedness of the people, the gods decided to destroy the world with a flood. In a dream at night a man was warned of the approaching flood, commanded to build a ship, and to take animals into it. The ship was built; the animals were collected; the floods came and raised the ship aloft. All human and animal life was destroyed. The waters decreased. The summits of the mountains appeared; birds were sent out to find land, and finally the ship rested on a mountain peak in the north. The animals were released; sacrifices were offered, and in the sky the rainbow first appeared to confirm the promise that never again should the earth be destroyed by a flood.

A comparison of the Babylonian story with the Hebrew account of the deluge reveals some slight differences. The Babylonian story speaks of gods; the Babylonians were polytheists. The Hebrew story speaks of God; the Hebrews were monotheists. The Babylonian Noah was called Pir-Napishtim. The number of days given as the duration of the flood varied, and the Babylonian ship rested upon Mount Nisir instead of Ararat; yet Nisir was a peak of the Ararat range. But these differences are very slight, and may be satisfactorily accounted for by the efforts of the scribe to give the story local color. The stories are the same, or rather they had the same origin.

The Babylonian story of the flood was found recorded upon a large clay tablet, eighteen inches long and twelve inches wide, with three columns of fine writing upon each side. Later discoveries have shown that the tablet was the eleventh of a series of twelve tablets, recording a long epic poem. In other words, the Babylonian story of the flood was the eleventh chapter of a long poem relating the adventures of the hero Gilgamish, but there was a time when the flood story was independent and complete in itself. Homer's Odyssey, which we know as one long poem, is composed of many short poems woven together until they appear to be a single unit. So the Babylonian epic was compiled by some Babylonian Homer, who collected the old poems, the history and the stories of the people, changed them to suit his fancy, attached them to the name of a great national hero, and then wove them together. Some of the stories were old myths; others were real history; thus the old deluge story was transformed and made the eleventh chapter of the poem. We may therefore understand why it differs in some details from the Hebrew story, but rather it is surprising that, after it left the hands of the Babylonian compiler, the differences are so slight.

The tablets recording the flood story found in the Nineveh library date from the time of Assurbanipal, the last great king of Assyria, who ruled from 664 to 626 B.C. He seems to have been the only Assyrian king to collect tablets or books upon many subjects until he had formed a great library. He sent his agents to the old cities of the south to collect the rare and ancient books preserved in the temples. Many of the collection were taken to Nineveh; others of the old tablets were copied. The deluge story from Nineveh was copied from a tablet which was perhaps then even two thousand years old. The agents of Assurbanipal were very active.

In the excavations at Bismya, the present writer revealed several shafts which appear to have been dug in their search for the old documents down through the buried ruins. The Babylonian poem with the story of the flood, which Mr. Smith discovered, was a copy made about 650 B.C. from far older tablets, and the tablet containing the original story of the flood, before it was made a part of the great poem, was far older. Archeologists have long known this to be so, and every Babylonian excavator has hoped to discover a tablet with the original story, confident that the story would more closely resemble that of the Bible. At last one of the very early tablets has been found.

The excavations conducted by the University of Pennsylvania at the Babylonian ruin, Nippur, are

THE TRIUMPHAL ENTRY

*SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR AUGUST 2

Hosannas to the King

By Amos R. Wells

ONE of the most triumphal features of Christ's triumphal entry into Jerusalem happened before the great procession started; it was the request for the colt, "The Lord hath need of him," followed by the willing surrender of the animal.

A professor in Albany College, Ore., was about to resign because the trustees could not give him a necessary increase of one hundred dollars in salary. Thereupon David Torbet, professor of mathematics, with a salary of eight hundred dollars a year, asked the trustees to reduce it to seven hundred, because "he was so grateful to God for his prosperity" in having been able to save several thousand dollars. Then the hundred dollars could be applied to the salary of the other professor.

Every deed of glad self-sacrifice like that is a contribution to Christ's triumphal march through the ages. Mounting upon it, the Lord of lords rides in royal state. No one of us but has some colt to yield when the message comes, "The Lord hath need of him."

One of the saddest episodes in all Christ's life occurred during this triumphal procession. Luke tells us about it. As our Lord came within view of the Holy City, shining in its beauty below him, glorious with its memories of a resplendent past, he wept at the sight, and broke out in lamentations.

Does he not do the same as he stands upon the Palisades of the Hudson and looks down on New York, in many ways the greatest city in the world? Does he not say, "If thou hadst known in this day, even thou, the things which belong unto peace!" If the men of Wall Street and the women of Fifth Avenue could see him standing there, would they turn from their money-getting and their pursuit of pleasure? They could see him, if they would.

Turning again to the triumphal side of this event, how we can rejoice in those hosannas! Nothing else like them in the entire Bible except the convoy of the ark to Jerusalem by David and the song of Moses and the Lamb in the Revelation. It is good to see that men and women and children can be so caught out of themselves by a noble enthusiasm.

Once a man who was a warm admirer of the great preacher, Spurgeon, had visiting him a friend who had never heard that master of Christian oratory. Of course the visitor was sent to the Metropolitan Tabernacle, and when he returned his host asked him eagerly, "Well, what did you think of him?" "Nothing," was the disappointing answer. "No, nothing," he said again. But after a minute, his eyes filling with tears, he added, "All I can think of is the preacher's Saviour!"

Spurgeon had the Hosanna spirit, and that is what made him a great preacher. Read any of his sermons and you will have evidence of a man wholly absorbed in a glorious affection. Phillips Brooks had the same spirit of the triumphal entry. He was crossing the ocean with a friend when one day the friend sought for him, and found him on his knees in their stateroom. His clasped hands were raised, his eyes were full of tears, and he was crying out, "Jesus! Jesus!" That is why Phillips Brooks was a great preacher. Once he was seen walking down State Street in Boston at the noon hour, when that notable street was crowded with men of finance and their clerks; and as he walked, entirely unconscious of the throng, he pealed out at the top of his magnificent voice one of the great hymns of the church! Phillips Brooks had a hosanna soul.

No one is too humble, too young, too poor, too ignorant, to join in this hosanna to the Redeemer. Once a missionary was called to an obscure village of India to baptize and receive into church fellowship sixty or seventy converts from Hinduism. The proceedings were eagerly watched by a lad of fifteen who sat in the rear of the room, and who came forward when the examination of the others was complete. The missionary, on learning that he also wanted to join the church, sought to dissuade him on account of his youth, fearing that he might backslide and so bring discredit upon the church. The missionary said he would return in about six months, and he advised the boy to wait till then. At once all the men and women sprang up and cried, "Why, he is the one who has taught us all we know about Jesus Christ!" And it was so.

Doubtless there were boys and girls in that triumphal procession in Jerusalem. Certainly there were many poor and humble folks. No one in your whole Sunday school but can cry "Hosanna!" with Peter and John and Mark and Andrew and James and Lazarus.

* THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON for Sunday, August 2, 1914. The Triumphal Entry. Mark 11: 1-11. GOLDEN TEXT: "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem: behold, thy King cometh unto thee." Zech. 9: 9.

Christ and the Cities

By Edwin Whittier Caswell

PALM SUNDAY was the last secular Sunday in human history. Easter made it a sacred day one week afterwards.

The approaching feast of the Passover had increased the inhabitants of Jerusalem to nearly three millions of people who had come from Palestine and distant lands. These strangers greatly added to the enthusiasm of Christ's reception. The raising of Lazarus and the healing of the blind men had made the great teacher more popular with the masses of the people. Jesus knew that these conditions were favorable for his triumphal procession.

Why did Christ encourage this Messianic enthusiasm? Perhaps it was to show that he voluntarily gave his life for men; that he went willingly instead of being dragged to Calvary; for this day proved that he might have been made king. If he lived he might be king of the Jews; but if he died, king of all kingdoms. The disciples could not understand kingship by way of the cross, neither could the Pharisees perceive that crucifying him would increase his power among all peoples in all ages.

Our Lord had hitherto fled when his kingship was urged by the people, but now his hour is come to proclaim his universal Lordship; King of Jews and Gentiles, King of hearts and truth, not of this world, but of all worlds. He does not seek to usurp Cæsar's throne, but drives out from the temple the corrupt money-changers where the house of prayer had become a den of robbers—a symbol of his ability to cleanse hearts from sin.

During the loud hosannas Jesus saw the awful contrasts of life. He beheld Judas's betrayal, Peter's denial, Pilate's refusal. He saw the robe of mockery, the crown of infamy, the cross of Calvary, and then the awful vision of the terrible fate of the city whose leaders were rejecting him. As he wept, he cried, "Oh that thou hadst known in this thy day!" Known me, become willing to be sheltered in my love, "but now it is hid from thine eyes!" He realized that this was his last offer for the sacred city of Jerusalem to accept him. This scene of triumph was a symbol of Christ's conquering march through the ages and his final procession through the gates of the New Jerusalem, where an assembled universe would exclaim, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive blessing and honor and power and glory forever and ever!"

The children who were criticized for joining in the loud acclaim drew forth the words from the loving Christ, "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings hast thou perfected praise!" How appropriate that Palm Sunday is made Decision Day in a vast number of Sunday schools! When the young people bring palm branches of consecration to Christ, the branch of the body, of the life, of the soul, of self should be presented as a living sacrifice at his feet, as he rides to Calvary to be broken for you.

Jesus, the meek and lowly Prince of Peace, came riding upon an ass, for the horse was associated with war. It was not a sign of humiliation, but of distinction, especially as the animal had never been ridden. Great generals have been often honored on returning from their triumph, though they left famine, desolation and death in their pathway. Humanity's victor suffers himself that mankind may have purity, peace, prosperity and happiness forever.

The way to capture the city for Christ is to go for the multitude. They will respond to the truth. The common people heard Jesus gladly, and millions have enthroned him in their hearts since that memorable march. Lust of gold, of greed and place, uncontrolled appetites and passions are dooming some cities of the world to destruction. Oh that Christ's heart of love may turn the great cities of the world into his triumphal procession!

SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS' ROUND TABLE

BY FRANK L. BROWN, General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

—R. P., EVANSVILLE, IND., ites: "Your name has been given me as one who is doing successful work for mothers and who may be able to give me some valuable suggestions or ideas. There never has been any such work in this church or carried on through this Sunday school. I have succeeded in getting a committee appointed and at work. It is my wish to start only the best thing and to start in properly and to keep it running successfully. I shall be most grateful for any general suggestions or any points you may be able to give me directly through your experience or for any literature you may be able to send me."

One of the fine, new features of modern Sunday school work is the increasingly close relation of the home and the Sunday school promoted by the Parents' Department, Mothers' Associations, and Mothers' Classes. The New York State Sunday School Association has a Parents' Department to bring every parent in each school into some relation to the Sunday school. Apply for leaflet to Rev. Joseph Clark, D.D., superintendent, 80 Howard Street, Albany, N. Y.

Then the Home Department of the International Sunday School Association has recently introduced the family worship feature to aid the home, to build again the good old-fashioned family altar that should never go out of fashion. Write the International Sunday School Association, 1416 Mallers Building, Chicago, Ill., for this leaflet.

Many Sunday schools are borrowing from the public school the plan of Mothers' Associations. These associations in the Sunday school have been very successful in bringing about a close co-operation between the Sunday school and the home. The usual plan in beginning the association is to call together the parents of the youngest children, explain the purpose of the association, elect officers, appoint committees, and arrange for a monthly meeting on an afternoon or evening. The program can consist of readings or music, a talk on some problem relative to the children, games and light refreshments. A library of mothers' books and some good home magazine for distribution will prove helpful, and the mothers will be glad to contribute toward such a library. In the writer's school such an association has been conducted for over fifteen years, and teachers and mothers draw very close together in these conferences and social affairs. A leaflet by Mrs. Heath gives valuable information as to plans for Mothers' Associations, names of good books for a mothers' library, and subjects for discussion at these Mothers' Association meetings. This booklet can be secured by application to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Out of these mothers' meetings has grown in one school a Mothers' Bible Class, meeting Sunday in the beginners' room near their children. As the children have been promoted, the mothers' class has been promoted, and another mothers' class formed in its place, until there are three large mothers' classes for Bible study as a result. It is a good plan to start this mothers' work with the mothers of the youngest children, and then expand the work to include all the mothers and fathers of the school. In the Sunday School Journal (Methodist Episcopal) for July is "A Program for a Mothers' Association," which is suggestive.

Every school should appoint a superintendent of a Parents' Department to visit the homes and see that every parent is attached to a Home Department, a Fathers' or Mothers' Class, or a Parents' or Mothers' Association. In the Moody Sunday school, Chicago, the young mothers and fathers bring their children to the Sunday school, and while the parents are being taught the Bible lesson, the babies are cared for in the nursery in one of the school-rooms.

—M. I. P. What plan do you suggest for looking up absentees in the Sunday school?

A teacher's visit, a teacher's letter or a picture postcard from teacher to scholar is, of course, the first and best method, but there are many cases where a teacher cannot visit. A splendid plan is to appoint an Absentee Secretary and an Absentee Committee. The absentee secretary gives the teacher the names of absentees for visitation and report. If the teacher cannot visit, the name is returned to the secretary, who gives it to the chairman of the Visitation Committee to report the following Sunday, and no name is canceled from the roll without such a report and the O.K. of the superintendent. One successful school has a regular plan by which a card is sent to the scholar by the teacher after the first Sunday's absence. After the second Sunday, the superintendent sends a card, and after the third week, the Visiting Committee calls. One can scarcely imagine a scholar slipping away from a school under such a plan of personal follow up. It is good business for the kingdom.

—SOME MONTHS AGO the St. Louis Republic instituted a Statewide contest for the purpose of discovering the man or woman who had held the record for the longest continuous attendance at Sunday school. Much investigation revealed the fact that this distinction belonged to William M. Paxton, of Platte City, Mo., who has an authenticated record of having attended Sunday school 3,354 Sundays up to July 1 of this year, without having missed a single Sunday. Before the writer of this sketch lies a long letter from Mr. Paxton in which he says that he has been a member of the Sunday school for ninety years, having gone to Sunday school for the first time in Columbus, Ohio, in the year 1824. Up to the present time he has not missed a single Sunday in sixty-four years. He is now ninety-five years old, and although he is very deaf and sees but little he still goes to Sunday school. In a letter written on June 30 of this year Mr. Paxton says: "I staggered to His house of worship last Sabbath and met a class of six old men. Our theme was the Lord's prayer." H. J. L.

The Courage Verse*

GO through the first nine verses of the first chapter of Joshua and see how many times God tells Joshua "to be strong"; o be of good courage" or "very urageous." Our verse, the ninth, ms up these exhortations: "Have t I commanded thee? Be strong d of good courage; for the Lord thy od is with thee whithersoever thou est."

Joshua had received a loud call to big work. The people whom he as to lead had formed habits of ubt, fear, vacillation, defeat. Under m they were to enter upon a new a. They were to be led from doubt faith, from fear to courage, from cillation to stability, from defeat to lendid triumphs. If he was to be eir leader he must have a steel-like art, untouched by doubts and fears.

There was one unanswerable argu- ent given to Joshua, which was to ll all his present fears and destroy ture fears as they assailed him. hat argument was Jehovah's two- ld promise: "I am with thee"; "I all be with thee."

You remember the story of good lizabeth, the wife of Martin Luther. ooking out of the window one day e saw him approaching the house great dejection. Putting a shawl er her head she sat down on the oor before the stove and when her ge entered the room he found her cking herself from side to side and oaning aloud. In great consterna- on he asked what was the matter. woeful accents she wailed: "O Martin, Martin! O Martin, artin, God is dead!"

Then she rose to meet the sunshine at was restored to his troubled face. e thanked her for the rebuke. So e sturdy Elizabeth helped the great former to hold that faith which uld make him the author of the reat battle hymn of truth:

A mighty fortress is our God,
A bulwark never failing.

John Wesley, coming down to die, inking of all the infinite mercies hich had crowned his life and work nd which were promised for the ture, declared: "The best of all is, od is with us."

Are we living as young men and omen should live who believe that od is with them to help them in very emergency, to give strength for very task, to give victory in every attle? There is no excuse for faint- eartedness, for hesitation, for mis- iving. These things dishonor God. t is a command of his: "Be strong, nd of good courage."

Do not be afraid of opposition; do ot be afraid of criticism; do not be fraid of standing alone; do not be fraid of ridicule. Paul said to Tim- thy: "Let no man despise thy outh." God has called us; God has ut work into our hands to do; we ust do it with strong heart, expect- ng victory.

The task may not be as great as oshua's or Luther's or Wesley's. ut sometimes we doubt and fret and orry more over the little tasks and ares and conflicts than over the reater ones. But for all our needs, reat and small, God is more than fficient. "My God shall supply all our need, according to his riches in lory by Christ Jesus," said Paul. And he could boast humbly: "I can lo all things through Christ who trengtheneth me."

Compare with this call of Joshua he call of Jeremiah, reported in the irst chapter of his prophecy.

Penitence and Triumph*

WE learn in studying psychology that human personality has three elements—intellect, sensibility and will. In easier language we say that a person is a being who has the power of thought, the power of feeling, the power of will. But it almost seems that a fourth element should be added. A man has more than mind, feeling and will; he has a conscience. Scientists may say that conscience is part of our faculty of feeling, but that hardly fills the bill; it does not adequately express what conscience is. The experience and feeling of guilt are altogether different from all other sensations. The experience of a violated conscience is so terrific, so gigantic, so unique that it cannot be compared to or allied with any other experience of life. Let us say, then, that a man is a being with mind, feeling, will and conscience.

Many of the modern definitions of sin strike one who had the advantage of being brought up under earlier ideas as very silly. Wise men, or people who want to make a show of wisdom, explain the etymological meaning of the Greek word for sin and state that it means "missing the mark." But any one who has undergone the real horrors of a violated conscience knows that that does not come within a trillion miles of expressing what sin means to the human soul. Sin is sin; you cannot define it. It is a thing all by itself; a thing deadly, unspeakable, unendurable.

And down here in these deep places of a troubled conscience do we find our surest proof of God. When a man is suffering from the tortures of an offended conscience he knows that God has something to do with it. Then he learns that it is only God who can help him out of his trouble. And we have, repeated in countless human lives, the wonder of the fifty-first Psalm: "Against thee, and thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight. Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me and I shall be whiter than snow. Make me to hear joy and gladness; that the bones which thou hast broken may rejoice. Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation, and uphold me with thy free spirit. Then will I teach transgressors thy ways; and sinners shall be converted unto thee."

Church Peace Union Prizes

THE Church Peace Union offers five thousand dollars in prizes for the best essays on international peace, as follows:

1. A prize of $1,000 for the best monograph of between 15,000 and 25,000 words on any phase of international peace by any pastor of any church in the United States.
2. Three prizes, one of $500, one of $300, and one of $200, for the three best essays on international peace by students of the theological seminaries in the United States.
3. One thousand dollars in ten prizes of $100 each to any church member between twenty and thirty years of age.
4. Twenty prizes of $50 each to Sunday school pupils between fifteen and twenty years of age.
5. Fifty prizes of $20 each to Sunday school pupils between ten and fifteen years of age.

It is hoped that pastors will make the announcement of these prizes in all of the churches and Sunday schools of the United States.

All essays must be in by January 1, 1915. Further particulars, as well as literature to be used in the preparation of the essays, and lists of books can be secured from the secretary of the Church Peace Union, Rev. Frederick Lynch, D.D., 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

CHRISTIAN HERALD PRAYER LEAGUE

MY HEART aches as I see [illegible] work." So writes a wife asking prayer for the regeneration of her husband, telling of deep anxiety in their home life. "I am so discouraged," she adds, "I seem to have lost my power in prayer." Will the members of the Prayer League unite in fervent prayer, with strong faith, that this dear woman's faith may be strengthened, her vision of Christ made clearer, her heartache eased, her husband saved, and all the home troubles healed? At the close of a very sad letter, telling of great mental strain and affliction, N. McN. adds this definite request: that God will deliver him from his nervous disease, from fear and worry, the harrowing desire for tobacco, and that he will make it possible for him to do special work for God. Another sad letter comes from a father whose wife has died, leaving him with three small children, one of whom is very ill with tuberculosis. He writes: "I want your prayers for the healing of my motherless baby boy, four years old. The doctors say he has a tubercular knee. It has become grave and stiff, he cannot use it at all. It breaks my heart to see him crippled. I am not able to send him to the surgical institute." Mrs. L. W. asks prayers that her husband may return home. He left three months ago on a business trip, and no word of him has been received.

F. M. R. writes from Independence, Kan.: "I wish to acknowledge through your paper that God answered my prayers in time of great temptation and trouble and delivered me." E. V. P., of Hearing Grass, Ky., writes: "I prayed for a serious cure; in less than a week I was free from the trouble and have never suffered from it since—nearly three years ago." M. E. A. writes from Gaithersburg, Md.: "I have prayed for months that two of my family might find employment, and I find that God in the most unexpected manner opened a vacancy for both." Mrs. S. B. S., of Saxton, Pa., writes to acknowledge answered prayer in the success of an operation performed on her father's eye. Mrs. C. F. writes from Hendersville, N. Y.: "In answer to your prayers our granddaughter's trouble with her throat has been helped. Her parents took her to the city for special treatment which, under the blessing of God, was successful."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from [illegible]

GOOD CHANGE

Coffee to Postum.

The large army of persons who have found relief from many chronic ailments by changing from coffee to Postum as a daily beverage, is growing each day.

It is only a simple question of trying it for oneself in order to know the joy of returning health as realized by an Ills. young lady. She writes:

"I had been a coffee drinker nearly all my life and it affected my stomach—caused insomnia and I was seldom without a headache. I had heard about Postum and how beneficial it was, so concluded to quit coffee and try it.

"I was delighted with the change. I can now sleep well and seldom ever have headache. My stomach has gotten strong and I can eat without suffering afterwards. I think my whole system greatly benefited by Postum.

"My brother also suffered from stomach trouble while he drank coffee, but now, since using Postum, he feels so much better he would not go back to coffee for anything."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

A LITTLE ANGEL OF THE MOUNTAINS

[illegible] wife [illegible] morning in the best [illegible] communion with her God. "We do not know what is going to happen to-morrow," she reasoned, "but I feel certain righteousness will prevail in the end. Let if there should be a personal battle with all the [illegible]—" She paused. "I'll leave the decision to you."

"I promise, ma'am," answered the old miner.

"Very well. I am to place your protection in the hands of Almighty God rather than in your own."

"Which means—"

"That you will all go [illegible] your weapons before the service."

"What if some fill do, an' the [illegible] is lost—and Gin still runs [illegible] the [illegible] is served."

The little lecture had subdued many a range-bred hatred [illegible] to the far West, but he was very much surprised to be stopped at the foot of the trail by two figures who seemed larger in the waning moonlight than they really were, and who, if he could judge from the reflection of the light from the barrels of the rifles swung over their backs, were very obviously armed.

"Let's git across, your Right Reverence," said the Doc pessimistically, giving the prelate his proper title, which he had learned by due inquiry from Parson Bill. "We're a-representin' the religious element of the camp. There's a possibility that there may be some objections to your preachin' or startin' a church in Cañon Creek. The Sunday school has already made a pretty slow start, an' they can't figure out what'll happen to 'em when we gits a church a-goin', too. So we all come down yere fer to see you safe up the trail. There's a desperado camp in the mountains a-breathin' fire an' brimstone an' full of threats an' bad whisky, an' if he comes around yere flourishin' his gun, we're a-goin' to see that you gits through all right. If there's any shootin' to be done, we're goin' to take a hand. I am generally known as the Doc, though I ain't no medicine man, and this yere man is Parson Bill, though he ain't no—"

"Is it possible you are a brother clergyman?" interrupted the bishop eagerly.

"You've missed your aim," said Parson Bill. "The boys used to fancy that I had an unusual gift of gab, so they gave me that name and it has stuck."

"I see," said the bishop.

"We're both of us int'rested in this here church business, though we ain't made no confession yet. We've been kind a-dependin' on you to start us the right way," continued the Doc.

ROME IN THE PUBLIC EYE

SIGNOR NATHAN AND THE POPE

The famous speech in Rome, September 20, 1910, which angered the Vatican, and the Pope's rejoinder

From America, June 20, 1914

'TO-MORROW the whole world in its various representatives will assemble here to see how the Rome of to-day, the Rome of the Third Italy, is taking up again the destiny assigned to it. Such is the Rome which it is my honorable office to represent here, the champion of the liberty of thought which entered with the tri-color through this breach. Another Rome, prototype of the past, shuts itself up within limits more restricted than the walls of Belisarius, engaged in the task of confining thought within the narrowest bounds, in the fear lest, like the embalmed corpses of old Egypt, contact with the open air might turn it into dust. From there, from the fortress of dogma where the last despairing effort is being made to keep up the reign of ignorance, comes, on the one hand, the order to the faithful to banish from the schools the periodical press which tells of the life and thought of the day, and, on the other hand, thunders forth a ban against men and associations desirous of reconciling the practices and dictates of their faith with the teachings of the intellect, of practical life, of the moral and social aspirations of the civilized world. Just as in cosmic matter in dissolution, that city at the foot of the Janiculum is the fragment of a spent sun caught within the orbit of the contemporary world. When you think of next year, with its coming pilgrimage, and measure with the mental eye the smallness of the Breach before which you stand reverently in the memory of the past, you bow before the incalculable energy of thought, which, like compressed air, burst through that limited space to expand through the whole city and change its internal and external complexion.

"Return, O citizens, to the Rome of one year before the Breach, to 1869. The faithful of all parts of the world gathered in pilgrimage, drawn hither by a great and solemn affirmation of the reigning Catholicism. St. Peter's in its monumental majesty received in its ample bosom the representatives of dogma in Ecumenical Council; they came to decree that the Pontiff, in direct representation and succession of Jesus, must, like the Son, inherit omniscient, unlimited power over men, and to elevate above all human judgment his decrees, by virtue of his infallibility, proclaimed, recognized, and accepted. It was the inverse of the Biblical revelation of the Son of God become man—it was the son of man who made himself a god upon the earth. There was one man strong in history of the Papacy through the ages who rose up against this blasphemy against God and man.

"But Döllinger stood alone! To doubt or discuss the decrees of the Head of the Church was for the hierarchy the first step in submitting them to free examination—the tiny aperture through which passed the oxygenated air of science and civil progress. And so on the old walls of dogma they, by unanimous consent, spread the mortar of infallibility. This was the last great affirmation before the world of the Rome of the days before the Breach—it was the last pilgrimage to the Pontiff-King. . . . This pilgrimage was for the infallibility—that infallibility which, inherited from tradition, passing into custom, unhappily finds its expression to-day in that popular ignorance which, on the appearance of an epidemic, hangs up votive offerings to the Madonna and assassinates the doctors; that infallibility which incites the Pontiff to boycott legitimate human aspirations, the discoveries of civilization, the manifestation of thought, and moves him to devise new blinds to shut out the light of day. . . . I sum up: In the Rome of the past there were never enough churches to pray in, while people cried in vain for schools; to-day, the churches are too large and too numerous, while there are never enough schools."

The Pope's Letter to the Cardinal Vicar of Rome

"Lord Cardinal:

"A circumstance of exceptional gravity moves Us to address Our words to you to-day to manifest the profound grief of Our heart. Two days ago a public functionary, in the exercise of his mandate, not satisfied with solemnly commemorating the anniversary of the day on which the sacred rights of the Pontifical Sovereignty were trampled under foot, raised his voice to heap abuse and outrage on the doctrines of the Catholic Faith, on the Vicar of Christ on earth, and on the Church itself. Speaking in the name of that Rome which was to be, according to authoritative declarations, the respected and peaceful residence of the Supreme Pontiff, he directly assailed Our spiritual jurisdiction itself, going so far with impunity as to hold up to public contempt the acts of Our Apostolic ministry. Linking blasphemous thoughts and words with this audacious denial of the mission entrusted by Christ Our Lord to Peter and his successors, he did not hesitate also to attack publicly the divine essence of the Church, the truth of her dogmas, and the authority of her Councils.

"And as hatred towards the Church is naturally joined with more declared hatred towards all manifestations of Christian piety, he did not shrink even from the malignant and anti-social design of offending the religious sentiments of the believing people.

"Because of this mass of impious statements, as blasphemous as they are gratuitous, We can not but raise Our voice in just indignation and protest, and at the same time, through you, Lord Cardinal, call the attention of Our children of Rome to the continuous and constantly increasing attacks on the Catholic Religion which are being made, even by the public authorities, in the very seat of the Roman Pontiff.

"This new and most painful evidence will certainly not escape the notice of the faithful of the whole Catholic world, outraged as they, too, are by it, and they will unite with Our beloved children of Rome to raise up fervent prayers to the Almighty that He may rise in defense of His Spouse, the Church, so shamefully made a target for calumnies ever more poisonous and for assaults ever more violent from the licensed daring of her enemies.

"We hope that for the very honor of the Eternal City these intolerable attacks may not be renewed; and meanwhile, as a pledge of Our special affection, We heartily impart to you, Lord Cardinal, the Apostolic Benediction. PIUS X, Pope.

"From the Vatican, September 22, 1910."

Italy Isn't Worried

Special cable to the New York Times

ROME, July 6.—Replying to Signor Santini in the Senate to-night on the subject of Mayor Nathan's selection as Italian commissioner to the Panama-Pacific Exhibition, the foreign minister, the Marquis di San Giuliano, said American opposition was confined to some "very noisy circles," particularly composed of Irish Roman Catholics, who on all occasions passed motions in favor of the restoration of the church's temporal power.

Consequently, the minister said, the Italian Government did not need to trouble itself about them.

A LITTLE ANGEL OF THE MOUNTAINS

"I am thankful to God that it has been possible for me to come out here to help you and my good friends the Morrisons in this splendid work," replied the good bishop with great fervor.

"And we're thankful, too," said Parson Bill. "You look like a man who could hold his own with anybody, even if you ain't so big as some."

"I am not handy with rifle or revolver, but I once could box or wrestle any man of my size—when I was younger, of course," returned the still vigorous old man, laughing pleasantly as he thought of his former prowess.

"And I'd 'a' bet on you to the last dollar, if you did," observed the Doc, looking approvingly at the newcomer.

"Oh, I don't know," said the bishop laughingly; "your friend here, Parson Bill, looks as if he might have been able to tackle me with one hand, even at my best."

"We are not going to engage in any strife except a friendly one, I hope, sir," said Bill, also much pleased with the bishop's appearance and manner.

"Good; let us take up our journey, then," said the other heartily. "Indeed, I suppose we shall have to be moving along rapidly if we are to get to Cañon Creek in time for morning service. But you'll have to remember that I am a plainsman and not a mountaineer. So please go gently up the trail."

The bishop spoke to his companion and guide, and to the man driving the burros upon which his belongings had been packed, and the whole party started up the cañon. On the way they were met by the young Indian, Blue Wing, who for motives of his own had intercepted them, and, no one objecting, he now joined the party.

To intercept them had not occurred to Dead Shot Jackson. The forebodings of the law-and-order men as to that contingency were not justified by the event. Dead Shot Jackson's antipathy was not an animo furandi to all religion, or even to all humanity. It was localized in that it was directed to Cañon Creek, and still further localized in that it was concentrated on Parson Bill and the small boy. In the intensity of his hatred of those two, the parts played by Old Four Eyes, the Doc, and the others had almost been condoned.

ANSWERS TO FINANCIAL QUERIES

DEW. H. G., ARIZONA. The C. L. Mossauer Estates removed from the Mills Building two years ago. We have been unable to trace the concern. Your "bonds" have no apparent value.

MRS. W., NEW JERSEY. Mr. Benjamin D. Haight, deputy superintendent of the State Banking Department, expects to make another dividend payment to Industrial Savings and Loan Company claimholders during the coming fall. Mr. Haight's efforts to convert the real estate assets of the Industrial into cash have been impeded by the condition of stagnation in the realty market.

MRS. S. N. K., RHODE ISLAND. (1) United States Steel common is not recommended as a strictly safe investment for a woman. The stock is a speculative issue, given at times to wide fluctuations in the stock market. It sold at 8⅜ (1903) and at 94⅞ (1909), and is now selling in the 60s. (2) Slightly over 8 per cent. (3) The preferred stock may be considered favorably for your investment under the conditions you have named. (4) Nearly 6½ per cent.

REV. J. P. M., VIRGINIA. Your purchase of two first mortgage 5 per cent. bonds of the Western Pacific Railway at 95 was unfortunate. The bonds sold July 9 at 45. These bonds are secured by a railroad which is said to have cost two dollars for every one dollar in bonds outstanding. Earnings reported are about one-half the bond interest, the Denver and Rio Grande making up the deficit, and finding the task, with its own burdens, a struggle.

"NOVICE," OHIO. A speculative railroad bond would be more desirabie than stock for your investment. For $870 and interest you can buy a Chicago, Terre Haute and Southeastern Railway 1st and refunding mortgage 5 per cent. bond, yielding about 5¾ per cent. on the invested amount. For $745 and interest you can get a Chicago Great Western Railway 1st mortgage 4 per cent. bond, yielding about 5½ per cent. Either issue should fill your requirements.

M. M. H., MASSACHUSETTS. The British-American Mines Company is reported as dead and the stock worthless. G. H. Wheeler, known as Wheeler & Co., 32 Broadway, New York City, died about five years ago, his friends said from grief over the fact that his mining promotions all failed. Other persons, not so charitable, attributed the cause of his death to worry over the activities of postal authorities.

MISS A. C. W., PENNSYLVANIA. Springfield (Missouri) Railway and Light Company first mortgage 5 per cent. serial gold bonds are looked upon as a desirable investment security. They are offered by investment bankers at a price to yield 5.40 per cent. The earnings reported are several times in excess of the amount required for interest and the security seems ample.

E. R., MICHIGAN. New Mexico Mining and Development Company is not known in financial circles. We do not believe the Dominion Trust Company, if this is a recognized banking institution, would dare guarantee a mining enterprise which, at best, must be classed as hazardous. We do not recommend mining shares.

H. P. S., CALIFORNIA. Your $500 should be invested in five different $100 bonds—"baby bonds," so called because of their small denomination. They are exactly like the $1,000 bonds of the same issue, except in denomination. The following are attractive issues and may be purchased from banking firms whose advertising appears on this page.

Virginia Ry. 1st 5s at	100
Norf. and W. 1st Cons. 4s at	97

T. D., VERMONT. The Industrial Finance Corporation makes no loans direct to borrowers, the loans being made through subsidiary "Morris Plan" banks, already established in various New England cities. It is proposed to found new Morris Plan banks throughout the United States and Canada. The Morris Plan works out in practice this way: Take the case of a person borrowing one hundred dollars (the limit). He gives his note (with two endorsers of his own relative standing) for $100. He receives $94 in cash. He then pays $2 a week for 52 weeks, thus canceling his debt. He has paid but 6 per cent. interest. The Morris plan is a straight business proposition and is backed by prominent Eastern bankers because it is a philanthropy which is self-supporting. The corporation's financial activities will consist of lending out its capital stock at 6 per cent., of lending out each week the 2 per cent. of its total original loans as these are repaid weekly, and of lending out the amount of interest deducted in advance upon each loan.

M. E. D., NEW YORK. Western municipal bonds are not free from tax in New York. You must secure issues having nativity in your State. We suggest the following as meeting the conditions under which you propose to invest $4,000:

Issue	Maturity	Price Per Cent.	Yield Per Cent.
State of N. Y. 4s	1942 at	102⅛	3.90
City Rochester 4½s	1944 at	107¾	4.05
City Troy 4½s	1934 at	103	4.05
City New York 4¼s	1962 at	102¼	4.15

Banking firms advertising on this page can supply the above bonds.

H. E. L., MISSOURI. (1) We are pleased that your investment in two Carolina, Clinchfield and Ohio 5s at 96 has turned out so well. These are not regarded as speculative bonds, and the rise of a point or two should not cause you to sell. They should be held, as we originally advised, for investment. (2) You might put your remaining $900 into a first and collateral trust mortgage 5 per cent. gold bond of the Virginian Power Company, on the basis offered by the bankers of the company, which is:

$1,000 1st and Col. Trust 5 per cent. bond } for and $300 (3 shares) common stock } $900

MRS. E. W. C., TENNESSEE. (1) We approve of your choice of investments, but of the two issues (if you can buy but one bond) we prefer the Vermont Power and Manufacturing Company first mortgage 5 per cent. gold bond at 96, to yield 5½ per cent. (2) You now have a profit on your Kerr Lake Mining Stock; sell quickly as possible.

A. B. M., INDIANA. The new issue Northern Pacific Railway Refunding and Improvement Mortgage Gold Bonds represent a very attractive investment opportunity at the price of 97. These bonds are sold as legal investment for savings banks and trust funds and fully meet your requirements for your client's investment.

C. DEW. W., CONNECTICUT. (1) New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad stock represents a very uncertain speculation. The attorney general has entered suit against the company under the provisions of the Sherman law and until the case has been settled the road's securities, especially the stock, will likely have many ups and downs. (2) Prosperous times are soon to arrive, according to the belief held by President Wilson and by many eminent business men. If the security market follows its usual habit it will be the first to feel and reflect an improving condition. Many investment securities are undeniably cheap.

MRS. L. A. C., MINNESOTA. (1) We can find no market for your Fox Optical stock. One broker who specializes in unlisted stocks tells us the stock wouldn't bring one cent a share. Perhaps William Ostrander himself, having sold you the stock for a big price, would pay more than this.

MRS. W. J. F., MISSISSIPPI. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has no facilities for determining the value of land in Texas, nor, indeed, in any other locality. Our readers should never purchase land they have no personal knowledge of.

F. B. J., NEW YORK. The Shredded Wheat Company has outstanding $8,750,000 common stock and $1,250,000 6 per cent. accumulative preferred stock. We assume from your letter that you refer to the common stock. Dividends on this issue have been paid as follows: Two per cent. was paid in 1906; 3 per cent. each in '07, '08, '09, '10; rate increase per annum by payment of 1 per cent. April 1, 1911, and this rate has since been maintained. Extra dividends are paid on Com., 1 per cent. being paid January 2, 1913, being an increase of one-half per cent. over the extra dividend paid the previous quarter. The stock is listed on the Toronto Stock Exchange, and has sold as low as 78 in January, 1914; as high as 90¾ in May; our most recent quotation has an offer at 90. The stock is regarded by many investors as a satisfactory speculative investment.

Newly Found Flood Tablet

too well known to need description here. It is enough to say that between the years 1886 and 1900, Dr. J. P. Peters, of New York, and the late J. H. Haynes, of North Adams, Mass., discovered at Nippur about seventy thousand inscribed tablets. Many of these tablets were of great age, probably as early as 2500 B.C., and some of them were brought to the museum of the University of Pennsylvania. Unfortunate circumstances arose which delayed the publication of the tablets, or even their examination. However, when Dr. Stephen Langdon of Jesus College, Oxford, England, was in the United States last October, he obtained permission to copy about fifty of the tablets, and the result is of the greatest importance to the student of the Bible. One of the tablets contained the story of the flood. It was written about 2500 B.C., or nearly two thousand years before the copy which was found in the library at Nineveh, and a thousand years before the time of Moses. There is no evidence that this was the tablet which the agents of Assurbanipal saw and copied.

This oldest story or copy of the deluge is written in the Sumerian language. The Sumerians were the first people who, as far as we now know, lived in Babylonia. They were highly civilized and possessed a well-developed art and literature. The Sumerian language as a priestly language continued among the Babylonians until Babylon fell.

This newly discovered Sumerian story of the flood, so Dr. Langdon asserts, more closely resembles the Bible story than does the Assyrian story discovered by Mr. Smith, and what is most remarkable, it refers also to the stories of the creation of the world and the fall of man. A Babylonian story of the creation of the world has long been known, and years ago a seal impression, engraved with the figures of a man, a woman and a serpent about a tree, was found. It refers to the expulsion of man from the Garden of Eden. But the new tablet, like the book of Genesis, contains all three of these stories, and therefore Dr. Langdon says that in it we have the earliest form of the book of Genesis. He is right only in part.

The new tablet, as Dr. Langdon says, is a hymn dedicated to the goddess who is called the creator of mankind. The ancient author, while composing that hymn, incorporated into it these stories, and while doing so, he seems to have confused the names of Adam and Noah, for it is Noah instead of Adam whom he associates with the fall of man. It is impossible to believe that the original form of the book of Genesis was a Sumerian hymn, in which the names of Adam and Noah were confused. However, Dr. Langdon has discovered a tablet of intense interest, and though it is not the original form of the book of Genesis, it is proof that away back, at a still earlier time, there was an old, old tablet which actually was the original of the first chapters of the book of Genesis, a tablet which contained the stories of the creation of the world, of the fall of man, and of the deluge, and a tablet of which a part of the book of Genesis is a copy or a translation. The man who wrote the hymn was familiar with that tablet; he attempted to tell the same stories in poetical form, and in doing so he confused the names. Therefore there is no longer any doubt that the early Bible stories, practically as we have them now, existed long before the days of Abraham. Only copies or extracts from the tablet containing those stories were found by Mr. Smith and Dr. Langdon, but we may hope that some day, in some of the oldest of the buried cities of Babylonia, some excavator may find the original tablet, the very beginning of the Bible; for this recent discovery is proof that such a tablet once existed.

Questions and Answers

Troubled Conscience. If the texts, Matt. 5: 29, 30 and Mark 9: 43, 47 ("If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out," and "if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off") teach that we should make any sacrifice rather than sin, must we give up everything which furnishes an occasion for sinful thoughts or emotion? Foolish pride or vanity may be one of our weaknesses. If one has a good voice should he or she refrain from singing if a feeling of vanity cannot be suppressed? Or if vanity is aroused by something which is not a talent but a natural gift, like beautiful hair, should it be cut off? Or should we refuse to dress becomingly? Doubtless, all this sounds absurd, but why, in the light of the statements of Christ referred to?

Suppose, now, we start all over again, remembering that when one wants to do right Jesus is his friend, not his enemy. Do you not think your letter sounds as though you were not quite sure of the kindness of Jesus? Remember that everything Jesus ever said he said to help people, to help them to happiness. Now you seem to be missing happiness, and Christ comes along to help you. If you will stop to reason, to let your fundamental common sense, your God-given faculty of thought, do its appointed work, you will know perfectly well that Jesus does not want you to do any of the frightful or uncomfortable things you speak of. In the words you quote he was making a point, was stating a principle. He was saying that eternal life and happiness are of incomparably greater importance than earthly life and happiness. We must stand ready to give up anything at the command of God; our only complete happiness is in complete surrender to him. But Jesus loved beautiful children and sweet music and fragrant flowers; he believed in friendship and sociability and human gladness. He wants his friends to be beautiful and winsome and happy. Even the austere Paul spoke of woman's hair as her "glory." Your trouble is that you are doubting Christ instead of trusting him, fearing him instead of loving him. Tell him at once that you will obey him in anything that he makes unmistakably clear. You would do very wrong to make any great sacrifice on a guess. When he speaks his message is plain: "My sheep know my voice," he said. Every gift and power and grace God has given you can be used in making others happy and in glorifying Christ. Ask him to cleanse your heart from all sin, to fill it with love for himself and others, to help you forget yourself in loving and serving him. Then your life will be full of gladness and beauty and usefulness, and you will wonder that you could ever have been afraid of so kind a Saviour, who wants to make us all glad.

T. C., Crothersville, Ind. 1. Some natures are emotional while others are placid. Religious experiences are not all alike, and we should not judge others because they are temperamentally different from ourselves. God, who alone knows the heart, is the judge of men. 2. In I Cor. 12, Paul has set forth the various manifestations of spiritual gifts, and has counseled charity and tolerance with all. In chapter 14, verses 9 to 33, he discusses the gift of tongues and makes it clear that God never sends a message without an interpreter, and that a message which has no interpretation is doubtful and unprofitable (see verse 28). "For God," he adds, "is not a God of confusion, but of peace." 3. With respect to your last question, see I John 1: 8-10. In many passages it is made clear that confession and repentance are necessary steps to forgiveness.

M. R. D., Goldsboro, Me. As frequently explained, the sin referred to in Matt. 12: 31, 32 and related passages is believed by many writers to have been attributing the works of the Holy Spirit to Satanic agency. Read the parallel passage in Mark 3: 29, 30.

C. B. P., Zion City, Ill. 1. The doctrines of the cult you mention are not spiritual, but materialistic philosophy. There is not in them anything of the saving power of Christ, nor do they teach the Gospel as a means of salvation. 2. It is very poor and unsafe consolation to rely on a death-bed repentance to cover up the sins of a misspent life.

H. B., Cuba, Kan. The books you mention are widely accepted and believed, but we know of no means of testing their accuracy now.

Mrs. E. G. H., Meridian, Miss. The fate of Jephthah's daughter has long been a subject of controversy among Bible authorities. The majority incline to the opinion that such an offering would not have been acceptable to God, nor even defensible under Jewish law, and that the maid was probably immured as a religious recluse for the remainder of her life, doomed to perpetual celibacy. Josephus, the famous Jewish historian, characterizes the proposed sacrifice as neither lawful nor pleasing to God. It must be noted, however, that the text of Judges 11: 37, 38, 39 is explicit, and that a number of authorities, both Jewish and Christian, have held that it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that she was actually offered as a sacrifice. Still, in view of the fact that Jephthah had the power to redeem his pledge (see Lev. 27: 2-5) by the payment of money, and also that none but a male victim could be offered in sacrifice, and still further that the Israelites were expressly forbidden to give up their sons and daughters to the fire (see Deut. 12: 29-31), there would appear to be reason in the contention that he receded from his ill-considered vow.

C. S. H., Ridgeway, Mo. 1. Abraham, according to the estimates of Bible chronologists, was 148 years old when Shem died. 2. The first bishop of the early church to use the name "Pope" as a title was Bishop Siricius, in the fourth century. After the fifth century it came into more general use, but it was not until after the seventh that the title began to be applied exclusively to the bishops of Rome. 3. We are not aware that any step has been taken lately regarding Bible revision by the Presbyterian Church.

Mrs. O. C. B., Watertown, N. Y. David, according to Bible chronologists, was born about B.C. 1083, while Daniel the prophet was born in Jerusalem about B.C. 618. There was a son named Daniel or Chileab, born to David by Abigail. (See I Chron. 3: 1.)

Mrs. A. P., Crestline, Ohio. 1. The extract you send is unquestionably correct. 2. The claim that Luke and Paul were Catholics, or indeed that any of the Apostolic Church during the first three centuries were Catholics, is absurd. The early Christian Church knew no such distinction as Catholic or Protestant.

O. K., Bahamas, W. I. The "nth degree" is a mathematical expression intended to convey the idea of the highest point that can be reached. It is seldom used by writers, however. "Eugenics" is a word of comparatively recent coinage and is defined as "the science of improving the human race by applying the laws of inheritance of characteristics to selection in marriage. The term "eugenics" was first used by Sir Francis Galton in 1884.

A. M. C., Scott, Kan. You need to pray to be strengthened in temptation, and to be given power to overcome those feelings of which you write. Envy and unkindness and worldliness are loath to loose their hold on the heart, but they will go if you ask for divine help in repelling them. We would advise you to connect yourself with some form of Christian work, either in the church organization or out of it. Visit the poor and the sick and do what you can to help them. Contrast your lot with theirs. Count your blessings and share them with others. You will find happiness and spiritual help in such a course. No matter how little you can do, do it gladly and with a joyful spirit. Do not allow yourself to mope and bemoan your own condition and shortcomings. Leave it all in God's hands "who knoweth all our infirmities." Hold fast to the great fact that Jesus "saves to the uttermost" and that means you, since you have accepted him. Confess him before men and go on in his service and the blessing will not fail to come. Forget yourself and he will take care of you, as he has promised.

M. P., Lake Charles, La. The "abomination of desolation," mentioned in Mark 24, is interpreted by several expert authorities to refer to the standard of Rome. The Roman ensigns were the symbols of an idolatrous and unclean pagan power. "Standing in the holy place" refers to the profanation of the Jewish altar by Antiochus Epiphanes.

Reader, Mansfield, Ohio. We sincerely wish it were in our power to do what you suggest, and to banish forever such horrors as the "Flagellants," which a correspondent and eyewitness in the Philippines recently described. They are the result of generations of superstition and spiritual ignorance, conditions for which the Catholic Church is largely responsible. It is a disgrace to American civilization that such conditions should still exist where our flag floats.

J. A. H., Chester, S. C. See comment on the prayer on the cross in Mail-Bag of July 8, 1914.

H. A., Glenville, Conn. 1. Peter never claimed or exercised any powers or privileges other than those enjoyed by the disciples in common. 2. The "rock" mentioned in Matt. 16: 18 was "not Peter, but the rock of Gospel truth, the adherence to which was the test of discipleship." 3. Pictures and images exposed for worship are a species of idolatry.

Subscriber, Oakland, Calif. Dr. Leon B. Salmans, in his letter on "War and Missions in Mexico," had no reference to the United States army, but to the Mexican army. Of course, no such statement could be made concerning the American army.

A BOY WITH A RABBIT. BY SIR J. RAEBURN

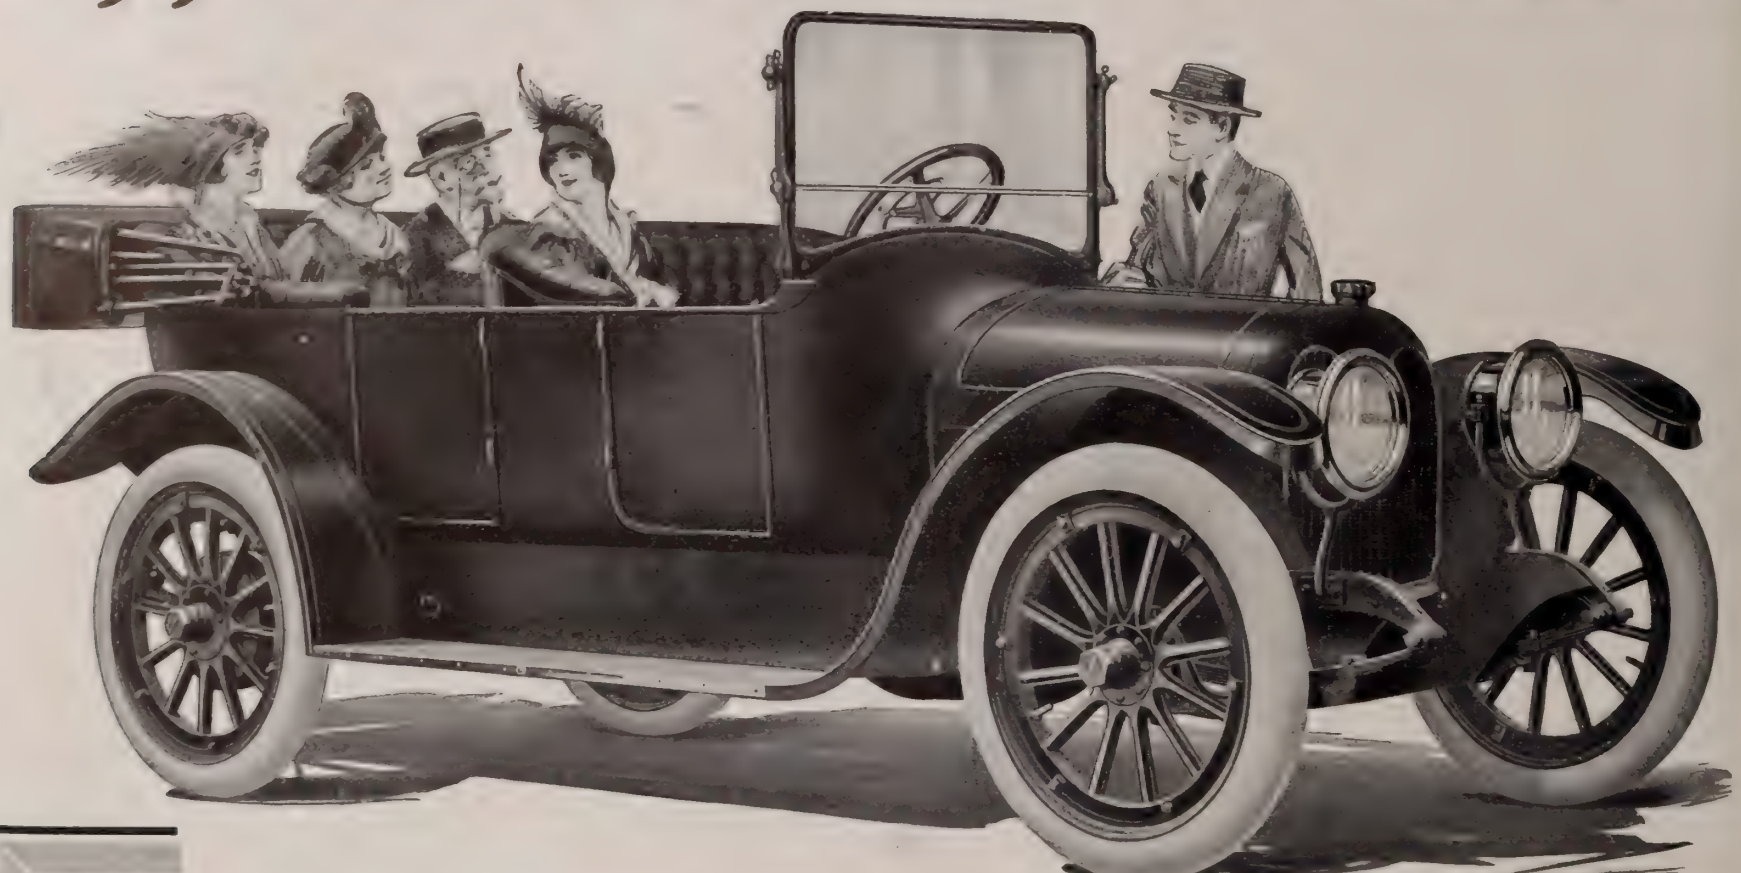
Apperson Bros.' New Models



A Five Passenger Four Cylinder Car weighing less than 2600 pounds, price $1485

A Seven Passenger Six Cylinder Car weighing less than 2790 pounds, price $1785

Elmer Apperson's Greatest Effort has been put into these two cars. His successful experience of 22 years of actual motor car manufacturing has been concentrated into these two models and the world's greatest automobile critics will find no fault with these cars. Artistically, each is a perfect unit. The stream line bodies, the wheel guards, the wind shields, the new style radiator, the tapered hood and the one-man top all go to make up a beautiful harmonious motor car expressing in its appearance distinction, elegance, great power, speed and endurance. And these cars who have investigated fully all of the up-to-date features found in modern motor cars. Elmer and Edgar Apperson have been the chief engineers in designing these models. They will personally superintend their construction. These two men finished and tested their first motor car on July 4, 1894—more than twenty years ago—and have been putting their best efforts into actual building of cars ever since, and these two models are a culmination of their greatest efforts.

Are What Men Want

95% Built in Apperson Factory

All of the mechanical parts are built (not bought) in their own factories. It has long since been found unsatisfactory for the Apperson Brothers to buy engines, axles or transmissions. Every mechanical part of the car proper is made at home from such materials as these two great engineers have decided is best for the purpose.

These Builders of High-Priced Cars who first built America's highest priced motor car (as early as 1902 they sold motor cars for $5000 and have sold models as high as $11,000) now consent to design and build beautiful models such as these at these prices. They have been five years in designing and perfecting these cars. For five years these Apperson Brothers have been testing metals, experimenting with new things, trying out engines of different designs, Sixes and Fours, and have now produced for men who want Sixes a motor equal, if not the superior, to any of the famous Apperson Motors which have won such an enviable reputation with lovers of fine motor cars.

They Also Love Fours

For men who want Fours, the 40-horsepower will appeal to them with its fine, roomy body, its 116-inch wheel base, with its 2580 pounds weight. There should be no doubt about the Four-Forty these men have built appealing to those who want a good Four. It has the sturdiness, its lines are as beautiful, its machinery as perfect, its upkeep as low as any motor car ever built.

Apperson Dealers will explain this car to you. Write for full specifications if you have no dealer near you.

There Will Be No Competition

Sixes and Fours like these cannot be designed in a season. It has taken these great engineers five years to complete and try out these models. The automobile world is clamoring for light weight and economical up-keep. Cars with such light weight and economical up-keep as these cannot be assembled from parts bought from others, hence competition with these cars must take time to design and build. They stand alone in their class.

Things Not Usually Found in Cars Selling at These Prices

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

ANTIOCH TO-DAY. ONCE A CITY OF 500,000 PEOPLE, "QUEEN OF THE MEDITERRANEAN." NOW A TOWN OF 28,000

THE BIRTHPLACE OF FOREIGN MISSIONS

SIXTH ARTICLE IN THE NEW TRAVEL SERIES

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

Founder and President of the Christian Endeavor Society

NO LESS than ten or twelve years elapsed from the time of Paul's wonderful experience on the road to Damascus and his life-giving interview with Ananias, before he was ready to start on the first of his three great missionary journeys. In the meantime he had retired into Arabia for his three years' course in the Desert University with the Master himself for his teacher. Then he had returned to his early home in Tarsus, and for four years had preached in different parts of Syria and Cilicia, enduring many tribulations, of which he writes so graphically in the eleventh chapter of II Corinthians.

During these years of preparation and practice, many Christians had settled in the great eastern capital of the Roman Empire, called Antioch. It had become a strategic center for the propagation of the Gospel. In God's good providence, it was to become the birthplace of foreign missions. Realizing this, in part at least, and understanding, though perhaps dimly, the importance of their city and their times in relation to the spread of the Gospel, the Christians sent Barnabas to Tarsus to bring Paul to their metropolis.

ONCE THE SEAPORT OF MIGHTY ANTIOCH

Little did they know what vast consequences hung upon this visit, or how God was to use the tent-maker—who had been working with his needle in Tarsus, and doubtless continued his humble occupation in Antioch—for the regeneration of the world. At this time Paul was probably at least forty-five years of age. His youthful fire had been tempered already by many experiences, glad and bitter; yet his zeal for the Gospel was in no ways deadened by the years.

It was only a long day's sail with a favoring wind from Tarsus to Seleucia, the port of Antioch, which lay in all its corrupt splendor and magnificence sixteen miles from the sea, on the banks of the River Orontes, which was navigable to that point, and which made Antioch the commercial mistress of a very large section of the world. Antioch will always be of interest to every Christian heart, for, next to Jerusalem and Nazareth and Galilee, it occupies the largest place in the later Gospel story. The history of the city goes back to the world-conqueror, Alexander the Great. Upon his death, more than three hundred years before the birth of Christ, when his vast empire was divided up among his victorious generals, Syria and all the eastern provinces fell to Seleucus Nicator, after the "Battle of the Kings" at Issus, in Phrygia. Seleucus founded the famous dynasty called after his name, which flourished for almost two centuries and a half. He is chiefly known as a great builder of cities, which, in order to perpetuate the memory of his family, he named after his relatives. He must have been a loyal son, for of the thirty-seven cities which he built, sixteen, or nearly one-half, he named Antioch after his father Antiochus. Two of these Antiochs are among the most famous in Bible history. One of these is that Antioch in Pisidia, far to the north of the Mediterranean, and not very remote from the present Constantinople. The other Antioch, and by far the most important city of its name, is the great emporium with which we have to do in this article.

Seleucia, the port of Antioch, was named after King Seleucus himself, and is mentioned in the thirteenth chapter of Acts, while Laodicea in Phrygia, which was the home of one of the seven churches to which the message of Revelation was written, was also built by Seleucus and named after his mother. Several other Laodiceas were also built by Seleucus, one of them near the Syrian Antioch. This city is now known as Latakiah, and as our steamer anchored in her roadstead, our thoughts turned to the kingly builder of cities and to his mother, who has given rise to such an opprobrious epithet, for a Laodicean was regarded with aversion and contempt as being "too good for hell, yet not good enough for heaven."

In St. Paul's time, Antioch, though it had lost its ancient glory as a center of Grecian culture and civilization, was at the height of its power as a mighty Roman capital. It contained five hundred thousand people, and was the third largest city in the Roman Empire. It stood at the gateway of the East and the West. Through its port at Seleucia it could send its products to every part of the then known world, even to far-off Britain, where the Emperor Claudius, when Paul came to Antioch, was winning his conquering way. Toward the east it had an open door through the valley of the Orontes, and its position seemed to predestine it to be a great metropolis. One can scarcely understand why at this day it has fallen into such utter decay.

When Paul entered the city of Antioch, there were doubtless many remains of the Greek rule with its magnificent art and architecture, for from east to west one of the later kings of the Greek dynasty had laid out a splendid corso with double colonnades of marble which ran for five miles in a straight line through the very heart of the city. In wet weather people could walk from end to end under cover. "Trees, flowers and fountains," we are told, "adorned the promenade, and poets sang of the beauty of the statue of Apollo and of the Nymphæum erected near the river." These things doubtless Paul saw, as well as the splendid theater and aqueducts and baths which were added by the Roman conquerors shortly before his time.

But Antioch was noted not so much for its magnificence as for its shameless corruption and immorality. The black picture is not overdrawn when we read that "licentiousness, superstition, quackery, indecency, every fierce and base passion was displayed by the populace. Their skill in coining scurrilous verses was notorious; their sordid, fickle, turbulent and insolent ways rendered Antioch a byword for all that was wicked. . . . So infamous was the grove of Daphne, five miles out of the city, filled with shrines to Apollo, Venus, Isis, etc., and crowded with theaters, baths, taverns and dancing saloons, that soldiers detected there were punished and dismissed from the imperial service. 'Daphnic morals' became a proverb. Juvenal could find no more forcible way of describing the pollutions of Rome than by saying, 'The Orontes has flowed into the Tiber.'" Into this cesspool of moral filth came the great apostle with his rigid morality, his strict sense of even the proprieties of life, and above all with the spiritual life and power which could transform night into day, and the filth of heathen corruption into the purity of Christian chastity.

Antioch, however, was not famed only for its vice and corruption, or alone for its magnificent luxuriousness and splendor. Cicero tells us that poets had spent their younger days in Antioch; the great general, Germanicus, the father of Caligula, died at Daphne near the city, and many an emperor had visited or lived in this great city of the East. Better than all for the fame of Antioch, many obscure Christians found their way thither after the death of Stephen, and through their preaching a great number of the Greeks believed. It was because of this rapid growth of the Christian population that the church in Jerusalem sent Barnabas to Antioch to shepherd the flock, and he, finding far more Christian work than he could accomplish, went to Tarsus and brought Paul thither, as we have seen. For a year they labored together, and built up a strong church of liberal-hearted Christians, who were glad to contribute of their means to the mother church in Jerusalem, and to send the money by Paul himself. Indeed, in later years, after the destruction of Jerusalem, Antioch became the true center of Christianity. Here were held in the third and fourth centuries no less than ten church councils, while in the later history of the church the Patriarch of Antioch ranked ahead of the bishops of Rome, Constantinople, Jerusalem and even Alexandria.

In these days we care little for the church councils, or for the forgotten patriarchs of Antioch; but two events stand out forever memorable in the history of the Christian Church. In this city the very name by which hundreds of millions are proud to designate themselves to-day was given to the followers of Christ—given perhaps in sport and derision in the first place, for the Antiochians were famous for their nicknames and their derisive jests. Their bitter tongues had a tang which made them notorious throughout the world, and hearing the disciples speak so much about the Christ, they could think of no better title to give them than that of Christians, the wonderful name, given in derision, which is to-day and has been for centuries the most honored title man can bear.

That this name was undoubtedly given by the heathen people of Antioch is shown by the fact that the Christians designated themselves in the early days as "Brethren," "Disciples," "Believers," "Men of the Way," etc., while the Jews called them contemptuously the "Nazarenes," remembering that according to their tradition no good thing could come out of Nazareth. But despite the irony and insolence of heathen Antioch, no better name could possibly have been chosen for the followers of the new faith.

The other event which has made Antioch forever famous is that this was the city from which Paul and Barnabas started upon their first missionary journey, and it thus became the birthplace of Christian missions throughout the world. To Antioch the apostles returned at the end of their first journey; again they set out from the same city for the second and third journeys, which were destined to carry the glad tidings to remote parts of Asia, to far-off Europe and even to Rome itself.

How are the mighty fallen! The proud city, with its half million inhabitants, has dwindled to a little town of 28,000 people, only 4,000 of whom are Christians, mostly belonging to the Greek Church. There are very few Protestants, though a vigorous mission is sustained here. The Antioch of to-day spreads itself thinly over less than one-tenth of the area of the ancient city. Its trade, which formerly sent its caravans to Babylon, Persia and India on one side, and its ships to Alexandria, to Rome, to Spain and even to Great Britain on the other, has dwindled to an insignificant business in licorice, corn and soap. A few steamers come to the ancient roadstead bringing the few goods for which the inhabitants can pay, and taking away their scanty products; but much of the time, cholera or other diseases quarantine the world against the poor little town.

Nevertheless, there are some things of interest even to-day in Antioch. Some fine columns remain, one of its ancient glory. Beautifully carved sarcophagi can be seen, one of which, from the inscriptions upon it, contained the body of a noted athlete of the second century, whose face is carved on one end. There is a statue, too, recently discovered, of an orator or poet, which reminds us of the intellectual activity of the ancient city. The most interesting remains of old Antioch lie upon the southern slope of Mount Silpius, the hill which was once covered and crowned by the ancient city. We can still follow the ancient wall and marvel at its vast length and massiveness. It takes five hours to walk around it, and in many parts it is ten and one-half feet thick.

On the return to the city from our journey around the wall, we see the remains of a rock relief, the head of which, representing a woman, is more than fourteen feet high. This was carved by command of Antiochus Epiphanes in order to ward off a threatened pestilence. The tooth of time has done its work on this huge rock statue, but its outlines can still be traced. On returning we enter the city by the site of "St. Paul's Gate," named for the obscure tent-maker, who at the call of Barnabas made his way within the walls of the ancient capital nearly nineteen hundred years ago.

MEXICO FACES A NEW ERA

THE resignation of General Victoriano Huerta, provisional president of Mexico, was presented to the Mexican Congress on the afternoon of July 15. It was accepted by a vote of 121 to 17. Francisco Carbajal, minister of foreign relations, automatically succeeded to the presidency. The city received the news with little demonstration. General Huerta remained in the city but a few hours and then left Mexico City for the coast to flee from the country. Mexico breathed a sigh of relief; Washington rejoiced; the press applied itself diligently to forecasting what must follow upon this, the most important event in the Mexican situation since the murder of President Madero, February 23, 1913.

The course of events in Mexico since the downfall of Madero has been followed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. As a new era for that country may now be opening, we will briefly review what has taken place, beginning, however, with a word regarding the quality of government inimical to that country.

FRANCISCO CARBAJAL

When in the clash of the many tribes of Indians who had found their way into that marvelous land before the time of the Crusades, the Aztecs won the supremacy, the form of government set up was that of one-man power backed by a coterie of friends held loyal by the favors at the disposal of the chieftain. This form of government under various names has continued until to-day. Cortez, who landed on Mexican soil on Good Friday, April 22, 1519, and the horde of Spanish viceroys who ruled the conquered land for three hundred years by this system, reduced the proud and free natives to a state of slavery. When, then, there sprang from among them leaders in whom the spirit of mightier days seemed reborn to lead them into "independence," those "liberators," Hidalgo, Iturbide, and the rest, also found it necessary to govern by might and not by right. Freed from the dominance of the Spaniard in 1821, and realizing anew a sense of self-government, the Mexicans were led by faction after faction in a series of revolutions, each one designed to establish a constitutional "republic." The advance in civilization made by Mexico under the rule of Diaz might be taken as justification of that form of government, but for the fact that the blessings of an enlightened republic did not fall upon the great mass of the Mexican populace. A favored few alone waxed wealthy and powerful.

In March, 1910, Francisco Madero, representing that element among the Mexicans which demands a true democracy, took open steps to oppose the ninth re-election of Diaz, who had been in power since 1876 with the exception of four years. He was thrown into prison by Diaz, escaped, recruited troops, and in May, 1911, by the capture of Juarez, forced the resignation of Diaz.

Madero was styled the "Savior of Mexico," and in October of 1911 was elected president. He was confronted by the tremendous problems of a vast ignorant population, the majority of whom lived in a state of peonage to the few great holders of land and those otherwise powerful; a huge national debt, principally payable in foreign currency; and conflicting demands from antagonistic interests for a settlement of the country on a sound economic basis. Slow to formulate his policies and exercising little of the tyranny of his predecessors, he soon faced a new revolution. In the south the insurrection by bands of brigands—unless they turn out to be patriots—took organized form under Zapata; in the north, under Vasquez Gomez. The poorly equipped federal army also revolted under General Felix Diaz and Victoriano Huerta, only a nucleus of an armed force remaining loyal. The revolution was successful, the leaders disagreed, Diaz was exiled, Madero was thrown into prison by General Huerta in February, 1913, and Huerta became president. On February 23, 1913, Francisco Madero and José Pino Suarez, his vice-president, were put to death by federal soldiers. Two days before the United States minister was assured that no such thing would occur.

Immediately the Maderists, or Constitutionalists, throughout the country, particularly in the north, declared war upon the new government. The governor of the State of Coahuila, Carranza, formed an independent government and took the field against the Federalists. Francisco Villa, or, as he is frequently called, Pancho Villa, a penniless bandit, rapidly rose to a position of power in the Constitutionalist army, and became the commanding general of its forces in the north, which thus far has been the real seat of the war. The situation was made more acute by the decision of President Wilson not to recognize the government of General Huerta, or any government brought about by him, on the ground that Huerta had come into power through treachery and assassination. The policy was announced after careful inquiry by the President, who came into office less than two weeks after the death of Madero. From this point we will review the course of events by giving the principal events only:

In August, Henry Lane Wilson resigned as minister to Mexico, owing to the President's dissatisfaction with his attitude concerning the Huerta government, and ex-Governor of Minnesota John Lind was sent as President Wilson's personal representative to Mexico. August 20, General Huerta rejected the proposals made by Mr. Lind looking to the establishment of a legally created government. August 27, President Wilson took the extraordinary course of addressing Congress, advising that body that Huerta, through his foreign minister, Gamboa, had rejected the American proposals. September 16, Huerta, unawed by the American frown, announced his hope for an amicable adjustment of matters and suggested that there be no renewal of the permit to American warships to remain in Mexico after October. October 10, Huerta suspended the Mexican Congress, imprisoned 110 members, and assumed dictatorship. The United States advised other nations that this government would not recognize the Mexican election of October 26. October 26, the Mexican election proved a farce, and Huerta continued in office. October 28, General Felix Diaz resigned as army officer and fled from Mexico. October 29, Secretary of State Bryan was said to expect concerted action by the Powers to establish a government in Mexico. Rumors prevailed of an ultimatum from the United States to Huerta. November 14, John Lind filed a protest with Huerta amounting to an ultimatum, against convening the new congress elected October 26. No attention being given to his note, Lind left Mexico City for Vera Cruz. November 15, the Mexican Congress convened, and Huerta reasserted his determination to remain in office. Americans were warned by Washington to leave Mexico. A series of successes of the Constitutionalists in battle under General Villa excited attention. November 17 and onward Americans left Mexico City or other interior points for seaports. President Wilson sent Dr. William Blair Hale as his agent to Carranza. November 25, Villa took Juarez after a tremendous battle. The cry of "On to Mexico City" then became the slogan of the Constitutionalists.

December 2, General Villa prepared for his southern advance. President Wilson declared that there could be no certainty of peace until General Huerta had surrendered his usurped authority in Mexico. Much discussion of intervention by the United States began. December 4, a great caravan of Federal sympathizers fled across the State of Chihuahua to the border town of Ojinaga, arriving December 7. December 9, Mexican Congress annulled the October election, and declared Huerta president, pending new election called for first Sunday in July. December 11, rebel assault upon Tampico begun, repulsed on 14th. December 22, Huerta declared ten-day bank holiday to avoid panic. December 29, rebel assault upon Ojinaga was begun. January 5, the assault repulsed. January 10 and 11, Villa took Ojinaga, and great numbers of the inhabitants fled across the Rio Grande and were organized into a refugee camp by the United States

IRISH HOME RULE MEANS WAR

BY S. S. McCLURE

[Mr. S. S. McClure, founder of the publishing house of that name, is a native of County Antrim, Province of Ulster, Ireland. He has been spending some time on his native soil, studying the conditions that have been produced by the apparent imminence of the royal enactment of the Irish Home Rule Bill into law. Appreciating the value of an opinion upon the situation from a man of Mr. McClure's trained powers of observation and wide knowledge of public affairs, we invited him to give our readers his views, and on the 16th of July received by cable the following article.—THE EDITOR.]

I HAVE passed four weeks in seven counties of Ulster and also interviewed many serious and well-informed home rulers in other parts of Ireland. In Ulster I have actually lived with farmers, tradesmen and professional men of both sides and have seen many military drills of up to three thousand men in sham battles on both sides.

The factions are sincere in their beliefs and determined in their actions. Ulster is extraordinarily well organized and has been placed on a war footing which is under stabler management than most governments. The people are calm and serious. They dislike war, but will fight unless Ulster or nearly all of Ulster is permitted to remain as at present.

Their sense of nationality as a part of the United Kingdom is absolutely dominating at all times. While I saw the leaders I passed nearly all of my time with the common people. They are absolutely determined. No argument affects them and no change on the part of Carson or others would influence them. I saw very little religious bigotry. I believe both sides fear too much, but the Protestants of Ulster are sure in their minds that Home Rule government would partake of the characteristics of Tammany Hall, involving crushing taxation, which would fall heaviest on Ulster.

The Home Rulers demand local government so as to reduce the cost of government, to increase its efficiency and to procure needed legislation for harbor and other improvements. Ulster fears Home Rule in the belief that badly conceived laws are conducive to the waste of public funds and that corrupt management would lead to general impoverishment.

Ireland is prosperous. There is very little crime and no poverty in the North outside of the principal cities. Resistance up to the point of absolute war is inevitable if the Protestant farmers, shopkeepers and others of Ulster are brought under Home Rule. The laws are now identical throughout Ireland.

SIR EDWARD CARSON,
Ulster Leader

Each side to the controversy fears it will misunderstand the other. I found good feeling between Protestant and Catholic neighbors. The newspapers of Ireland and England magnify and exploit the distrust and suspicion on both sides. It would seem best if Ireland were divided into two states, as we understand such political subdivision in our country, letting each one have the right of local self-government, or to determine its government like the American States.

The sense of nationality is more powerful than religious feeling and is equally strong on both sides, Irish nationality on one side and citizenship in the United Kingdom on the other.

I never before saw such elevated, sincere patriotism as is exhibited by the Home Rulers on one side and the Ulster Protestants on the other. It has the solemn quality of a great moral uplift. In the South as well as in the North of Ireland one gets no true conception of the controversy from the partisan press. It is comparable to the intense patriotism of the North and South at the time of our Civil War.

Mr. McClure's article was sent four days after the anniversary of the battle of the Boyne, Sunday, July 12. The public order which marked the day in Belfast and throughout Ulster was interpreted by some as indicative of a spirit of non-resistance, which, it is quite clear from the above, is erroneous.

The day preceding the anniversary Sir Edward Carson reviewed the Ulster volunteers and addressed them in language which, according to the reports, made his hearers feel that war was near at hand. Nearly one hundred thousand dollars has been pledged in America for the support of the Irish National volunteers, in response to a call for aid based on a genuine belief that civil strife in Ireland is a most serious possibility. The amending bill in the House of Lords passed the third reading on July 14, and was sent to the House of Commons for consideration. The controlling motive behind this proposed legislation exempting Ulster from the operation of the Home Rule Act, is to avert civil war, and was so acknowledged in the speeches.

MEXICO FACES A NEW ERA

Army. Mexican finances reported in bad shape. Foreign Powers sought to learn the intentions of the United States Government. January 30, general movement of rebels to invest Torreon began.

February 3, President Wilson removed the embargo on arms and munitions of war at the Mexican border. February 5, Mazatlan on the Pacific Coast was taken by the rebels. February 20, news of execution of British subject, W. S. Benton, by Villa was received, causing much excitement. Villa's star seemed about to descend. March 23, the assault upon Torreon was begun. April 1, Mexican Congress convened. April 9 occurred the flag incident at Tampico, when a boat's crew from a United States warship was arrested and temporarily detained. Demands upon Huerta for apology and salute to the flag ignored. April 20, President Wilson addressed Congress, asking approval for use of armed forces to compel the apology and salute. April 21, American sailors and marines took Vera Cruz. April 23, O'Shaughnessy at Mexico City and Algara at Washington received their passports. April 24, General Funston with Fifth Brigade of Infantry sailed for Vera Cruz. April 25, Argentina, Brazil and Chile proposed a peace mediation between the United States and Mexico. May 11, memorial services held in New York on arrival of bodies of men who fell at Vera Cruz. May 13, rebels took Tampico. May 20, the mediators convened at Niagara Falls, Canada, and on the 27th announced agreement upon a general plan for settlement of Mexico, involving elimination of Huerta and the election of a government favorable to the Constitutionalists.

From this point until the definite announcement of the resignation of General Huerta, no events of first importance took place, excepting the capture of Zacatecas and of Guadalajara by the rebels.

The fixed unwillingness of General Carranza to recognize the peace mediation or to deal with Huerta through the mediation of the United States tended to prevent the conclusion of a general peace treaty. There have been many rumors of the imminent resignation and flight of Huerta. Uncertainty has possessed the public mind. Hopes of a peaceful solution of the trouble between Mexico and the United States and in the internal affairs of Mexico have fluctuated. For the few days immediately preceding July 15, rumors of Huerta's resignation grew more positive. The actual departure of his immediate family and members of his official household was reported. The movements of a German and an English vessel lent color to the report that Huerta would secretly leave Mexico City to embark on one of these ships at Puerto Mexico. It was alleged and continues to be that he has sent abroad several million dollars. When the press definitely reported the formal resignation and flight of Huerta and the swearing in of his successor, Carbajal, the public could not avoid a moment of skepticism.

The scene in Mexico City was not without its dramatic qualities. The provisional president had passed through cheering lanes of people on his way, under military escort, to the national palace. The galleries of the Chamber of Deputies were filled by the public. The letter of abdication was read by the secretary of the Chamber. Up until that moment no one had been certain that Huerta would actually resign the reins of government. The secretary read amid a profound hush. The press report of the resignation contains this conclusion: "In conclusion I will say that I abandon the presidency of the republic, carrying with me the highest sum of human wealth, for I declare I have arraigned at the bar of universal conscience the honor of a Puritan, whom I, as a gentleman, challenge to wrest from me that possession. May God bless you and me."

The reading of this document was greeted by shouts of "Viva Huerta!" It was referred to a committee, who presently recommended the acceptance of the resignation and the selection of Carbajal to assume the provisional presidency. Members of Huerta's Cabinet also resigned their posts.

General Huerta retired from the palace, and the new president, when he appeared to take the oath of office, was greeted with the national hymn played by the military band and by double files of troops. Suppressed excitement was evident throughout the city for a short time. The crisis through which Mexico has just passed did not appear to greatly impress the public.

Under the protection of picked troops, who guarded the route from his home to the railroad station, Huerta, with General Blanquet, took his departure in secret for the seaport to which his family had already preceded him, there to take leave of the country over which he has ruled for fifteen months under conditions probably unparalleled in history.

The chief interest now centers upon Provisional President Carbajal. True to his policy, President Wilson will not recognize the new president. Carranza has announced that nothing short of complete surrender to the Constitutionalists will be considered by him.

A FAIR QUESTION

A SERMON

BY

[illegible] Lord, to whom shall we go? Simon Peter answered him, Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life." John 6:66, 68

IT WAS toward the close of the second year of our Lord's ministry that his popularity began to decline. Up to that time the people had followed him in multitudes to see his wonderful works and to hear his wonderful preaching, of which it was said, "Never man spake like this man." On his itineraries among the villages of Galilee the sick were brought out and laid on couches along the way and he healed them all. By the miracle of the loaves he fed five thousand people who thronged after him.

So far all went well; but just then he committed what clever time-servers would regard as a great blunder. He preached a sermon full of "hard sayings"; a sermon in which he spoke of himself as the long-looked-for Christ, who had come into the world to save men from the shame and power and penalty of sin. He thus interpreted the miracle of the loaves: "I am the bread of life. He that cometh to me shall never hunger. Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness and are dead: this is the bread that cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof and not die. Verily, verily, I say unto you, except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day. As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father, so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me." Some of those who had called themselves his disciples said, "This is an hard saying, who can hear it?" How easily he could have modified it; but he did not. He gave them something harder to think of: "Doth this offend you? What if ye shall see the Son of Man ascend up to where he was before?" This was too much. The people began to leave him. There they go! There is a note of pathos in the words of Jesus addressed to the twelve: "Will ye also go away?" And there is a corresponding note of loyalty in the words of Peter: "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life!"

Those Who Stay

There are three classes of people in the world. First, those who have cast their lot with Christ and propose to stand with him. Second, those who have professed Christ with a reservation: claiming the right to determine for themselves whether or no he was what he claimed to be, and whether his teachings are to be received at their face value or not. These so-called Christians are held by so slight a tenure that under any temptation they are likely to forsake him. And third, those who know little about Christ or his teachings and seem to care less.

It devolves upon us, each for himself, to find his place in this classification. In any case, however, we are all concerned in the problems which have to do with spiritual and eternal life. In view of that fact the question of Peter is a fair one: If we leave Christ, "To whom shall we go?"

It is a fair question on the lips of those who profess Christ and mean to be loyal to him. Why have they cast in their fortunes with him?

Is it for the loaves and fishes? If that were all he would not disappoint them. It is a true saying, "Godliness is profitable for all things, having promise of the life that now is and of that which is to come." The words of David are in evidence, "I have been young and now am old, yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken nor his seed begging bread." A man converted to Christ is put in the way of an honest livelihood. Not often will you see him going over the hills to the poorhouse. The best-to-do people in the world are those whose lives are hid with Christ in God.

But the life is more than meat and the body is more than raiment. The Lord said, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness and all these things shall be added unto you." The all-sufficient portion of the Christian, however, is not to be found in "these things" but righteousness in the kingdom of God. He comes to Christ for spiritual and eternal life and these he finds in Christ. Christ said, "I am come that ye might have life and that ye might have it more abundantly." And again, "I am the way, the truth and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me."

An essential part of this higher life is truth; and Christ is truth. He not only teaches truth; he said, "I am the truth." In his words we find a solution of all the problems of life. In him life and immortality are brought to light. His teaching is therefore received without demur by all who truly follow him. He sits as their Judge in the Court of Final Appeal. To all that he says respecting God and himself and the inspired Word they instantly respond, "Yea and amen." Their minds are at rest in him.

This life means also righteousness. An intellectual apprehension of truth is of little or no value. A creed written on parchment has no practical relation to life. The only creed worth having is the one that goes about on two tireless feet, sees the world's needs with two clear eyes and stretches out two eager hands to help it. This is the meaning of that wonderful parable of the Living Bread. The bread which we eat to satisfy our bodily needs is no better than so much chaff unless it is so assimilated as to become nerve and sinew and bone and physical health. Christ is to be apprehended by faith in like manner, so that our intellectual faith shall enter into heart and conscience and will, so being transmuted into all the graces that make character. This is to realize the mystical union of the believer with Christ. So intimate is this relation that his life is said to be "hid with Christ in God."

And the consummation of this life is salvation. Not a salvation afar off but here and now. "He that believeth in the Son hath everlasting life." A true Christian is so reconciled to God by the expiation of the Cross that he is as safe at this moment as if his feet had already crossed the threshold of the Celestial City. But this is only the beginning of it. There is a "salvation ready to be revealed in the last time" a great salvation that means perfection in the likeness of Christ. This is the salvation which we are exhorted to "work out with fear and trembling, because it is God that worketh in us." This working out is under the influence of the Holy Spirit and by means of the truth as revealed in the Word of God. It is the business of a lifetime and its ultimate attainment is the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. As it is written: "I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness"; and again, "we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is."

This is why all true Christians propose to be loyal to Christ. In spite of the conflicting winds of controversy and voices calling them into all manner of by-ways they cannot leave him. He only hath the word of eternal life. For life we came to him; and we cannot forsake him for the good and sufficient reason that we would not know where else to find it.

Looking Elsewhere for Life

But how about those who are going away? There are always some who stumble at his hard sayings and are offended by the hill-climbing involved in the Christian life. Just now there is a falling away on the part of some preachers who take liberties with his doctrine and part company with him by reason of his claim to be the only begotten and co-equal Son of God. And, unfortunately, there are many people who go trooping after them. They call themselves "Christians" still. But what's in a name? The test of Christian profession is loyalty to Christ. If these professors had been true Christians they could not have gone away from him. He said, "My sheep hear my voice, and they follow me." But these refuse either to hear his voice or follow him. It is a fair question to ask of them, inasmuch as they have abandoned Christ while still cherishing the desire for life, where will they go to find it?

Will they go to the scientists? Science has nothing to do with the spiritual life. It deals only with facts which can be verified by the evidence of the five physical senses. It can discern nothing beyond the narrow horizon of time. "Spiritual things are spiritually discerned"; not by the physical senses but by faith, which is our sixth sense. The scientists have confessedly nothing to do with this. They offer no answer to the great question, "What shall I do that I might inherit eternal life?"

Will they go to the philosophers? You will find among modern philosophers no more illustrious name than that of Herbert Spencer, who defines life as a definite combination of heterogeneous changes, both simultaneous and successive, in correspondence with external coexistence and sequences. These are high-sounding words; but how do they help you? Put over against them the definition of life given in the sacerdotal prayer of Christ: "This is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." By this we are given to understand that life is godliness, and that it is attained by faith in Christ, who came into the world to bring us into harmony with God. This is simplicity itself: yet it far transcends the wisdom of man. Why not, since "the wisdom of man is foolishness with God"?

Or, failing to find life in science and philosophy will they fall in with infidelity as a last resort? It is related of David Hume that, having induced his mother to follow him out into the dreary wilderness of unbelief where his intellectual pride had led him, he was summoned to her death-bed: and her farewell words were these: "You have taken away my faith in God, my confidence in his Word, my hope of salvation through his Son; and now on the borderline of eternity, what can you offer to help me?" What could he give her? Nothing! In one of the lectures of Robert Ingersoll, who led multitudes away from Christ, he said frankly, "I am like a man adrift on a raft, without rudder or compass. I know not whence I came or whither I go."

But if science cannot help the man who has forsaken Christ; if philosophy is silent; if infidelity mocks his despair, where else shall he go?

What Christ Has to Give

It remains to speak of the indifferent. As Jesus passed through the villages of Galilee there were many who stood in the doorways of their bazaars or looked out of their windows. On hearing the footfall of the multitude and learning that Jesus of Nazareth was passing by, they turned away to their tasks and thought no more of it. There are many such in these days. They need life: deep down in their inmost hearts they know it. They have the instinct of God, the sense of rightness, and those intimations of immortality which are common to all men. The voices of Memory accuse them of sin and the voices of Hope exhort them to better things; but alas, they are too busy to pause and consider. For these there are four imperative calls.

One is the call of Life. We are all under bonds to meet the grave responsibilities that are thrust upon us every hour of every day.

Another is the call of Death. The black camel kneels at every gate, but men refuse to think of it.

Another is the call to Judgment. "The trumpet sounds, the graves restore the dead whom they contained before; prepare, my soul, to meet him!" It is not the part of a man but of an ostrich to hide its head in the sand as the pursuer draws near.

The final call is that of Christ. "Come unto me and I will give you rest. I will give you peace amid the vicissitudes of life; I will give you comfort in sorrow; I will give you a rod and staff to lean upon when you pass through the Valley of the Shadow; I will give you a writ of innocence at the judgment bar of God!"

Do you care for these? Or are you still indifferent? It is high time to awake out of sleep! "If thou hast run with the footmen and they have wearied thee, how canst thou contend with horses? If thou hast been unsatisfied in the land of thy peace what wilt thou do in the swelling of Jordan?" In the final daybreak, when all things shall appear in their right relations, what shall it profit you if you have gained everything else and lost life? If the door of the Father's house be closed, where shall the homeless go?

I speak to many who once heard the invitation of Christ and ran to him like the Pilgrim who, fleeing from the City of Destruction, thrust his fingers into his ears to shut out all distracting voices and ran on crying, "Life, life, eternal life!" In Christ they have found that life; and what now shall separate them from him? He is their Priest, their Prophet,

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, August 2. Matthew 11: 25, 26. "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father: for so it seemed good in thy sight." The grief that burst from the lips of our Lord in his denunciation of the Galilean cities was not the disappointment of one who has been thwarted in his ambition. For in the midst of this awful discourse Jesus is suddenly seized with a profound joy. The Spirit stirs him to turn to the Father, who has sent him upon his mission to the men on this earth, and to acknowledge with serene satisfaction the unsearchable ways of God with the children of men. The wisdom and prudence of men—noble endowments in themselves—become a wall, by the operation of sin in man, through which the light of the truth and grace of the Redeemer's teaching do not penetrate. What of it? So it hath seemed good in the sight of the Father. His will is done, though men fail to appreciate the love that is come to them out of heaven. And what of it, if it is mostly simple, weak and lowly people that throng the gates of the kingdom? "Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight." In building up his kingdom, God can dispense with all that seems great and noble to men, and can create out of despised materials, yea, out of nothing, that wonderful temple which he fills with his glory, the holy Christian Church. This utterance of our Lord shows his consummate submission to God. It humbles the pride of the worldly wise; it lifts up admiringly the simplicity of childlike trust in the word of Jesus.

MONDAY, August 3. Mathew 11: 27. "All things are delivered unto me of my Father: and no man knoweth the Son, but the Father; and neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him." The issues of Christ's ministry are in the hands of the Father. He knows, as no other being does, the very heart of the Father; and the Father knows, as no other being does, the very heart of the Son. By a direct knowledge flowing from that intimate relationship which exists between them they understand each other's purposes in regard to the salvation of lost mankind. This knowledge the Son came on earth to reveal to men. As the Father gives Christ his hearers and believers and followers, so Christ has known from the beginning of his ministry that it would be. He is indeed right in denouncing, for their unbelief, the cities on which his grace had been vainly lavished; for God earnestly wants those cities to turn to his Son. He has not by fatal decree shut them out from his mercy. Their refusal of God's grace is a guilty act. Despite the unbelief of men, Christ will go right on with his saving work.

TUESDAY, August 4. Matthew 11: 28. "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Here we have the remarkable conclusion of the sermon that commenced with the denunciation of the Galilean cities. In a sweet and tender call of infinite compassion the oration ends, that began in such stern tones. With pitying affection Jesus looks abroad in the world of human beings, and beholds their labor and sorrow. It is not only their physical toil and burden-bearing that touches his heart; for labor in itself is divine; but it is the travail of soul and spirit in men, the restless striving for rest and peace within, the bearing of burdens that oppress the conscience, the futile efforts of paganism and of the degenerated Jewish religion to gain the favor of God, that rouses the sympathy of Christ. To the restless, peaceless, comfortless millions of toilers in a hopeless effort to acquit themselves acceptably before God, Jesus proclaims himself as the giver of rest. Thorwaldsen's statue of the Christus Consolator has become inseparably associated with this text in the memory of all who have seen it. The extended arms of pity, reaching out for the conscience-stricken, the disappointed, the despairing, those who have been cruelly cheated in their religious aspiration and hopes, beckon them all to come and take out of his hand the rest and peace which believers gain who accept him as their ransom from sin and death.

WEDNESDAY, August 5. Matthew 11: 29, 30. "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light." The rest which Christ gives is not the immoral rest of idleness and sloth. "I must work," "I must be about my Father's business," he declared concerning himself. "Let your light so shine, that men may see your good works," he demands of his followers. There is work in his companionship for every one that joins him. There is a yoke and a burden that comes with true discipleship. Not only does every Christian bear the common burden of service in the vineyard of the Master according to his station, calling, and gifts of grace; not only does every Christian bear the restraints which consistent discipleship imposes on the old flesh, but Christians bear besides each other's burdens. All this service, however, is performed under entirely different conditions than before they became Christians. With the peace of the divine forgiveness in their hearts, the specters that haunted their lonely hours gone, their dumb resignation of despair supplanted by a new hope, they address themselves gladly to every task which the Lord proposes. They do, or omit to do, and they suffer as he wills, all the time looking unto Jesus, their great Teacher. His inspiring example, unsurpassedly great in its lowliness and meekness, is before them in all conditions, and with his grace in their hearts they feel no yoke and no burden, but say with the beloved disciple: "This is the love of God, that we keep his commandments, and his commandments are not grievous."

THURSDAY, August 6. Luke 7: 40. "Simon, I have somewhat to say unto thee." These words, quietly spoken at a banquet given in honor of Jesus by a rich Pharisee, have a courteous ring. Jesus was not a man of formalities, but he always acted and spoke with becoming propriety. It was a tense moment of silence at that social gathering, that was broken by this remark of the guest of honor to his highly respectable host. A woman in the city who was a sinner had come into the room and had begun to show a pardoned sinner's affection for the Saviour. The company was shocked, the host believed himself scandalized; for Jesus permitted the homage which a penitent heart was paying him, utterly oblivious of her surroundings at the time. Simon had thought he had invited a prophet to grace his board on this occasion. He now concludes that he has been deluded into believing Jesus a prophet; for if he were such, he would have known the character of the woman and spurned her. That was Simon's idea of what a real prophet, a real church member, and a real gentleman would do under the circumstances. Jesus' remark rouses him from his disgusted musings, and a moment later Simon knows that he has a prophet indeed sitting at his side. Jesus has read the unspoken thoughts of Simon, and now proceeds to answer them as the prophet of mercy.

FRIDAY, August 7. Luke 7: 41-53. "There was a certain creditor which had two debtors: the one owed five hundred pence, and the other fifty. And when they had nothing to pay he frankly forgave them both. Tell me, therefore, which of them will love him most? . . . Thou hast rightly judged." Probably Simon and most of his guests when beholding the actions of the woman of the city had also thought of love, of that forbidden love which pollutes and curses its victims. Love indeed there was expressed by what the woman did, but it was no longer that which had formerly ruled her and which really does not deserve the name of love. On this occasion her heart was purer than that of her observers and critics. They all misunderstood and misjudged her. They were not qualified to comprehend the dutifulness and the beauty of her action. Only One there was who understood her, and knew that she was publicly confessing him her Redeemer. He in turn confesses her before that select company as one of his redeemed. He does this by the beautiful parable of the forgiven debtors. By this direct question to Simon, he forces his host to go on record as to what would be a correct action under given circumstances. Our human love is in any case but a feeble response to the great love which has canceled all our guilt with the blood of Jesus. But even this feeble love of ours can adopt surprising ways of manifesting its feelings. In the instance of this woman it breaks through all the artificial rules of etiquette, the unwritten laws of society, to express its ardor and devotion. Often men condemn such actions as that of this penitent woman as a spectacular exhibition of the divine mercy that should be contemplated privately. While it is true that we must never become sensational in our devotions, it is not right, on the other hand, to quench the spirit. God, who understands every motive of our action, will see that we are defended against unjust criticism whenever that is necessary.

SATURDAY, August 8. Luke 7: 44, 47. "Seest thou this woman? . . . Her sins, which were many, are forgiven; for she loved much: but to whom little is forgiven, the same loveth little." The episode at Simon's table assumes a larger meaning through the peculiar turn which the Lord gives the application of the parable of the debtors. Of course, this turn had been foreshadowed by the fact that the Lord had assumed two debtors. Still, a hasty reader of this account might think that the Lord had fully made the point he intended to make by showing that the degree to which this reclaimed woman was indebted to him justified the public expression of her ardent devotion. But Jesus makes Simon sit up with amazement by telling him that he is the other debtor. How had he treated his invited Guest? It appears that, with pharisaical exactness, the minimum of social decorum had been observed in the treatment accorded to Jesus, but there had not been even the pretense of any cordiality. This Pharisee had meant to honor himself, not Jesus, at this banquet. The great Jesus was to be the great table ornament at this social affair. Respectable Jewish society had stooped to receive the Nazarene, and incidentally to add a little to its halo of sanctity by associating with a popular preacher. Great condescension! Jesus turns the tables and makes these holy frauds see that the one who has stooped and condescended on this occasion is himself. The parable of the two debtors is an X-ray treatment for conceit. These holy sinners are made to see that Jesus understands them, and after this they, too, understand him.

heir King. His teaching solves all problems and is life is the solution of the mystery of life.

I came to Jesus, and I drank
Of that life-giving stream;
My thirst was quenched, my soul revived,
And now I live in him.

I live in him! He is my treasure-trove. Take his love out of my life and you leave me in a sunless world. Sun, moon and stars have all gone out! No Gospel, no manger, no cross, no open sepulcher, no Golden Rule, no sacerdotal prayer, no vision of the Father's house, no knitting severed friendships up, nothing to make life worth living here, and no hope of the eternal life!

Ah, no; blessed Lord and Master, we will not go away from thee.

To whom could we go? Thou only hast the words of eternal life.

Income Tax Swells Treasury

THE total income tax paid by corporations and individuals the ten months of the fiscal year ending June 30 amounts to $76,000,222, all collected with comparatively little trouble—to treasury officials. Complete returns by districts are not yet available; June 30 the figures for five districts stood as follows: New York City, $19,824,000; Chicago, $5,751,000; Philadelphia, $4,865,000; Boston, $3,704,000; Pittsburg, $1,084,000. For the full calendar year 1914, the income tax is estimated at not less than one hundred million.

Death Depletes Supreme Court

ASSOCIATE Justice of the Supreme Court Horace Harmon Lurton died July 12 at Atlantic City, N. J. Justice Lurton was born in Newport, Ky., February 26, 1844. He served on the Confederate side in the Civil War, and became sergeant major of the Fifth Tennessee. He was twice taken prisoner. After the war he took up the practice of law, and was called to fill different posts of importance, being chief justice of the Supreme Court of Tennessee at one time and circuit judge of the Sixth Judicial Circuit of the United States with William Howard Taft, who, when he became President, appointed Judge Lurton to the Supreme Court in 1909, the fourth ex-Confederate soldier to become a member of that body. Justice Lurton was an Episcopalian; he married Miss Mary Frances of Tennessee, and two of their four children survive him.

Mutinous Prisoners Sing Hymns

A PRISON revolt that threatened to become serious was witnessed in New York on the 10th and 12th of July, when the 1,400 prisoners in Blackwell's Island Penitentiary made a demonstration against the warden and his methods, a considerable number offering open defiance to the keepers, assaulting them from tiers and elsewhere with iron buckets and anything that came to hand. Commissioner of Correction Katherine B. Davis went in person to the scene and listened to the complaints of several inmates. She assured the prison population that order would be maintained even if it became necessary to call out the militia. She showed herself a well-wisher to the men, however, and, while upholding the warden, promised to better the conditions that prevail. The commissioner preached to the men at the Sunday services, and the mutiny ended in a sort of camp-meeting with all the prisoners singing hymns and manifesting a genuine intention to preserve order and wait patiently for needed reforms. One of the most serious evils discovered in the prison was the practice of smuggling cocaine and other drugs to the prisoners.

Railroad System in Disgrace

THE Interstate Commerce Commission, which has been making a searching inquiry into the financial transactions of the New Haven Railroad, has submitted a report which accuses the management of "one of the most glaring instances of maladministration in all the history of America." A loss to stockholders aggregating $65,000,000 is alleged, due to gross dereliction of duty and breach of trust, dating largely from the accession of the Mellen-Morgan-Rockefeller management. Civil and criminal prosecution of the directors was recommended, and the prosecution of others concerned in the mishandling of stocks. The Federal Department of Justice offered terms of dissolution to the road in the interest of the public, and pending an agreement by which the various railroads and steamship companies affected by the New Haven management may become independent and the affairs of the latter road straightened out, Attorney General McReynolds will not proceed with criminal prosecution.

Successful Vocational Training

THE vocational training of school children that is being tried out by Massachusetts has elicited a report by the United States Bureau of Education, which pronounces the plan a success both educationally and economically. The State legislature provided that a vocational agricultural school could be established by any town or city or group of towns, and as departments in high schools, the instruction to be given by especially qualified teachers. The plan requires students to spend part of their time in productive farm work, preferably at home, and the tasks assigned are called farm projects. The co-operation of parents is an important factor. Students who have tried the work are reported as enthusiastic in its praise.

Federal Reserve Troubles

TWO of the President's nominees for the Federal Reserve Board, Paul M. Warburg, of New York, and Thomas Jones, of Chicago, have brought the Senate into a conflict with the President, the former by his refusal to submit himself to examination by the Committee on Banking and Currency, the latter by his statements before that committee, which, according to the press, seem likely to insure his rejection by the Senate. Pressure has been brought to bear upon Mr. Warburg from all sides to induce him to recall his letter to the President withdrawing his name from consideration. The situation is a delicate one, and the completion of the board, for which the inauguration of the new system must wait, is prevented.

Haiti Had Better Look Out

THE internal troubles of Haiti have brought that small republic into disfavor with European Powers, who threaten to take possession of the custom houses to secure payment of obligations, a course which the Washington administration may not approve. American warships are already in Haitian waters, and interesting developments may be expected unless Haiti and the United States can find a way between them to satisfy these distressed creditors.

Attacking the Problem of Flight

IT NOW looks as if the flight of the Wanamaker airboat across the Atlantic may be postponed until October, the British navy lieutenant, J. C. Porte, who is to pilot the ship, not being satisfied with its performances. The fact that a German aviator, Reinhold Boehm, remained aloft for 24 hours and 12 minutes July 11 in an Aviatik biplane encourages confidence in the possibility of a trans-Atlantic flight. July 14, Heinrich Oelerich, at Leipsic, beat the record for altitude established five days before by Otto Linnekogel (21,654 feet) by rising to 24,606 feet. When Paris celebrated the fall of the Bastile, July 14, by a brilliant military review of all the garrisons in France, four hundred airplanes rose simultaneously over different parts of the country; twenty-four abreast, rose above the reviewing field and flew at full speed past the President. The Senate ratified a military budget of $280,000,000 already voted by the Chamber.

To Sit at the Feet of Europe

THIRSTING for practical knowledge concerning railway terminals, handling of city freight, municipal financing and kindred subjects, Chicago has sent a commission of prominent railway men, politicians and educators, Mrs. Ella Flagg Young and Mrs. Gertrude Howe Britton going along as guests, to visit the chief European cities and study their railway facilities and other improvements. The enormous railway traffic to and through Chicago has created a civic problem that only such an extensive investigation is adequate to solve. One-third of the country's railway mileage touches Chicago, six terminals clustered in the most congested district, all of them outgrown, and to the $70,000,000 union station soon to be built will have to be added four other terminals to take care of the traffic.

Plucking Board Under Fire

A TEMPEST has been stirred up in the Navy Department by criticism of the board charged with the unpleasant duty of arbitrarily retiring a fixed number of officers each year. It is charged that in order to complete the required number the "plucking" board, as it is irreverently called, has retired men whose services can be ill spared from the navy. Dissatisfaction with the situation is of long standing, and now has taken the form of an attempt to have some of the retired officers reinstated, among them Captain John H. Gibbons, who served at Vera Cruz; Captain P. M. Potts, and Commodore T. E. DeWitt Veeder. The Naval Committees of the Senate and House have already voted to recommend that Captain Potts be reinstated.

New York's Anarchist Outbreak

AS AN aftermath of the bomb tragedy in New York by which three anarchists and one woman lost their lives July 4, the space before the speaker's stand at Union Square was packed to its capacity, July 11, while well-known I. W. W. speakers eulogized the three dead anarchists, many revolutionary mottoes being displayed. The expectation of some wild outbreak and perhaps a gigantic riot was completely disappointed, the police arrangements to preserve order being perfect. On the Sunday following, the ashes of the three men, enclosed in a cement pyramid in the rear yard of the home of an anarchist magazine, were the Mecca of another large crowd. Efforts to hold a spectacular funeral parade in the streets of New York prior to the Union Square demonstration were discouraged by the police to prevent rioting.

SALVATIONISTS AMAZE LONDON

Our correspondent at the Salvation Army Congress of Nations adds a few special touches to the story which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, July 8.

THE demonstration of the world-wide work of the Salvation Army certainly worked up London, England. Once in ten years the Salvation Army calls its leaders together from the ends of the earth for conference. This was the third decennial congress. The grand army, numbering four thousand delegates from all parts of the world, assembled on the Embankment, London, England, June 13, and marched to Hyde Park. An anti-Christian orator jeered, and said: "I would like to see you get ten people to follow you in a procession." Whatever may be the theological significance, 11,000 people marched to the park. By a happy thought, the first section was an everyday body of hard-working troops from East London. Poor people, without uniforms, a touching picture of the army's real work. Then came a fine piece of pageantry—Commander Eva Booth on horseback at the head of the American contingent, the men very military looking in their red wide-awake cowboy hats and shoulder straps of red, white and blue. The women were in gray, with red sashes and bonnet bands. All these were preceded by a clump of flags, surmounted by glittering American eagles.

The appearance at the first great meeting of a dozen old men and women who were attached to the Christian Mission in Whitechapel, East London, was very grotesque. They fairly danced on the platform, headed by a gray-haired fiddler, and with waving umbrellas and hats sang an army tune of thirty years ago. The army called some of the days of the congress "Days with God." A meeting of the "Trophies" was one of the most interesting held at the Strand Hall. The general announced that there were five or six hundred "trophies" present who would tell their story. Fifty ex-burglars were among these trophies. The grand review at the Crystal Palace was the great spectacular event. It was reckoned that nearly fifty thousand Salvationists were present. Two hundred bands, with four thousand instruments, were playing throughout the day. The whole army of men, women and children passed the general in review, with banners flying and bands playing. Nothing equal to it has ever been known at the Crystal Palace.

The congress came to a close in a huge meeting at the Albert Hall on the evening of June 26. Every available space was occupied, and as the admission was by ticket, only the fortunate possessors could obtain admission. General Booth presided. The most prominent woman of the congress was Commander Eva Booth, daughter of the first general and head of the Salvation Army in America. The English Salvationists say: "She is the old general come to life." In thirty-four different languages the Salvation Army's Declaration of Faith and Purpose was read by nearly ten thousand people at this farewell gathering of the congress of nations. The declaration had been printed for all to read, and the delegates, representing fifty-eight dominions, colonies, and foreign countries, repeated it in their native tongues. Among the clauses were "We believe that God's mercy is for all nations. We believe it is our duty to proclaim this message to the whole world, to care for the poor and suffering, to visit the prisoners, to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to love the unlovable, and to befriend those of all lands who have no friends."

SHOULD PROTESTANTS COMPETE FOR STATE RECOGNITION?

A CONSIDERATION of this question appears opportune in view of certain happenings of recent date. The press throughout the country has taken notice of a resolution passed by the Reformed Church Synod in session at Asbury Park, N. J., on June 11. The New York Times, for instance, in reporting the matter plainly and emphatically declares that the spirit of rivalry has prompted the resolution. The resolution is reported in the official organ of the synod, the Christian Intelligencer, in its issue for June 17, as follows:

> The Committee on Overtures made an addition to their report, which was unanimously adopted and is as follows:
> Resolved, That we are aware of the political influence which the Roman Catholic Church is endeavoring to exert, by inviting persons in high positions to the services of that church, especially on Thanksgiving Day; that we view with serious apprehension the political prestige given said church by repeated acceptance of these invitations, and that the General Synod of the Reformed Church in America, acting upon an overture from the Particular Synod of Chicago, in reference to the attendance of the President of the United States at a Roman Catholic service on Thanksgiving Day, do petition the Executive Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America to organize in the city of Washington, D. C., a Thanksgiving service on Thanksgiving Day, 1914, under the auspices of the ecclesiastical bodies which the Federal Council represents in that city, and that an invitation be extended from said organization to the President and Vice-President of the United States and members of the staff and cabinet, and the usual men of official position in Washington, to attend that service.

This is the official text of the resolution, and the text as given in the New York Sun of June 11 will have to be corrected according to it, though it does not differ from the official text in any essential point.

We believe that this resolution creates a serious dilemma for all who on principle oppose and seek to check the political aggression of the Catholic hierarchy in our country. We would emphasize the word principle in the preceding clause. Frequent references have appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by various writers to the separation of church and state. These references—that has always been our view of the matter—were meant to apply not only to the Roman Catholic Church, but to all churches, nor to our Washington Government alone but to any institution that exercises the authority of the secular powers. What we have ever advocated and do advocate now is, that in no case should there be an unequal yoking together of the spiritual with the secular authority, no matter by what particular name either the spiritual or the secular authority may be known among men.

It is true that the defense of the principle of the separation of church and state has been practically directed against the Roman Catholic Church alone, because that church seemed to be either the sole or the most flagrant and persistent offender. But the principle would fall under the just censure that is applied to the proverbial "poor rule," if it were not generally applicable. Being a principle, the separation of church and state involves a question of right, and creates a moral issue whenever impugned. It is, therefore, independent in its operations of such variable circumstances as time, place, and personalities. Either the separation of church and state is right at all times and in all localities and binding upon all men, summoning them without exception and perpetually to render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's and unto God the things that are God's; or it is not principle at all but something entirely different.

To denounce the incessant clamor of Catholics for political recognition and preferment and to call for these same things for yourself, is a fatal inconsistency. Fatal, because it will undoubtedly be used to expose the Protestant opposition to the political aggression of Rome as a campaign prompted by selfish motives. It will be said, with a fair show of reason, that Protestants are envious of Rome's power and influence because they do not command and cannot control or secure that influence for themselves. Acts that seem wrong in Catholic churchmen are not wrong in other churchmen. It all depends on "whose ox has been gored."

We are far from imputing to the authors and champions of the above resolution motives of selfishness. We believe that the purpose of the resolution is merely to test the temper of the President and the power of Rome over his decisions. The New York Sun declares the resolution to be a plan "to make Wilson take a religious stand." The New York Times says the intention of the framers of the resolution is "to put Wilson on record." But even this is regrettable, very. How unfair is it to the President to compel him to "take a religious stand"! Is any other citizen of our country ever forced to do that? We hold that the President, like any other citizen, is answerable for his religious convictions and acts to no one but his conscience and his God. If attending a divine service on Thanksgiving Day is a religious act—and it ought to be that and nothing else—it is the President's privilege to attend, or not attend, such service, and to choose his own place of worship. And whenever he appears anywhere as a religionist on that day, or on any other day, he appears, like the rest of the worshipers, as a suppliant before his God, and common decorum would demand of his fellow worshipers that the accidentals of his station in the world be not taken notice of in the church. The President of the United States, as such, worships nowhere. That is to say, there is nothing in his requirements for holding office to compel him to worship God at any time or any place. The person happening to hold the exalted office of President may worship at any place he elects, without prejudice to himself personally or to his official standing. The President's attendance at any church is never a state function which he performs like other presidential acts as the chief executive officer of the nation and in behalf of all its citizens. It is a strictly private affair. It concerns nobody but the President. To "make the President take a religious stand" is an intolerable piece of insolence, revolting to every American, both as Christian and as citizen.

The Reformed Church Synod is reported by the New York Times to have taken the above step "instead of criticizing the chief executive." That is exactly what they ought to have done, and in doing that they would have remained within their rights. Free speech is guaranteed to every member of our republic, and the President is not infallible, nor has he given any indications that he considers himself so. Criticism may be resented, but that cannot be helped. If it is unjust, it is properly resented. If it is just, resentment only hurts the party resenting. However, criticism may also be accepted gratefully by the party criticized as a real favor.

We have never been able to view the President's attendance at the Pan-American Mass on Thanksgiving Day at St. Patrick's Cathedral in Washington, D. C., as other than a political act. Mr. Wilson is not a Catholic, and the needs of his soul do not urge him to go to mass. His spiritual desires, we imagine, cannot be satisfied at all by the ministrations of the Roman Catholic Church. That he does not attend the Pan-American Mass as a mere sightseer is equally obvious, and the show that is made of him when he attends, and the annual self-congratulation of the Roman Catholic dignitaries that they have had the President, the Vice-President, the Secretary of State and other persons of high political station (see THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, December 10, 1913) at their Pan-American Mass—all these things make it plain to the rudest observer that Rome itself does not view the President's attendance as a religious but as a political act. They regard him, whenever he comes to St. Patrick's Cathedral on their annual glory-day, not as their co-religionist, but as their political benefactor, and

The Fall of Huerta

WHAT looks like a tremendous victory for the highest idealism in international affairs has been won in the final elimination of Victoriano Huerta as president of Mexico. The Washington administration has met with rigorous opposition at home and contemptuous ridicule at home and abroad in its attempt to oust Huerta without plunging this country into war with Mexico, but the impossible has been achieved. Of course, the immediate expelling power was Villa. But Woodrow Wilson long ago determined that because Huerta had assumed the presidency by becoming an assassin, because he was determined to rule whether or not the Mexican people wished him to rule, it was the moral duty of the United States to refuse him recognition. And without that recognition he could not hope to hold his government in its place among the nations, or to combat successfully the attacks of the rebels.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has, from the beginning, hailed the high purposes of Mr. Wilson and Mr. Bryan, deploring the ridicule and censure launched against their "idealism" in diplomacy. These men have made a sincere effort to apply the principles of Christianity to international affairs. On July 1 THE CHRISTIAN HERALD said that the highest gain of the one hundred and thirty-eight years of our nation's independence was "the gain of having come to understand that a nation's place in the world is the place of service to all nations," and hailed Mr. Wilson's Flag Day utterance that our nation must be "too great to be debased by selfishness." Only last week we stated: "The constant insistence that war has not been declared, the careful waiting, and the strenuous effort for peace, these are bearing their fruit. Neighborliness has triumphed."

Even the secular press recognizes Huerta's retirement as a moral victory. The New York World says:

> Against Huerta's airy assumption Wilson arrayed adamantine correctness. In opposition to the tyrant's armed forces Wilson marshaled the forces of liberty and justice. It has taken some hard fighting in Mexico to overthrow the man who overthrew the government, but moral courage of a higher order has been needed to enable the administration to hold true to its principles. The triumph is ours as well as Mexico's. The honor of victories won in the realm of morals is no less than that of battles gained on bloody fields.

The New York Times says: "Woodrow Wilson is the restorer of peace in Mexico, not by invoking the horrors of war, but by virtue of reason among the nations."

The difficulties have been incalculable. But at Vera Cruz, at Niagara Falls, at Washington, President Wilson has held firm, showing a clear head, a steady hand, a true heart. Difficulties are still ahead in Mexico. But liberty and righteousness will triumph there, and because of their triumph there, will triumph sooner than otherwise throughout the North and South American continents and throughout the world.

Union of Foreign Missions

MUCH has been said and written in criticism of the multiplication of denominational effort in the various missionary fields, and the advisability of a closer union of forces, both on grounds of efficiency and economy. An interdenominational conference on missions was held in Cincinnati, June 30 and July 1, which promises to be history-making. It was, so far as we know, the first formal official discussion of a proposition to combine the Protestant missionary forces in Mexico, where the early restoration of peace and order is now hoped for. Eleven denominations were represented. Among the sixty delegates were many missionary veterans. Among the recommendations made by the various committees and approved by the conference were these: A joint depository at Mexico City; all the denominational papers to be merged into one; a joint publishing plant; an interdenominational Bible Institute and Theological Seminary on property now used by the Presbyterian Mission; a union college, also elementary and high schools, and normal, kindergarten and training schools; and, finally, a committee to supervise and unify all the educational work of the Protestant missions in Mexico, also a Committee on Territorial Occupation, to arrange the work so that there should be no congestion of schools or churches. During the discussion there were evidences of the spirit of self-sacrifice among the delegates, even to the yielding of personal preference and denominational advantage, in order that the work of the Gospel might be benefited. Provision is also suggested for interchange of membership in the mission churches, and for other methods of co-operation and unity for the general advancement of the work.

These proposed reforms will now be submitted to the different boards, and their action will be awaited with keen interest by all lovers of missionary work. They involve no surrender of denominational identity, the sole aim being to unite the denominational forces as a Christian army for more effective service. The action of the conference is an index of the growing movement looking to a closer union of Christian forces among all the churches, at home and abroad. If given a thorough trial on the lines indicated, it may be the forerunner of a great change in missionary work throughout the world.

Brightening Business Outlook

IN DECIDING that the prophets of calamity were not acceptable spokesmen for the business community, and that the leaders in the nation's activities should speak for themselves regarding trade conditions, the New York Times took an important step towards clearing up the commercial horizon. In its issue of July 15, it presented the result of a nation-wide canvass of American business. Leading bankers, merchants, manufacturers, railroad men, dry goods men, steel and coal and wool men, car-builders, agriculturists and representatives in every line of industrial and commercial activity have given frank expression to their convictions on the state of business and the outlook. The result is a complete refutation of the jeremiads that have been a cause of disturbance and distrust during the last few months.

First, there is the backbone of all national prosperity, the crops. Our government values the grain crop of 1914 at $3,418,000,000, a total surpassing all former records and which business leaders everywhere accept as an unfailing indicator of the general trade activity and expansion that invariably follow abundant harvests. It means increased business for the banks, the railroads and the long line of related activities, besides better wages and cheaper food. And the betterment has already begun, for even in the great steel industry (which suffered through the persistent campaign of depression) a decided improvement is already noticed. Car-builders, equipment concerns, cotton manufacturers, hardware, boots and shoes, and even the coal trade all report sensible improvement going on. Depression is giving place to confidence; the period of uncertainty has passed, the writers tell us, and they realize that the tide has turned the other way. Looking back at the time of uncertainty concerning legislation, they now see that their apprehensions were practically groundless. As far as the bankers were concerned, we are now assured that, being better acquainted than others with the actual situation, they never had any serious misgivings, and they are looking forward to a prosperous fall and winter throughout the whole country. In some sections the business outlook is described as more than promising—it is "brilliant." The tariff is no longer an acute subject of discussion; all lines of business have adjusted themselves to the new conditions and the solid foundations that have been laid in these last few months are such that business can progress safely and with full assurance of continued improvement.

It is gratifying to observe how clearly and confidently the note announcing the new conditions is expressed. There are no misgivings about it. Pittsburg is one of the leaders in sounding this dominant note. Chicago is another. A delegation from the latter city visited Washington and, after a talk with the President, went home convinced that the business revival was already on the way, and that the time had come to welcome it in good earnest. Even New York has come to the conclusion that the skies are clearing, and its business men are singing the song of confidence.

Next to faith in God, we should have faith in our country and in ourselves. Not a dumb faith, nor a faith that vacillates, but one which takes firm hold and goes forward—looking ahead, not backward. With the foundations of business on a sound and solid basis, we can have confidence in the future.

The Cry of a Thousand Men

A THOUSAND men have spoken who have a right to speak. To be specific, one thousand and eight. Out of 1,478 persons confined in the Eastern Penitentiary of Pennsylvania, 1,008, apparently without any instigation or influence from without or within their prison walls, signed a petition to the Pennsylvania legislature asking for the passage of a State-wide prohibition law. Many of the men volunteered to go before a legislative committee to tell how the saloon had wrecked their lives. Here is an anti-saloon argument overwhelmingly convincing.

There is a widespread conviction, a fear on the part of some, a hope on the part of many, that the saloon is, indeed, doomed, and that the doom is not far distant. We are told that saloonless districts do not want the saloon reinstated. The air is purer and life is sweeter when it has gone. The great demonstration of Sunday school men at the recent Chicago convention was largely a demonstration against the saloon. Fair America will be still fairer when the saloon has disappeared. The voice of these thousand men, men who were stainless children once, men who have brought grief and shame to themselves and those who love them, men who think longingly of what might have been and yearn to help make the path of others safe, shall not be uttered in vain.

New Bible Contest Prizes

HERE is a great chance! You have seen references in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the wonderful BABYLONIAN TABLETS which are being given as premiums to those securing new subscribers. It has hitherto been impossible to obtain these tablets in any other way. But an opportunity is to be given to each of our readers to secure one of these tablets by doing some earnest Bible study.

Every subscriber who sends in correct answers for the last six lists of 1914 Bible Questions will receive at the end of the year one of these tablets, from three to four thousand years old. See the first list appearing on page 718 of this issue.

This half-yearly contest in no way affects the twelve-month contest now half over. Complete records are being kept, and the prizes for the whole year will be awarded as announced. But the new contest gives every one an opportunity to win a prize, even if there have been some failures in the work of the first six months.

New contestants can enter. No preliminaries or formalities are required. Just send in your answers to the questions, together with your name and address. You must, however, be a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to be eligible to one of these tablet prizes. Answers must reach the CHRISTIAN HERALD office within two weeks from the date of the issue in which the questions appear. The time limit is necessarily extended for those living in foreign countries. Make up your mind now to win one of these Bible-time tablets. You can do it.

Invention Brings $300,000 Reward

THE invention of a simple device for writing the caption or signature on a film in a camera at the time the picture is taken has made H. J. Gaisman rich beyond his boyhood dreams. Employees of a prominent camera company have been working for six years to devise some such scheme without success. The inventor has applied himself to the problem for the past four years. When a few days ago he showed his device to George Eastman, head of the Kodak Company, he promptly received a check for $300,000, and yet the new invention is so simple in character that it will add practically nothing to the cost of a Kodak so equipped. Mr. Gaisman was turned aside in early manhood from his desired vocation, because of the necessity of supporting his mother, to whom he had always been unusually devoted. Most of the inventors of the world have come up from the humble walks of life, and have discovered nature's mysteries by the most incessant experimentation and toil. The rule has been that the great inventors have had very poor financial remuneration for their discoveries. Usually they have spent their time and what little money they could secure in making their investigations as thorough as possible, and it has been left for persons of wealth to capitalize their discoveries and draw the dividends. Fortunately some of the great discoverers of the time have had money sense enough to capitalize their own discoveries and retain fifty-one per cent. of the capital stock. This young man's love for his mother, his just loyalty to her, was worth more than the $300,000 which he received as the reward of his discovery. This age of invention suggests the period thus described:

For all the Athenians and strangers which were there spent their time in nothing else, but either to tell or to hear some new thing. (Acts 17: 21.)

Dr. Osler on Tuberculosis

SIR WILLIAM OSLER, addressing a conference for the prevention of tuberculosis at Leeds, the other day said, "Had I a radioscope and could I look into the chests of everybody, probably ninety per cent. would show, somewhere, a small form of tuberculosis. Though its ravages have been reduced, tuberculosis still remains the most powerful of man's innumerable enemies." Despite the ravages of the white plague, medical science is steadily getting the better of it and will certainly master it, as it has already taken much of the terror from smallpox and typhoid. All this has been done under the scientific advancement of a Christian age, whose Founder introduced his kingdom in this world as a physician curing the physical and spiritual maladies of mankind. There is this reference to his healing ministry:

And Jesus saith unto him, I will come and heal him. (Matt. 8: 7.)

Workingmen's Bouquet to Royalty

WHEN the king and queen of England paid a visit recently to the famous gun works in Glasgow they were surprised to see moving toward them from the opposite end of the great shop a 130-ton crane, bearing, in place of the accustomed cannon, a beautiful little girl, carrying a bouquet of flowers. When the giant machine had deposited her at their feet, she presented the flowers to the queen as a token of love and gratitude from the workmen. The best government is that in which the ruler and the humblest subject are in the completest harmony and affection. Sovereigns are such in reality as well as in name only as they safeguard the interests of the humblest and poorest, as well as the most exalted of the realm, in imitation of the King of kings and Lord of lords,

Who is the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords. (1 Tim. 6: 15.)

Cause Oysters to Produce Pearls

OF THE many strange farms to be found in various parts of the world, the most extraordinary are the pearl-oyster farms of Japan. Here the pearl-oyster is made to produce the precious gems in a reliable and methodical manner, while another interesting feature of the venture is that the oysters containing them are brought to the surface by women divers. It was Dr. Mikimoto, a well-known and wealthy Japanese scientist, who discovered how the pearl-oyster could be made to work for man and produce the much-prized stones at his will. It took years of costly experiment to produce this result. The "farm" where these precious stones are produced has a water area of some fifty square nautical miles, varying in depth from five to fifteen fathoms. Small pieces of stone are placed where the larvæ of the oysters have been found to be most abundant. Soon small oyster spat are found attached to them. These are then taken up and removed to special beds, where they lie till their third year. Now an oyster will not produce a pearl unless it is irritated inside the shell by some foreign substance. It then proceeds at once to make good the defect by covering the irritant spot with beautiful layers of nacre. The oysters are taken out of the water, and a surgical operation is performed on each one of them which consists in introducing a foreign substance and by the end of three to five years the animal has covered the inserted nucleus with many layers of nacre, or in other words has produced a pearl. Women divers bring up from thirty to fifty of these per minute. The soul can be made to produce the precious pearls of moral and spiritual beauty through divine surgery. Christ thus refers to spiritual jewels as precious pearls:

The kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchant man, seeking goodly pearls: who, when he found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had, and bought it. (Matt. 13: 45, 46.)

FRANCIS SCOTT KEY MONUMENT

THE monument to Francis Scott Key in Baltimore will be the center of interest at the national Star-Spangled Banner Centennial, which will be celebrated in that city during the week of September 6 next. There will be pageants and parades on a large scale, culminating in the dedication of Fort McHenry as a public park. Tuesday will be "Francis Scott Key Day," in honor of the author of our national anthem. Just a hundred years ago, Key, who was a Baltimore lawyer about thirty-four years of age, was temporarily detained on a British war vessel during the attack on Baltimore. From this vantage he could see the flag flying above Fort McHenry in the glare of the battle most of the night; but before morning the firing ceased, and through the darkness Key remained in suspense until the dawning light revealed again the Stars and Stripes floating over the ramparts. In the exultation of the moment, Key penned the words that quickly found favor throughout the country and that have come to be accepted as our national anthem. In the foundation of all great empires, the poet as well as the statesman and general have been necessary. Music has always had an important part in the development of national character and in the success of its armies. Our national anthem has been a great blessing to the people and an inspiration to those who have defended the flag of which it speaks. "The Star-Spangled Banner" is one of liberty, of righteousness and of truth, described by the psalmist in these words: "Thou hast given a banner to them that fear thee, that it may be displayed because of the truth." (Ps. 60: 4.)

Best Elements Dominate Civilization

DR. VICTOR VAUGHAN, at an address delivered at a recent convention, made a fearful indictment against the evils of our time. Balancing the evil and good of our civilization he said, "Our hilltops are illuminated by the light of knowledge, but our valleys are covered by the clouds of ignorance. We have not emerged from the shadows of the dark ages." It will be well to pay attention to Dr. Vaughan's powerful presentation of the evil as well as good elements in our civilization, but we should not forget that in all the centuries good and evil have been thus mixed, and that in past generations evil has been far more rampant and dominant than at the present. It should be remembered that little over a hundred years ago every nation on the earth owned slaves, civilized as well as uncivilized; that not many centuries back all government meant absolute despotism, with the liberty, possessions and lives of subjects owned by the crown; that one deadly disease killed at one march a third of the population of the globe. Never in the history of the world has there been such material progress, such universal intellectual enlightenment, such widespread benevolence, such fervid piety and such just faith in the speedy triumph of good over evil and the establishment of the kingdom of Christ in the earth. This is leading to the fulfilment of Christ's prayer:

Thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. (Matt. 6: 10.)

Swimming Compulsory at College

SINCE 1904 Columbia University has required every candidate for graduation to pass a rigid examination in natation. Other colleges and universities have followed this example until now seventeen of the largest institutions require proficiency in swimming. Bryn Mawr is numbered among these. The student who has not learned to swim is usually strapped in a sling and suspended in the water and taught the different strokes. The wisdom of teaching people to swim is emphasized in the record of seven drownings which one morning paper recently printed. The terrors of the drowning in material waters have their spiritual counterpart in the figure by which death is likened to crossing a river where there is great danger; those who put their trust in God have this blessed assurance:

When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee. (Isa. 43: 2.)

Duchess Addresses Women

IN ANSWER to an invitation of Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont, four hundred women from various parts of this country met at Marble House, Newport, R. I., recently at a universal suffrage conference. Many of the distinguished orators and champions of the cause were present. The feature of the first meeting was an address by the Duchess of Marlborough, who gave a graphic report of the work done, under her care, among the women and children of the poorer and criminal classes of London. She mixed a very serious subject with the spice of humor. She told of a woman who applied for money to get tools for her husband to go to work with. The money was given and the tools bought. It was afterward discovered that they were a set of burglar's tools, and they were found on the man, who was on his way to work with them. Miss K. B. Davis, Commissioner of Charities and Correction of New York City, made an excellent address, saying, among other things, that New York City had penal institutions that do not punish, establishments of correction that do not correct and reformatory institutions that do not reform; that, in the treatment of the wayward and criminal, New York City is a long way behind the times. The women among the Hebrews had greater privileges and higher honor than those of other nations in the East. We have an instance of one who was called to exalted leadership in the nation:

And Miriam answered them, Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea. (Ex. 15: 21.)

A LITTLE ANGEL OF THE MOUNTAINS

BY CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY

CHAPTER XIV

NEXT morning the Sunday school was held in the grove of pines as usual. Old Four Eyes had considered the matter carefully, and had concluded that the time to preach disarmament was after the adherents of the would-be church had assembled peacefully. Every man, therefore, came with his usual private assortment of cutlery and artillery dangling about him or carried in his hands. Indeed, a few extra revolvers and rifles were in evidence, because it was felt there might be trouble. There was no outward and visible sign of it, however. Even some of those who sometimes came to sneer and jeer covertly on the outskirts were conspicuous by their absence. The door of The Black Pup was partially closed that morning, and it, too, seemed unusually still and orderly. Perhaps, so reasoned the miners and the dwellers in the town, the barkeeper and his friends had told the truth, and the religious party had been unduly apprehensive. Nothing had happened, and possibly nothing would happen.

There never was any necessity for waiting for late comers at that Sunday school. Those who attended were so interested that they were always on time, especially since there was nothing to prevent. That morning was no exception to the rule. The bishop had not yet arrived and nothing had been heard from his escort, but the church service proper had not been appointed to begin until after the session of the Sunday school, so there was no need of waiting for him.

Mr. Morrison came out of the house at the usual hour with his wife, the two girls, the women who assisted at the restaurant, and little Olaf Tryggvesson; and what a different-looking lad he was! In the first place, he was spotlessly clean and dressed in new and good clothes, which had been ordered from Denver for him, and which had arrived some time before. Not only because of his clothes did the boy look another person; a new expression had come over him. The cleanliness without had been accompanied by a cleanliness within. He walked with the girls, he held his head high, and looked the world in the face with his bright blue eyes. He had got back his self-respect, his boyish courage, his determination.

He was devoted to the two little girls, he adored Mrs. Morrison, and he was very fond of her husband. But the being who stood highest of all in his affections was the man to whom he had given his whole heart—Parson Bill. He missed the big miner that morning, but he expected that he would arrive presently. He never dreamed that any harm could come to the great, splendid man to whom he looked up with all the possible admiration of boy-like devotion and love.

Before the usual exercises, Old Four Eyes rose to his feet. Bowing awkwardly to the Morrisons, he began:

"Askin' your pardon an' with you all's permission, in fact at your suggestion, I got a word or two to say to the boys yere. Gents," he continued, stepping up on a boulder facing the crowd and taking off his hat, "we all knows what these yere people has done for us. They come out yere an' found us without God, without law, without order, an' without religion. Why, we didn't even have decent grub to eat, which proper feedin' goes together with religion more frequent than is gener'ly savvied, an' we're much indebted to 'em. What we give for the church that we're goin' to build is mighty little to pay for what they give us. You all knows that Dead Shot Jackson was a-prowlin' round yere last night. He was in The Black Pup, though we didn't ketch him there. There's a low-down crowd that frequents that place, which we all knows what kind of men they are, 'cause we was once like 'em—"

"Please don't abuse those poor men, my friend," interposed Mrs. Morrison in gentle remonstrance.

"No'am, in course not. I'm not abusin' of 'em. I'm jest a-tellin' the truth about 'em. Well, we all got the idea that Jackson come down yere to make trouble. He's been outlawed everywheres an' it all begun from the trial of that Injun, which Parson Bill defended so well, an' whose life was saved by the testimony of the lad yere. An' we all was a-feared that some day he'd come down yere an' try to bust up these yere peaceful services we've been havin' in the Sunday school. We sent him word last night that we weren't goin' to stand for no foolishness. You all have been expectin' something of the kind, an' like prudent an' honor'ble men you've come armed, ready to do your share to preserve order an' to teach him a lesson."

"That we have, old man," said one in hearty assent.

"But Mrs. Morrison she thinks different from us. She sees things different," continued the old man. "This yere Sunday school has—I won't say onsettled her jedgment—but it's made it different from ourn, an' she thinks that it would be a good thing if we'd jest free ourselves of our we'pons for the service."

"What!" exclaimed a veteran pioneer, "give up our guns? Not me."

"She says she don't think we'll need 'em, but if them fellers do come around they can't in decency's sake begin to shoot up a lot of unarmed men an' women an' children," continued Old Four Eyes. "I must confess, gents, that I don't altogether agree with her, but Mr. Morrison thinks there's somethin' in it, an' there is. I told her last night I'd speak to you all. As for me, I'm goin' to do as she suggests, whatever happens. Here's the only gun I brought with me an' down she goes. That flat rock yonder will be big enough for 'em all, I take it. There's mine. Any other gents as is willin' to oblige the lady, for God's sake, can do it."

"I'm with you, Four Eyes," immediately said one of the men, drawing his own revolver and laying it with his rifle and bowie knife down on the designated boulder.

There is a contagion in everything, in goodness as well as badness. The eloquence of the old man, the appeal of the woman, the examples of those who were first influenced, ran through the crowd. One by one they came up and deposited their weapons on the rock, pistols, rifles, knives, and here and there a shotgun; although it was quite obvious that many who did so did it against their own judgment.

"Now, ma'am," said Old Four Eyes, when the last and most reluctant man had complied with the request, "looks like our pertection was up to you."

"It is not up to me," said the woman earnestly, her eyes shining with triumph and yet her face pale at the thought of possible consequences, "but to God."

"And in his name," said Mr. Morrison with the deepest emotion, "I bid you to our morning prayer."

The service went on as usual. It was hard to get the attention of the men at first. They felt lonely and strange without their weapons; hands would stray to belts, eyes would wander to the improvised armory on the boulder, and they were still a little afraid that something would happen; but as the familiar exercises proceeded they joined in the hymns and devotion with increasing zest, possibly because their first start had been so lukewarm. The eyes of all were now fastened upon Mr. Morrison as he began to expound the lesson. He spoke with simplicity, directness, and earnestness, and with a full understanding of the character and circumstances of his audience which made his words wonderfully effective. He pleaded with them for confession and for resolution.

They did not notice in their interest the very quiet approach of a large group of men until they rounded the corner of the house and appeared in full sight. Little Olaf had allowed his eyes to wander once or twice, and he had seen between the houses the men coming down the street. He started to his feet to give the alarm, but Mrs. Morrison, unsuspecting, caught hold of his shoulder to check him, fearful lest the effect of her husband's words might be lost by an interruption. The boy stood staring when the men appeared. So soon as they rounded the corner of the house they broke into a run. In a twinkling of an eye they had reached the grove of the Sunday school.

Dead Shot Jackson, his face frightfully red, was in the lead. He had his gun out and each man with him had followed his example. Mr. Morrison showed his qualities of leadership by thus instantly expressing himself:

"Let no Christian man, woman, or child in this assemblage move," he said, raising his voice, as he broke off his exhortation.

The men had started to their feet as they saw the new arrivals; some had already stepped toward the pile of weapons on the boulder, but at the little man's words they stood still.

"Gentlemen," continued Mr. Morrison, stepping forward intrepidly, "whether you come in peace or war, to participate in our worship, or for any other purpose, you are all welcome."

Old Four Eyes would naturally have taken the lead, but he recognized a master mind, and contented himself by stepping to the side of Mr. Morrison to lend him the support and encouragement of his presence.

"Hadn't we all better git our guns?" asked one of the—well, let us call them Christians to distinguish them from the others.

"By no means," said Mr. Morrison quickly. "Let them lie right there."

"You're right," sneered Dead Shot Jackson; "we got the drop on you an' we'll let daylight through the first man that moves to tech a gun or a knife."

"It is not for that reason that I have bid the men not to take their weapons. We do not fear you or your friends. This is a peaceful assemblage worshiping God on this Lord's day. We cannot believe that there is a human being in Cañon Creek, or the world for that matter, so degraded and so wicked as to be willing to commit murder to interfere with it."

"Well, you've got your nerve with you, Mr. Morrison," said Old Four Eyes softly. "You don't know these—"

"Pardon me," said Mr. Morrison, "I believe I do know them. Won't you gentlemen put up your weapons, sit down, and join in our worship?"

"Give up our guns!" sneered Jackson, "like these other blanked fools? Not much."

"We are about to sing a hymn. My dear," he said to his wife, "will you play it? Will some of you gentlemen," continued Mr. Morrison imperturbably, "distribute hymn-books to these new friends?"

"Don't nobody move," roared Jackson.

"'They that take the sword shall perish with the sword,'" said Mrs. Morrison with great courage, calmly rising in spite of the prohibition and going over to the little organ.

"That may be true enough for cold steel, ma'am, but these are guns," returned the outlaw, greatly incensed by her quiet disregard of the command. "Of course, we can't make you obey orders, bein' as how you're a woman, but we'll blow the head off the first gent that makes a move. You'd all be standin' with your hands up if you hadn't been sech fools as to part from your we'pons. If that's the teachin' of your church, we don't want none of it in this camp, do we, boys?"

He laughed mockingly as he spoke, and the rest of his company joined in as if the whole affair were a huge joke.

"I knowed it, I knowed it," said Old Four Eyes mournfully, sotto voce. "I never was parted from my we'pons afore, an' I never will be agin."

"I got a score to settle with you, but it can wait," roared out Jackson, turning to the old man. "This yere camp is a laughin' stock among the rest of the men of the mountains. We gives you all fair warnin' that this yere hymn-singin' business an' this prayin' business has got to stop right now. We all wants the old free ways that we enj'yed afore you people come buttin' in yere, an' we're goin' to have 'em, too. You've already put one perfectly good saloon out of business. You've choked off competition an' sp'iled trade, an'—"

"Why do you concern yourself with the morals of Cañon Creek or the conditions thereof?" said Mr. Morrison suddenly. "You are a fugitive from justice, charged with murder, and—"

"I remembers," shouted Old Four Eyes, who had endured about all that he could stand, gun or no gun, "that you're an outlaw, a self-confessed murderer of wimmin, a bullier, an' a threatener of children. It may be that you've come yere to live up to your profession. There's a few women and children yere, you see. Pr'aps you're goin' to shoot up a few, jest to show your friends what a bad man you really are, like that rotten, low-down crowd you got with you. We all knows what they are, 'cause we all was once like 'em ourselves. The Lord's on my side an' I'm on his, an' I don't care whether I got a we'pon or not. I ain't a-feared of any of you, from Jackson down to the last coward a-hidin' behind some of the others. I'm on the Lord's side, from now on, an' I'm done with you. Shoot if you want to. I'm a member of the church, leastways I'm a-goin' to be, an' we ain't a-goin' to be drove away from our worship by no gun play of yourn. We wants you to understand that. Men, jest git around here in front of Mrs. Morrison an' the other women an' the kids. Now if he wants to shoot, let him do it."

TO-MORROW

HOW will it be to-morrow?
Can we peer 'neath the sunset skies,
See promise and hope awaiting
Where the mist in the distance lies?
To-morrow! To-morrow!
Will the dawn come in with a smile,
Or will it bring woe and sadness
And no songs for the afterwhile?

How will it be to-morrow?
We plan of the things we will do,
But to-day is the time for action;
To-morrow is hidden from view!
To-morrow! To-morrow!
It were best that we cannot see
Its unknown scenes—the surprises
Which are coming to you and me!

How will it be to-morrow?
Why, much as we make our to-day
We hold in our power our future
As it comes from the far-away.
To-morrow! To-morrow!
Come tempest, come shadow, come light,
To the soul that in God is trusting,
The path of the future is bright!

THE CHURCH IN THE VALLEY BY THE WILDWOOD

IN ONE of the loveliest spots of Iowa, old Bradford, in "the valley by the wildwood," there has stood for more than half a century the little unpretentious, weather-beaten church which inspired Dr. W. S. Pitts to write the song, "Little Brown Church," famous for all time to come.

This church long years ago passed its usefulness as a house of worship, not from dilapidation, but because the worshipers passed on and away, leaving it alone in its seclusion. Now its silvery-toned bell, as sweet and clear as when it first called the people together under its belfry, peals forth only to call the few remaining citizens together when their ranks are from time to time still further depleted.

All that made the church prosperous departed with the passing of Bradford, which began in 1869, when the iron horse left it stranded and one-half mile from civilization. The town's former business blocks and pretty home sites have long since been relegated back to farm lands, and plow and reaper have succeeded the stir of a busy town life. Only the church and the wildwood are left familiar objects to the early settler. Defying the ravages of time to a marked degree, this landmark, almost pathetic in its loneliness, remains unchanged within and without.

The church was built in the days of the Civil War. Its erection was marked by a spirit of unusual self-sacrifice and toil on the part of the pioneers, whose hardships and privations taxed their financial strength to the utmost. The timber was hewed and lumber sawed by their own hands from the surrounding forests, while the siding, finishing lumber, door and windows were hauled by team from McGregor, on the Mississippi River, a distance of some seventy-five miles over corduroy roads across the prairies, through sloughs that seemed bottomless and across bridgeless streams, when wagon-boxes were used for boats to float loads across.

The church was begun in the spring of 1861, but was not completed and dedicated until 1865. Many of the men were away in the service of their country, and money was scarce. At a stress when it was feared the finishing must be postponed indefinitely, Dr. John Todd of Pittsfield, Mass., gave $150. The bell came to the church at about the same time, a gift from Mr. Thomas Cole, then a rich man, but who soon after failed, mainly for the reason that all the world stopped wearing paper collars, which he had been manufacturing. The furnace of the church was constructed out of the fire-box of a cast-off steam engine, and the color of the building became brown instead of white because brown mineral was cheap, and white lead quite beyond reach.

Great rejoicing was manifested all up and down the Cedar Valley when the Bradford church was ready for use. People traveled forty miles to attend the first service, and those living within a radius of ten and twelve miles became quite regular attendants. This little church meant much to the people in those days of limited church privileges. The pastor, Rev. J. K. Nutting, had lent willing hands at manual labor in its erection.

The song by Dr. Pitts was written about the time the church was dedicated. It has been sung around the world. The Tennesseeans sang it for eight consecutive years.

MRS. S. M. WRIGHT.

"THE LITTLE BROWN CHURCH IN THE VALE"

THERE'S a church in the valley by the wildwood,
No lovelier place in the dale;
No spot is so dear to my childhood
As the little brown church in the vale.

How sweet on a clear Sabbath morning
To list to the clear ringing bell;
Its tones so sweetly are calling,
Oh, come to the church in the vale.

There, close by the church in the valley,
Lies one that I loved so well;
She sleeps, sweetly sleeps, 'neath the willow;
Disturb not her rest in the vale.

There, close by the side of that loved one,
'Neath the tree where the wild flowers bloom,
When the farewell hymn shall be chanted,
I shall rest by her side in the tomb.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—FROM THE TIME he was nineteen years of age until the day he was one hundred, William G. Atwater, of Meriden, Conn., has been a member of the church, most of that period of the First Baptist Church at Meriden, and, until his great age prevented, about seven years ago, was a constant attendant at both church and Sunday school. Mr. Atwater completed his century of life May 22.

—SYRACUSE, OHIO, and Pomeroy and Racine have experienced a gracious revival under the leadership of evangelists George S. Graber and Homer Alexander, resulting in a great awakening to the Pomeroy Valley. Among the hundreds of converts were many former drunkards. A leading lawyer converted at Pomeroy says: "This is the first real revival I have seen in twenty-five years. It is like the old-time meetings where people really were born again."

—MRS. ISABEL SHIPLEY sends word of the reopening of Rest Cottage, maintained "by faith" at Sadlertown, N. J., where rest-needy colored women are freely given a little time of comfort and recuperation. Gifts aggregating less than $200 last year provided thirty-three aged and toil-worn women with a welcome rest here.

THE BOARDWALK CHURCH, Atlantic City, N. J., is again in full operation, this being its sixth annual season. Rev. Robert Arthur Elwood, the founder, is in charge, of course. The interesting work of this institution, seeking to reach the multitudes that throng that famous promenade, is heartily commended by the Presbytery of West Jersey.

—AT WICHITA, KAN., in May a laymen's "team-work" evangelistic movement began, which spread into Oklahoma and gave promise of arousing that whole section. Many conversions are reported. The work is confined to laymen and is marked with simplicity of detail.

—THE CHAPLAIN of the U. S. S. Vermont conveys the thanks of the men of the ship for the magazines and papers sent by Mrs. Daniels, Mrs. Roosevelt, Mrs. Blue, Mrs. Badger, Mrs. Fletcher, Mrs. Mayo, Mrs. Barnett, Mrs. Gibbons, and Miss Jones, through Chaplain Bayard a short time ago.

—ZULU CHIEFS, farmers, heads of families welcome the circuit visits of Rev. John L. Dube, himself a Zulu, because he is trying to educate and Christianize their sons and daughters in his Christian Industrial School at Natal, South Africa. A modern work is being conducted there, the students, besides doing all the manual labor, publishing a Zulu weekly. Louis Stoiber, treasurer, 722 Broadway, New York, says funds are needed for extension. The Missionary Review of the World endorses Mr. Dube; its editor, D. L. Pierson, is also on the American Committee representing the work.

Chef to the Millions

A master chef, a few years ago, took our national dish and revised it.

He took pork and beans and tomato sauce and made an entirely new creation. This homely dish became a delicacy.

Now he is chef to the millions—to the millions who have found a new ideal in baked beans. Countless housewives—when they want a quick, hearty, delicious meal—simply call on this chef to serve it. That is, they heat a can of Van Camp's, and it comes to the table with all the fresh oven flavor.

You could not induce one of them—or the folks they serve—to go back to old-time beans.

VAN CAMP'S
PORK & BEANS BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE
Also Baked Without the Sauce
10, 15 and 20 Cents Per Can

These are in no way like old-style baked beans. We pick out our beans by analysis. We bake in steam ovens, so the beans are not crisped or broken. They come out mellow and whole.

The sauce is baked in—sauce made from whole tomatoes, grown from special seed, picked when ruddy red. So the beans have a zest—a sparkling tang—that was never known before.

This dish is unique. It's as different from others as celery is from cabbage. One meal of Van Camp's will completely change your conception of baked beans.

Serve it now—now at the season when you are looking for delicious meals ready-cooked. But be sure that you get Van Camp's.

Then keep the pantry stocked.

Buy a can of Van Camp's Beans to try. If you do not find them the best you ever ate, your grocer will refund your money.

FALSE PRETENSES

*SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR AUGUST 9

The Lesson in Life

By Amos R. Wells

AN OLD gentleman was visiting a Kentucky breeding-farm, seeking a fast horse. He wanted one that would pass any other animal that he would be likely to find on the road. He was conducted past a long string of horses with fine records on their stalls telling of the victories they had won. Then he was shown a large number of horses of good pedigree, from which the dealer expected great things when they got on the track. Then the old gentleman turned on the dealer and said hotly, "Look here, stranger, you've shown me 'have-beens,' and you've let me see your 'going-to-bes,' but what I am here for is an 'iser.'"

The shrewd old fellow hit on the exact trouble that spoiled the fig-tree which Christ condemned. It bore leaves, and the figs come with the leaves or even before; yet it bore no figs. Perhaps its record warranted it in claiming to be a has-been, its leaves looked like a going-to-be, but it surely was not an "iser."

How like alcohol, with its promise of bodily strength, and intellectual quickening, and social pleasure; and then, when we look for the fulfilment of the promises—nothing but leaves! The many and varied German experiments prove that drinking soldiers cannot march so far as abstaining soldiers, drinking typesetters cannot set so much type as abstaining typesetters, drinking school children (for there are many of these in Europe) fall far behind the grades of abstaining school children, and so on indefinitely. Weighed, weighed and found wanting! is the writing on the wall of the palace of King Alcohol.

The inner meaning of the temple scene to which Christ passed is so close to the significance of the barren fig-tree that it is well that Mark placed the two events side by side. What but barren fig-trees were the traffickers of the temple?—and all the worse because they were in the house of God, where only the holiest thoughts and deeds would be expected.

Once a minister was talking with a dying man and was amazed to see how little he understood of spiritual things. "How can it be," he asked, "that you know so little of the Gospel after all these years of listening to sermons?" "Nay, nay, sir," the sick man replied, "I have never heard you preach. As soon as you began I used to go over the business of the past week and plan the business of the next week. I settled difficult problems and I planned always to get rich, but I never heard a sermon." He was a trafficker in the temple.

Professor Palmer used to tell of an Arab merchant whom he once heard saying his prayers. One sentence would be a devout request of Allah, the next would advertise his goods and the prices of them. Peddlers were driven from York Minster in 1470. St. Paul's Cathedral was formerly a busy place of merchandise. A traveler tells of visiting a church in Europe where a worshiper rose from kneeling to hand him a business card! If the hidden thoughts of men's minds could be read by the eyes, doubtless our modern American churches would present many scenes as incongruous.

General "Chinese" Gordon placed his white handkerchief before his tent every morning, and during that half-hour of prayer he was never interrupted. His officers refrained from intruding with even the most urgent matter, for their general was engaged with his King.

This is to be the Christian's attitude toward worldliness. A man once said to Moody, "Now that I am converted, have I got to give up the world?" "No," answered the level-headed evangelist; "you haven't got to give up the world; if you give a good ringing testimony for the Son of God, the world will give you up pretty quick; they won't want you around."

That is the whip of small cords which will drive worldliness from the temple of your heart—the love of Jesus Christ. That is the magic which will bring fruit upon the barren fig-tree of your life—the love of Jesus Christ.

And this same love of Christ is the victorious weapon against the cruel covetousness which is the central strength of the liquor traffic. Take away the spirit of selfishness which placed the money-changers in the temple, put in its stead the love of Jesus Christ, and every saloon would be closed to-morrow. The love of money is the root of this evil, and it is to be uprooted only by the higher, stronger, deeper love of Christ. And if you would know how this great transformation is to be effected in the hearts of men you have only to ponder one of the closing sentences of our lesson—the simple, sufficing words, "Have faith in God."

Pureness, Love, Faith, Fruit

By Arthur H. Howland

THE narrative of the barren fig-tree has puzzled and distressed many devout souls. The anger of Jesus and his curse upon the tree seem so unlike the other facts of his life. The matter has been made more difficult by the clause which Mark slips into his account: "for the time of figs was not yet." Why should Jesus blame the tree for not having fruit when it was not yet time for fruit?

But all these difficulties melt away before a thorough study of the facts. Schaff's New Testament commentary, in the notes on Matthew 21: 19, referring to the passage in Mark, makes the following plain statement:

"The usual explanation is that the fruit of the fig-tree precedes the leaf, hence it promised fruit. A recent traveler in Palestine (T. W. Chambers) says this is not the case, and gives the following explanation: The tree bears two crops, an early ripe fig which is crude and without flavor and valueless, and a later fig which is full of sweetness and flavor, and highly esteemed. All trees bear the first, only good ones have the second. Now the tree our Lord saw had not the second, for the time of that had not yet come; but it had not even the first, for it had nothing but leaves, and the lack of the first was sure evidence that the second would also be wanting."

Our Lord, then, was rebuking false pretenses. The fig-tree proclaimed by its leaves that it was a fruit-bearer; but it was not. It neither had the first imperfect fruit nor would it have the later perfect fruit. It was a pretender, and nothing more. The Sunday school topic for February 15 was: "Christ's Hatred of Shams." Christ was the embodiment of love, but there were certain things he hated: he hated them because they would unsettle or thwart the works of love. And among his bitterest hatred was this hatred of shams. We can make our pupils feel strongly in teaching this lesson. Make them fear and hate the very thought of deceit. The whole problem of truth and deception comes up here. Parents are often mightily at fault; they deceive children habitually without a thought of the seriousness of their offense. Promises are made and not fulfilled; threats are carelessly made with no thought of carrying them out; false statements uttered with apparently not a twinge of conscience. This is a bad start for the boys and girls, who should love truth as Christ loved it and hate deception as he hated it.

Further, Christ was probably rebuking the Jews specifically. They, as a nation, professed righteousness, professed to be living near to God, but he, as well as Isaiah, knew that, though they drew near unto him with their lips, their hearts were far from him (Matt. 15: 8 and Isa. 29: 13). Clinging to the form and outward demonstration they had lost the life and the fruit, and were soon to slay the heaven-sent Messenger who had come that they might have life, and have it more abundantly. Compare with this incident the parable of the unfruitful tree in Luke 13: 6-9.

Christ also wished to teach his disciples the lesson of faith. When in the evening they found the fig-tree withered away he made his amazing utterance about the power of faith, summing up, in the words of Matt. 21: 22: "All things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive." Study again Christ's statements about faith. We are losing the power and glory of faith. We are forgetting to live expectantly. The country is being flooded with inspirational literature which insists that, purely in a scientific way, it is true that we get what we expect, what we dare to hope and insist upon making real. Jesus understood this principle, and added it to his own intense, personal power. Then he promises that his infinite power shall be at our disposal and shall be used for things to which our faith will dare apply it.

The cleansing of the temple (verses 15-18) can be applied to soul and social life in many ways. To-day's is the temperance lesson. We know, for we have all seen, except those happy people who have lived in localities really "dry," how strong drink defiles and destroys, how it finds the devil in a man and gives him sway, how it blights communities and homes. But the cleansing of the temple typifies other things. It means particularly that Christ wants to cleanse his church from commercialism and greed and all forms of unrighteousness. It means that he wants to cleanse individual hearts and lives from all sin. Hypocrisy, uncleanliness, greed and all forms of selfishness, unbelief and all other shapes and kinds of sin he will drive out by his kingly power. Read Mal. 3: 1-6; also Ezek. 36; 25-27; II Cor. 7: 1; the ninth and tenth chapters of Hebrews, particularly 9: 13, 14; 10: 10, and find some of the many other passages which state the cleansing power of Christ and promise that it may be applied to all.

The last point in the lesson must not be overlooked. It occurs in that conversation about faith. Faith must be accompanied by forgiveness—that is, it must be accompanied by love. A heart in which bitterness and pride and jealousy and resentment linger cannot have the faith which brings God's blessing. Our lesson, covering varied points and incidents, hangs together beautifully in its total teaching of sincerity, pureness, love, faith, fruitfulness!

Important Announcement

BY THE simple expedient of mailing a letter to Mr. Frank L. Brown at practically the very moment he was leaving the city for a spot in Pennsylvania two thousand feet above ordinary mortals, we managed to prevent the completion of his copy for this week's talk upon "Leadership Training." For this accident, for which no one is to blame, however, we feel we must apologize to Mr. Brown and to his CHRISTIAN HERALD audience.

The splendid things we have arranged for our Sunday school page are taking just a little longer than we intended for adjustment to our schedule. Next week's issue will bring more of these special features into view, with the delayed instalment of Mr. Brown's course. Questions about Sunday school work are invited for consideration at the Round Table. Address all such correspondence to Mr. Frank L. Brown, care THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York. We shall be glad to hear direct from readers who care to express an opinion upon the page or to say what they most need in the discussion of the lessons.

A matter which should be especially interesting to every one connected with Sunday school work is the movement for a revised and improved hymnal. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD believes the time has arrived when a hymnal can be produced that will meet every requirement of the church and home, and be free from those blemishes which have aroused criticism in many quarters. The surest method by which to gather into one book the hymns which deserve to live and be sung for all time is to get from the largest possible number of Christian people the names of their abiding favorites among the hymns of the church.

So we invite you to help in the production of a hymnal that will be as nearly perfect as can be, by sending us the names of your very dearest favorites. Just those few hymns which you always look for when, in a little gathering at home or in the prayer meeting, you may be asked to name the one that shall be sung next. Not the hymns you like well enough, or that you think should be sung more, or that you have heard praised, or that you know others prefer: just those few choice hymns which you love best of all. Send us the names of those hymns if you would have the new national hymnal perfect. Address THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York, and be sure to sign your name and give your address. If in connection with any one hymn you have some striking reason for preferring it above others, tell us the story in the fewest possible words.

PRIZE FOOD

Palatable, Economical, Nourishing.

A Nebr. woman has outlined the prize food in a few words, and that from personal experience. She writes:

"After our long experience with Grape-Nuts, I cannot say enough in its favor. We have used this food almost continually for seven years.

"We sometimes tried other advertised breakfast foods but we invariably returned to Grape-Nuts as the most palatable, economical and nourishing of all.

"When I quit tea and coffee and began to use Postum and Grape-Nuts, I was almost a nervous wreck. I was so irritable I could not sleep nights, had no interest in life.

"After using Grape-Nuts a short time I began to improve and all these ailments have disappeared and now I am a well woman. My two children have been almost raised on Grape-Nuts, which they eat three times a day.

"They are pictures of health and have never had the least symptom of stomach trouble; even through the most severe siege of whooping cough they could retain Grape-Nuts when all else failed.

"Grape-Nuts food has saved doctor bills, and has been, therefore, a most economical food for us."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

MRS. J. W. writes from Winsted, Conn.: "I sent a request for prayers for a feeble child who was to have a dangerous surgical operation. It was successful, and he is on a fair way to recovery." Mrs. C. O., of Fort Collins, Colo., writes: "I am sure that it was through the prayers of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Prayer League and my own prayers that my boy found permanent work among helpful influences." R. L. writes from Tyrconnell, W. Va.: "I was very low with heart disease, but I asked the Lord to raise me up and give me health once more, and I would acknowledge his goodness to the world."

Miss C. T. writes from Kingstree, S. C.: "For years I have been in dreadful health and now since I joined the Prayer League and sent in my petition I have wonderfully improved." D. J. H. writes from Tallmadge, Ohio: "My request a few weeks since has been answered in part, and I wish to acknowledge my heavenly Father's goodness in sending me work that I so much needed, and giving me strength to do it."

M. H., of Cleves, Iowa, writes: "I wish to acknowledge that my prayers have been answered and that I have received a great blessing from the Lord." Mrs. A. R. S., eighty-one years of age, writes from Rockport, Mo.: "I have been very sick and want to acknowledge to the whole world the mercy and goodness of God in answering my own prayers and the prayers of others for my return to health."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from: E. K., Burlington, Ia.; N. G. S., Kensington, Ga.; Miss S., Le Roy, Ill.; E. L., Toronto, Can.; E. C., Brooklyn, N. Y.; M. M. J., Austin, Texas.

Mrs. M. E. B. asks prayers that her daughter may completely trust Christ for her salvation, that her husband's faith may be strengthened and that she herself may be delivered from a quick temper. L. K. asks prayer that her husband may cease brooding over domestic troubles, that an agreement may be reached concerning an old misunderstanding and that peace and happiness be restored. A Reader from Eva, S. C., asks prayer that estrangement from a friend may come to an end. Mrs. J. K., for special relief from severe trials.

Mrs. S. S. I. asks prayer for a revival in Chadbourn, N. C.; A Reader, for a revival at Marie, S. C.; S. M. W., for prohibition victory in a county of Florida; A. W. N. and Mrs. L. J., for a revival in Antioch Church of Rector, Ark.; Mrs. H. N. B., for a revival at Glenn, Calif.; Mrs. A. H., for a revival in church at Lipscomb, Texas; Mrs. B. C. H., for a revival at Ringgold, Ga.; L. B. S., Elmendorf, Texas, for victory for righteousness in fall elections. Rev. J. H., that God will bless to the fullest the church at Bath, N. Y., of which he is pastor; Mrs. O. McA., for the baptism of the Holy Spirit at a revival meeting soon to be held; Mrs. B. H. B., for a revival at York, N. D.

Mrs. D. A. and Mrs. M. L. ask prayer that the minds of sons may be restored; Mrs. M. B. H., that a daughter's mind may be restored; Mrs. C. L. W., that a sister's mind be restored; Mrs. S. S. I., Mrs. A. H. and B. M. K., for the mental healing of other relatives or friends. E. A. H., Mrs. A. H., Mrs. E. B. L., Mrs. M. J. C. and A. R. S. request prayer that their sight may be restored; Mrs. M. E. W., that daughter's sight may be restored; P. B., that father's sight may be restored; J. M. B., that sight of girl and a doctor be restored; Mrs. C. E. J., E. C. P., Mrs. E. K. and J. M. B., that threatened blindness be averted or partial blindness healed. Mrs. W. I. F., Mrs. E. B., Mrs. T. J. F., J. M. B., Mrs. A. H., Mrs. S. M. H., Mrs. M. J. C., that hearing be restored for themselves or friends.

S. M. W., S. J. P., Mrs. A. E. P., A. H. P. L., Mrs. S. W. W., Miss J. C. and S. B. B. request prayer that relatives or friends be delivered from the liquor habit.

The following friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing:

L. W.; Mrs. R. H. G.; Mrs. A. G. A.; A Friend, Nokomis, Ill.; A Reader, Hendricks, Minn. (that faith may grow stronger; also to have more peace in my soul); J. C. M.; Mrs. M. B. H.; C. W. R.; C. R. B.; E. A. H.; G. K. (to know sins are forgiven, also to have peace and guidance); Mrs. I. L. S.; P. M. A.; J. A. J.; N. McL.; Mrs. L. C.; I. W.; C. S. H.; S. T.; J. M. B.; Mrs. F. J. W.; M. E. S.; W. E. J.; Miss E. M.; B. M. K.; Mrs. W. S. B.; Miss A. B. G.; S. B. B.; Mrs. B. F. N.; E. M. L.; B. F. L.; Mrs. J. W. S.; Mrs. C. D.; Mrs. S. O.; Mrs. G. S. G.; Mrs. T. A. P.; A Reader, Westville, N. S.; A Reader, Headville, Vt.

The Go-to-Church Band

THERE were over 1,800 boys and girls in 86 churches, members of the Go-to-Church Band, who made a perfect record by attending preaching service once each Sunday for the term of four months ending with May. New Summer-Term Bands have been started, so that now there are over 100 churches in six denominations and 22 States that bear testimony to the good results obtained by this simple plan. The children respond far easier than the pastor expects. Word comes from Portland, Maine: "Our first term has thus far proved more satisfactory in results than we had anticipated."

A letter from Calumet, Mich., reports that forty members of their band made a second record in May, thus completing eight consecutive months without failure.

If any minister of the Gospel desires the willing attendance of the young where they can develop the church habit, he will find the problem ridiculously easy by starting a Go-to-Church Band, which calls for no change in his order of service, and the full details will be gladly supplied by the founder, Clinton Alvord, 7 Summer Street, Worcester, Mass.

Home Visitation Work

"WE cannot save the people unless we teach them. We cannot teach them unless we reach them. Home Visitation reaches everybody everywhere."

This was the keynote of the speech by J. Shreve Durham, superintendent of the Home Visitation Department of the International Sunday School Association. Mr. Durham reported that 31,000,000 persons were visited in the campaigns conducted since the establishment of the Home Visitation Department six years ago.

"The purpose of these campaigns is to furnish an accurate religious census to all of the churches and religious leaders, and to place invitations in every home inviting the people to attend the churches, synagogues and Sunday schools of their choice. Invitations are printed in the English, French, Spanish, Hebrew, Chinese, Japanese, Italian and Polish languages."

Where God Is

WHERE is thy God? they ask of me,
As if it were their thought that he,
Like mortal, should be found to be
In some one spot.

Ah, that their eyes thus sightless are!
Do they not see the world afar,
The mountain height, the sparkling star,
The lowly cot,

The babbling brook, the flowers fair,
The sun, the sea, the living air—
Ah, could they tell me anywhere
That God is not?

Questions and Answers

D. C., Cienfuegos, Cuba. I have been in meetings held by evangelists who seemed to me to be men of God. I have also been in meetings held by evangelists who did not seem to be men of God, and the latter were apparently blessed of God a great deal more than the former. Must we think that God blesses low ideals more than he does high ones? If I live close to God, must I not only expect persecution, but also failure in my efforts to serve him? The only answer I can give to these questions is that we must serve God and let him take care of the results.

No matter how extensive our Christian experience may be, we cannot formulate a set of rules and say that these are those by which the operation of the Holy Spirit is governed. God blesses the use of both lowly ideals and high ideals, but he chooses his own times, places, methods and instruments, and those who observe rightly know that the choice at times is such as bears out the Scripture declaration that the weak, the foolish, the simple, the despised and base things are used by the Spirit in order that the wise, the strong, and the great might be put to shame. (See I Cor. 1: 25-31.) Clearly it is not worldly wisdom and brilliant intellectual accomplishments that are indispensable in spiritual work. We ourselves have heard men who had no pretensions to culture and who knew little of theology, logic and rhetoric; yet they were used mightily of God in saving souls. We do not wish to be understood as undervaluing training and preparation, however. As to the sincerity of the worker, we are not to be the judges; God alone knoweth the heart. We should never allow our personal likes or dislikes to rule in such matters, nor should we forget that a man may be well adapted to his particular field and audiences, in spite of some disadvantages. After all, the real test is whether or not the Lord will acknowledge his work and make it to stand before the whole world.

A. C. B., Mansfield, La. 1. The phrase "mixed multitude" in Ex. 12: 38; Num. 11: 4, and Deut. 26: 11 means a great rabble, including slaves, persons in the lowest grades of society, natives and foreigners, companions in misfortune. 2. The Midianites were the descendants of the fourth son of Abraham by Keturah. They became a great people, the virtual rulers of Arabia and the head of a confederacy embracing all the Arabian branches of the Jewish race. The Ishmaelites and Midianites were the dominant tribes and were known among traders and even by historians by both appellations, the two being regarded as synonymous. 3. "Baal" is a generic name or title for god, meaning "lord," or "master." Hence it became customary to add distinguishing names to different deities, as "Baal-peor," "Baal-berith," etc. Baal-worship is of great antiquity, traces of it being found in Phœnician inscriptions, and also among the Babylonians and Assyrians.

B. S., Waterbury, Conn. No; mediation has not been a failure. It has accomplished two results which were worth striving for: (1) The signing of the protocols, settling the dispute between this country and Mexico, and (2) the bringing about of a conference between the Mexican factions for the adjustment of internal questions. This may not realize all that was hoped for, but it is a good beginning. The greatest outcome of it all is the precedent which the five republics have unitedly given to the world, in their earnest efforts for peace.

Mrs. F. D. A., Nelsonville, Ohio. There are various opinions among Bible expositors with regard to the scene of the Israelites' passage across the Red Sea. Some would place the point of passage at the Bitter Lakes and others near Suez, but the majority incline to Ras Atakah, south of Suez. Here there is a mile-long promontory and some five miles of water of varying depth, the channel proper, however, being only about three-fourths of a mile wide. The crossing was made between dark and dawn. (See Ex. 14: 20-24.)

Inquirer, Hartford. Pain is a difficult thing to measure. The sorrow of Jesus will always be one of the awe-inspiring, baffling events of the world story. It is impossible to read the Bible deeply, particularly after one has become personally acquainted with Jesus and observed the amazing power that the facts of his suffering and death possess over human souls, without realizing that there must have been far deeper anguish than can be accounted for by the mere facts of his humiliation, rejection, torture and death. If we consider the merely physical pain we must acknowledge that others have apparently borne as much, though we must also acknowledge that there are almos infinite degrees of susceptibility to pain. A wound which will cause little pain to a man o a certain temperament and organization ma be excruciating to one of finer and more acut sensitiveness. But the real agony of Jesu must have been different from either physic or mental. There is a soul note, a moral not in his suffering that puts it altogether beyon our comprehension. Matthew, Mark and Luk all record the fact that as he died he cried ou with a loud voice. That seems strange fro what we know of the dauntless courage o Jesus. Some immeasurable, inconceivable suf fering must lie back of that cry. So also hi appeal in the garden for deliverance at th last hour. There must have been an infinit anguish ahead to compel him to ask for an other way. We get the clearest hint in th grievous prayer from the cross: "My God, m God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Ther must have been some definite, conscious agonizing break in the eternal love which ha bound the Father and the Son together. Per haps there was deeper truth than the ancien formulators of the creed knew in those strang words: "He descended into hell." No—of a the griefs in the world that of Jesus, whil he was on the cross and while his body lay i the grave, is unique. Its depth, its duration none can know. They counted the hours h spent on the cross and the hours in the grave But what eternities of spirit anguish he ur derwent we may never know. But, prais God! they were enough to shock every peniten soul that hears of it into a new life, a life i which sin is hated and righteousness loved. life of which the crucified and risen Saviour i the eternal Light and the never-failing hop and joy.

W. A. P., Eureka, Mont. While the Bibl narrative does not state specifically tha Pharaoh himself was drowned in the Red Se (see Ex. 14: 23-28), yet the "Song of Moses (see Ex. 15: 4, 19) clearly warrants such construction. Some authorities have held tha the discovery of the mummy of Merenpta (the supposed Pharaoh of the Exodus) dis proves this; but it is not conclusive. That th Jews of later generations believed him to hav been overwhelmed with his host is evider from Ps. 136: 15 and other passages. In Ex 14: 30 it is stated that the Israelites saw th Egyptian dead lie upon the seashore, and th body of Pharaoh may have been among thos recovered from the general disaster.

W. H. L., Smith Center, Kan. Paul's view on the sphere of woman are well known, and h gave them frequent expression. He believe that for those who, like himself, were engage in spiritual work, it was better to have n domestic burdens, so that they might be le free to devote themselves to the Gospel. Ther are many minor things in his epistles whic were specially suited to the conditions an needs of his time, but concerning which au thorities are divided as to their modern appl cation. These, however, do not touch on th essentials of the faith.

O. B. S., Rexford, Pa. 1. The present po ulation of the globe is estimated as being abou 1,400,000,000 or 1,500,000,000. 2. John 21: 2 is generally interpreted as referring to Joh himself, being in a sense an attestation of th truthfulness of the Gospel he had written. Se a similar passage in chapter 19: 35.

J. R. C., Rentz, Ga. 1. We do not kno whether it was ever spread on the records Congress. 2. Same answer as No. 1. Yo can learn the fact, however, by writing to th clerk of the House of Representatives or th Librarian of Congress. 3 and 4. Our view on these matters have already been expresse repeatedly in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

The Story of John Mark*

WHY did John Mark leave Paul and Barnabas when they reached Perga? (Acts 13: 13.) Many have supposed that it may have been an ordinary case of homesickness. Mark was probably still a very young man, and there are many reasons for believing that his mother's house in Jerusalem was an unusually pleasant one. That it was somewhat pretentious is indicated by the fact that, although a city house, it had a "gate." There was not only a gate, but a "damsel" to keep it, who was probably a servant. Then, too, it was a home of considerable sociability, and sociability of the right sort, for it was one of the headquarters of the Christians at Jerusalem. When Peter was miraculously released from prison (Acts 12) he went, as a matter of course, to the home of John Mark's mother and found there his Christian companions met to pray for his release. It is quite natural to believe that thoughts of such a home would be very alluring to a young man accompanying two older men on a difficult mission through unfamiliar country in which they constantly met with misunderstanding and opposition.

The thought might occur that there is just the possibility of a hint of romance in the simple facts as they are recorded. There is nothing in the English text of the passage itself to indicate that the "damsel" Rhoda was a servant. Certainly it is a pretty name, "Rhoda," the Greek word for rose, and the fact that her name is remembered so distinctly and recorded definitely might weigh on the side of her being a free maid, not a handmaid. That would make a good start for a delightful story—two young Christians, John and Rose, members of the same church, the girl one of the devout worshipers who gathered in the home of the young man's mother. If anything could bear out this hint we might imagine that along with his homesickness and his desire to see his mother, young John might have been thinking of Rose and wishing to return that he might be with her. And, as a matter of fact, it may be true. Commentators compare Rhoda's act and position with that of the "damsel that kept the door" at the high priest's house (John 18: 17). But Luke does not say in this narrative from the Acts (Acts 12: 12-16) that Rhoda "kept the door." Some one knocked and she ran to listen. They were always fearing hostile intruders, these early Christian worshipers. When she heard Peter's voice she was so overcome with glad bewilderment that, instead of opening the door, she ran back to tell the rest. Finally "they" opened the door.

But to turn from these fanciful suggestions, there were probably deeper reasons why Mark went home. He seems to have been a strict Jew, perhaps something of a ritualist. He foresaw that Paul was to be the dominant force, rather than his own cousin, Barnabas. They were facing new territory, new plans, new spiritual and evangelistic adventures. It may have been a matter of conscience with him; he may have considered Paul a dangerous leader, one who would take the young church into wrong directions and wrong practices. He was not ready to break loose from the ceremonial law of Moses. The church council described in the fifteenth chapter of Acts had not yet been held, and he may not have felt convinced that Paul's pioneering among the Gentiles was right. At any rate he went home. And Paul was so displeased that he would not consent to take him with them on their next trip (Acts 15: 38-40).

But later Mark becomes one of the beloved friends and allies of the great apostle to the Gentiles. He understood God's great plan of offering salvation to all the world. He labored arduously; he wrote a life of Jesus; he comforted Paul during his first imprisonment at Rome (Col. 4: 10, 11), and the apostle asked Timothy to bring Mark with him when he came to visit him in his last imprisonment (II Tim. 4: 11), "for," he said, "he is useful to me for ministering."

Surely Mark "made good." He was the friend of both Peter and Paul, trusted and beloved by these leaders of two different groups of early Christians, with different conceptions and temperaments.

Mark's Gospel is the basis of New Testament study. It gives in short, crisp, dramatic statement the life of Jesus. If Mark had lived to-day he would have made a good newspaper man, would perhaps have been one of the energetic young "publicity men" who are bringing the news of Christ's kingdom, through printer's ink, to the attention of the world.

How to Be Free*

FREEDOM is among the dearest of life's possessions. Indeed, life without freedom is scarcely life at all. Men's souls are enslaved in many ways, but the two mightiest masters of enslaved souls are sin and error. Throughout the Bible these two ideas are connected: sin and folly, or error. To be wise is to be good. Sin and falsehood, sin and superstition, sin and unbelief—these are the alliances that capture and enslave the human soul.

But Jesus breaks these bonds. He tells us the truth; he shows us the truth; he leads us in the way of truth. He cleanses our hearts from sin, breaking its power by the greater power of his love and grace. "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." "If the Son make you free ye shall be free indeed." "I am the truth." That is the only way to attain real liberty—to let Jesus set us free from sin and lead us in the way of truth.

The real secret of Christ's emancipating power is love. He comes to show us that the life of true liberty is the life which is dominated by love. The man who is selfish is a slave. He thinks he is free, but he is not. He thinks he is doing as he pleases. But following sin he is forging the chains of a most loathsome and cruel bondage. Jesus and Paul both use that startling phrase, "Slaves of sin." The selfish, sinful man must be held in by laws and all sorts of restraints. The man who truly loves his neighbor, the man who really longs to help others, is the man who can be trusted. He is the free man because his impulses are kindly and will bring harm to none. This is what Paul declares: "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor, therefore love is the fulfilling of the law." He is free from enslaving habits, free from the ugly consequences of sin; free from the terrors of law, both human and divine; for the penalties of the law cannot touch him because love leads him to keep the law.

A beautiful highway this is along which Jesus is leading his free hosts. It is the highway of truth; it is the highway of holiness; it is the highway of love; it is the highway of light, the light of his presence who is the Light of the World.

When Baby is Sick

What mother has not been frightened almost out of her wits by some unusual symptom developed by baby, only to find after the physician's visit that it really amounted to nothing.

There are, perhaps, more unnecessary visits paid by physicians to babies and children for slight ailments than for all adult illnesses combined. This is for the reason that the mother is unable to read baby's speechless protests.

Dr. David Orr Edson, one of New York's most prominent physicians, found a few years ago that he was paying almost numberless unnecessary visits to infants. So great did this burden become because of his large practice that he decided to work out some method to reduce these unnecessary calls, and at the same time give to mothers the benefit of his wide experience.

In order to do this, he wrote a comprehensive book—containing only the most essential matter—on "the care and feeding of infants"—a book that hundreds of mothers have found to be the most helpful of its kind published. Not only does the book show you just what food should be given at every age, but it enables the mother to quickly locate all the many little ailments to which all babies are subject, and shows exactly what to do in each case. It is a veritable guide to the proper care of children from birth to five years of age.

Simple remedies are also furnished in a handy medicine case accompanying the book. This medicine case contains a number of remedies, each filled with Dr. Edson's most successful medicines for the particular complaint for which it is intended. They are the same remedies Dr. Edson himself would prescribe were he to call personally.

Among the men prominent in New York business and social life who have known Dr. Edson personally and professionally, the following names are used by authority:

Otis H. Cutler
Pres. American Brake Shoe and Foundry Co.
Frederick D. Underwood, Pres. Erie R.R.
Admiral Marshall, United States Navy
William G. Penrce
Pres. Manganese Steel Rail Company
Frederick Fowler
Vice-Pres. Gotham National Bank

A Great Convenience

By comparing the symptoms of your child with those described in the book, it will be found easy to diagnose most of the ailments of infancy and childhood. Directions as to dosages, age and hygienic treatment are explicit. All the prescriptions in the cases are given in the book, so that your physician may see them and your druggist refill them, or should you prefer, they may be replenished by Dr. Edson at a nominal cost. Every remedy is in soluble tablet form.

Dr. Edson's Infant Remedies are not designed to dispense with a physician. They are designed only to save the many expensive and unnecessary calls which every anxious mother feels obliged to incur at the first sign of trouble.

Where there is no physician at hand, such as in traveling or in the country, both remedies and book are indispensable. Many mothers have said that never have they been so free from anxiety as since having Dr. Edson's outfit on hand.

Who is Dr. Edson?

Dr. David Orr Edson is the son of ex-Mayor Franklin Edson of New York City, and brother of Dr. Cyrus Edson, for many years Health Commissioner of the City of New York. He is a graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York City and completed his studies in Berlin. He was for many years Attending Physician at the New York Charity Hospital and is Medical Examiner for the New York Produce Exchange, an institution known throughout the world.

To have Dr. Edson's book and Infant Remedies in the house is almost like having the family physician of New York's most prominent people continuously at your service, ready to advise you about feeding and to prescribe for baby's slightest ailment. Yet the price of book and case together is only $3.00, whereas a single call from Dr. Edson would cost many times three dollars.

The case is handy in size, 5x6 inches, and is neatly covered with durable Spanish leather. It contains Dr. Edson's standard remedies in bottles with full directions. The book, which contains about eighty pages, is also bound in leather and is so arranged and indexed that one can instantly turn to the subject matter wanted. The prescriptions for the remedies are also printed in the book.

SHOULD PROTESTANTS COMPETE FOR STATE RECOGNITION?

they note with extreme pleasure and cause others to note with emphasis that the President of the United States is paying deference to the Roman Catholic Church.

For this reason we have felt scandalized at the President's action. He cannot but be aware—for he reads the papers as we do—what interpretation the Roman Catholic hierarchy is constantly putting on his attendance at the Pan-American Mass. Even if he were a Catholic and attended the mass as a Roman Catholic church-member, he would not come as the President of the United States. It would seem to be his duty to stop a procedure that is not warranted by his station. He has not done so hitherto, and hence he cannot object to having his action ascribed to political influence. Just for that reason his action is extremely censurable. It is utterly un-American.

The Reformed Church Synod, we believe, in passing the resolutions we have cited, is doubly at fault: (1) By doing what it should not have done: trying to coerce the President morally into taking a religious stand; (2) by not doing what it might have done with propriety: telling him plainly that he is wrong in attending the Pan-American Mass as President of the United States.

It remains to be seen what the outcome of this business begun at Asbury Park will be. The New York Times reports that "the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America is to organize in the national capital a united service of all the Protestant churches, and to invite the President, Vice-President, and Cabinet to attend it." The official resolution shows that this report was correct. "In substance," says the New York paper, "the plan is to set up an opposition service, and force the President to go on record as favoring the one or the other." In the first place, we do not believe that the Federal Council will obtain the consent of all the Protestant churches of Washington for the "united service." The service, if it is held at all, will not be representative of all Protestantdom. In the second place, what will the Federal Council or the Reformed Church Synod have gained if the President, as may happen, attends both the "united service" of the Protestants and the Pan-American Mass? Or if he alternates between the two, attending the one this year and the other the next year? In that event the Federal Council and Reformed Church Synod will have been placed by the President—and that justly and by their own invitation—in the same category with the Roman Catholic Church: both are rivals for state honors and preferment! "Oh, what a fall was there, my countrymen!"

And what will happen if the Jews demand the President's attendance at a service of theirs, to "make him take a stand," or if the Greeks, the Christian Scientists, the Theosophical Society, etc., proceed to "put the President on record" by inviting him to a religious function of theirs? If the President's attendance at the service of a church is a prize to be coveted and striven for, all have a right to enter the race; or rather, what the President grants to one he must grant to all.

In any attempt to rival Rome in a public exhibition, we venture to predict, Rome will always come out winner. Rome's leaders are experts in arranging monster parades and mass meetings and in surrounding them with all the pomp and glory that the populace loves so much to behold. When, lately, death's sable pageant moved through the streets of some of our larger cities and the nation stood with bared and bowed heads at the bier and grave of the marines who lost their lives in the seizure of the Mexican port of Vera Cruz by our government, Rome was on hand with a grand military mass at the Brooklyn Navy Yard. Its glories were described with a wealth of bold-face type and columns of reporters' copy in the New York dailies, and it was recorded with particular stress that the officiating priest had stood on the exact spot on which the President had stood a few days before. Compared with this effort of Rome what a poor showing was made by the memorial service at the West End Memorial Church, held on the same day! Of course, we do not mean to say that if Protestants were sure beforehand that they could win in their rivalry with Rome, they might try. Even in localities where Protestants could easily win if they tried, we would hold such rivalry to be wrong in principle.

And what would it all lead to? Rome has now inaugurated an annual memorial service for letter-carriers who have died during the year. Two thousand New York letter-carriers marched in procession to St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York on May 25, were welcomed by Monsignor Lavelle and listened to a memorial sermon, and "William E. Kelly, postmaster of Brooklyn, attended the service"—the reporter did not overlook this fact. Good reporter! Rome has already an annual mass for the army, one for the navy, one for the policemen, one for the firemen of New York City. Are Protestants now to arrange competitive services for all of these purposes? Rome is always doing something spectacular and planning new schemes to display the glory and the power of its church. Will Protestants always try to rival and imitate them?

The strength of the Protestant position is dissipated as soon as Protestants are misled into an attempt to rival Rome. Rome will, for a time, be perfectly willing to divide political honors and emoluments with Protestants. Rome has really gained the greatest thing she is striving for from Protestants: an acknowledgment of her standing claim that it is right in principle that the state should be subordinate and serviceable to the church. Which church alone the state should and must serve, that question Rome may wisely choose to postpone for future settlement at a more opportune time and under more favorable conditions.

Romances of Modern Business*

Beauty and Printers' Ink

OUT in Cleveland there is a drug-store, perched on a quiet corner in the Ohio metropolis. It is an unpretentious building, much like many another drug-store. Yet loyal Clevelanders passing with a visitor, point to it with pride. "There," they are wont to say "is where Fred Stecher got his start."

And then will follow the story of the young Cleveland pharmacist who filled prescriptions, sold stamps, and graciously met all the demands made upon a community-druggist before he made a fortune out of Pompeian Cream.

This Cleveland druggist—Mr. Frederick W. Stecher—began to study the inquiries of his customers in the hope of discovering some definite need that he might fill. It was not long before he realized that every woman who came into his store was interested in enhancing her good looks and in preserving her youthful appearance.

Age-old fact though this was, it was an inspiration to young Stecher. He concluded that a different kind of a face-cream designed to clean the skin pores would have a wide appeal to lovers of good complexions.

A few months later the young druggist was doing a thriving local business with Pompeian Massage Cream.

That was in 1901. Mr. Stecher reasoned that if he could address millions of readers of periodicals at once he could create a great demand for his product.

Fired with faith and enthusiasm the druggist came to New York in 1902. He explained his proposition to several advertising men. They discouraged him. But Stecher would not be disheartened. He looked up another advertising man and met that Columbus of the advertising fraternity, Mr. William H. Johns.

"What is your cream good for?" asked the advertising agent. Mr Stecher explained that it was a massage cream to rub in and rub out bringing the pore-dirt with it. Mr Johns discovered an idea there. "It's worth a trial, at least," he said. So the Ohioan accepted a plan as outlined and gave his check for two hundred and twenty-nine dollars, the cost of the first two magazine advertisements.

The following month the advertisements appeared, and it was only a short while before the little drug-store in Cleveland was unable to meet the demand for samples of Pompeian Cream requested by magazine readers in all parts of the country.

The rest of the story is one of phenomenal growth. Less than a year after the first advertising appeared in the periodicals, the business had outgrown the drug-store. A large new place with facilities for manufacturing and distributing was secured. Today nearly fifty thousand barbers use Pompeian Cream in their shops, approximately fifty thousand druggists sell and feature it, and about twenty thousand beauty shops throughout the country use this product.

"The real test of advertising," said Mr. W. W. Wheeler, secretary of the Pompeian Company, "is the response. From the first, Mr. Stecher pinned his faith in national advertising.

"As the business grew, the cost of manufacturing decreased. As fast as the money came in he put it into advertising. The world has come to know Pompeian Cream solely through periodical publicity.

"The time has passed when the manufacturer could depend on the dealer to make his product salable. The dealer has crawled into his shell. He says to the manufacturer: 'Create the demand and I will handle your goods.' This means advertising, and advertising is growing more important and necessary to business all the time."

* This is one of a series of articles being published to show how leading national periodicals are serving the public through dependable advertising.

ATTRACTIVENESS

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

THE two girls were getting dressed for a large dinner when I dropped in to call for them. It's fun to get into the habit of being early—you see and hear so many things. As I sat in the big cretonne-covered chair by the window, I heard a discussion that interested me a great deal.

It had been a hot day. The twilight was falling all around us like a heavy cotton blanket—so heavy and stifling that things like party dresses, and ribbons, and large hairpins seemed unnecessary burdens. In the consciousness that my gown was new, I tried to feel cool, but failed miserably.

"How hot it is!" I sighed. The blonde girl who was struggling with a refractory hook paused for a moment and dabbed at her face with a dainty handkerchief.

"Hot?" she queried sarcastically. "Of course it's hot. It's so hot that I don't care how I look or what I wear. See my hair? It's a wreck, but I don't care. See my dress? It needs pressing; but I wouldn't press it for anything on a night like this. It's a very fussy dinner, but I don't care if the King of England and the President of the United States are coming. It's hot, and I don't care how I look!"

She paused breathlessly, and subconsciously I glanced at my other friend. She was standing in front of the mirror and as I looked at her I saw the grace of her dainty gown, the perfect neatness and charming simplicity of her slippers. While I feasted my eyes on her she paused in the work of rolling a rebellious lock of hair into a gleaming coil, and without turning her head she spoke to us.

"You're all wrong, dear," she told the blonde girl gently. "All wrong. Even if it is a hot night and you are tired, do press the little dress. You might be sorry if you got over there and felt mussed up. Come here and I'll put a few tiny hairpins in the curly part around your forehead. They do wonders on a night like this. It's a girl's duty to be as attractive as possible, even in hot weather."

With graceful, deft fingers she was patting the pretty blond head in front of a mirror—adding a pin or taking one away. Her slender fingers smoothed a crumpled frill into some semblance of neatness, and her quick eye caught a tiny rip that she drew up with careful stitches. As she worked, I sat and tried to keep cool, and thought.

There are narrow-minded people in this world who believe in discouraging signs of beauty on the ground that it produces conceit. I knew of a woman who braided her little daughter's hair in tight pigtails, and so discouraged a charming tendency to curl. Although at the time the young child did not object in the least, since she has grown up she often thinks that the proceeding was unnecessary in the extreme. Moreover, the tendency to conceit was not crushed, for the girl wears many bumpy curl papers to bed every night and has a profusion of ringlets, despite the fact that her natural ones were spoiled in the making.

Personally, I certainly like to see a girl well dressed. Not dressed in loud or immodest clothing, or in extremely fashionable clothing, but dressed in clothes that fit, and are neat, with buttons and hooks on and fresh collars. Also I think that becoming dresses are no sign of conceit.

Commuting on our suburban trains is not a very pleasant experience. Neither is it a clean one—for coal-dust and cinders are not conducive to neatness—but it is a very illuminating one. You see girls, hundreds of them, going to work in the big city. And very few of the hundreds look neat every day. It's a hard thing to battle with the dust and the heat of the crowded trains, and I do not blame the girls who come to work with rather mussed collars, and straggling hair, and torn gloves.

There is a girl whom I often see on the train. She is a very attractive girl, but you can see at a glance that she has made herself attractive by exerting a great deal of care on her personal appearance. Every morning when the train pulls into her station, people put down their papers and look for the girl, and when she comes in, radiant and well gowned, the passengers follow her with their eyes. As one little old lady said to me: "I love to watch her. She comes in like a fresh breeze with the fragrance of flowers in it."

The duty of being attractive falls, I think, almost more heavily on the married women than it does on the girls. So often a woman will dress well and fix her hair becomingly before marriage, and seem to lose all interest in her personal appearance afterward. A great many romances lose the rose-tint of love because of sloppy kimonos and shapeless dinner dresses and tight, knobby hair-curlers. Divorces may result from a great many causes, but I think that perhaps half of them occur because the wife fails to be attractive in the privacy of her own home.

Girls dear, and married girls, I am not trying to encourage the tiny spark of vanity that grows in every human heart, but I am trying to swell the tiny spark of self-respect that should grow in every human mind. If the gracious Father above had wanted us to be ugly, he would have made us without hair or teeth or complexions or eyelashes; but instead, he made almost every one with at least one attractive feature. If you are plain, I think that it is easy to acquire charm by the neatness and becomingness of your clothing. And, girls dear, if you are pretty, it is your duty to make the most of God's gift to you.

WHEN the nerves cry out—and when the bonds of business, home ties, or the expense of travel, hold the sufferer to the beaten path—a good tonic may bring timely, restorative help.
The very aid the nerves need to rebuild them, to give back the health and courage drained by work or worry, is brought to them by Sanatogen. And this nourishing help comes in a form that makes it natural and easy for the depleted cells of the system to absorb it.
When more than 21,000 American and European physicians, over their own signatures, speak of this efficiency of Sanatogen as a restorative help, when famous men and women everywhere write grateful letters to tell of the great and lasting benefit Sanatogen has conferred upon them—need you hesitate to test the value of this help for yourself?
Sanatogen is sold by good druggists everywhere in three sizes, from $1.00.
Charles D. Sigsbee
Rear Admiral, U.S. Navy, writes:
"After a thorough trial of Sanatogen, I am convinced of its merit as a food and tonic. Its beneficial effects are beyond doubt."
The Right Rev. The Bishop of Southampton writes:
"It gives me pleasure to bear my testimony to the value of Sanatogen as an invigorating tonic and restorative. It is undoubtedly beneficial."

A New Herniał Appliance

This Invention Holds More Firmly, Comfortably and Surely Than Any Truss.

Sent on Trial

The new Brooks Appliance for rupture so thoroughly meets every test and requirement that it is ordered by the U. S. War Dept. and is recognized as the most reliable support ever invented. It is fitted with an Automatic Air Cushion which follows every movement of the body and always covers the ruptured spot. The cushion which comes in contact with the skin is soft, pliable gum rubber and clings closely, so that slipping is impossible, and it is cool and comfortable because of the constant circulation of air through it.

This Appliance is sold under a positive guarantee of money refunded if not satisfactory. We do not guarantee to cure any more than any doctor will guarantee to cure his patient. We do guarantee to furnish a perfect fitting Appliance, which will give the wearer solid comfort and retain the protrusion at all times. The purchaser is the sole judge and if for any reason whatever (which does not have to be furnished us) it is returned, the price paid will be refunded in full.

THE people you meet on the hotel veranda, along the beach, on the tennis court, in the ballroom, the pleasure bent men and women who always appear fresh, cool and scrupulously clean—they prove the possibilities in Ivory Soap.

Their soft, smooth skin shows that, after exposure to the hot sun, the Ivory bath is as beneficial as it is delightful; that the mild, pure lather can do nothing but good, and allays, rather than aggravates, any irritation from heat or perspiration.

Their fresh summer garments show that Ivory Soap can be trusted for the most exacting and seemingly impossible cleansing; that, working safely wherever water itself does no harm, the non-alkaline, neutral Ivory restores to their original beauty the most delicate woolens, silks, linens and laces—the garments which one loves to wear and dreads to clean.

OCEAN GROVE PREPARING FOR THE GREAT ANNUAL CAMP-MEETING

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

WHEN I left New York the sun was shining faintly, appealingly, from behind a heavy bank of light gray clouds, but as the train swept on past the hills and trees id long sandy meadows, the sun ducked out of ght and the first drops began to patter against e car window. I was starting on another journey the rain.

On past station platforms crowded with imposing nousines, past hotels with gay striped awnings, ast tiny cozy bungalows with doll-house fences id lawns, rushed the train, a red-brown streak gainst a wall of shifting dulness, and then sud-nly we rounded a corner and the ocean leaped out o meet the shimmering silver ribbon of the track. When the train slowed down to my station I got out ith a vision of cold angry waves moaning to a cold, ngry sky that hung droopingly in the horizon, and he words of the old hymn rang through my mind:

COMING OUT OF THE CHILDREN'S TEMPLE

For those in peril on the sea.

nd for a moment I forgot that I was in one of od's own gardens. No place is a very pleasant ne on a rainy day, but Ocean Grove is never nattractive. Through the swirling drops the buildings loom up imposingly and the tents shine out through the gloom with the dull shine of a well-behaved family of tiny, very wet ducks. Off in the distance the boom-booming of the surf came to my ears, and near by in the huge Auditorium I could hear the swelling of beautiful organ notes. Slowly I made my way along the walk that led past the Children's Temple and the buildings where the low hum of voices raised in prayer came toward me. I felt years away from the rush and bustle of New York as I stood there, all alone in the fog, a great peace on my heart. It was clear the next morning when I woke up, but the fog still hung mistily over the ocean. People spoke of rain in scared voices, and the children hurried away to play while there was still a little sunshine.

As I was leaving the dining-room a sweet little lady came to me and asked me if I would like to go to the Young People's Meeting with her. I was mighty glad to accept the invitation, for Ocean Grove was a little strange to me, and a friendly word is a great help in a lonely place.

The meeting was held in a building that was very large, although it paled into insignificance beside the Auditorium, and it was led by the Rev. W. H. Morgan, D.D., of New York. We arrived just in time to join in the opening hymn, and as we walked far to the front, I had a confused glimpse of hundreds—thousands—of bright, happy faces. Our seats were on the side facing the minister and partly facing the congregation, and as the hymn was finished it was a beautiful sight to see the pastor raise his hands while the huge company of people, old and young (for though the morning service is called a Young People's Meeting, everybody attends), sank to their seats and bowed their heads. The prayer and the responsive readings were short, but very beautiful. After they were over the pastor announced his subject for the morning, and you can imagine my surprise when he said that he was going to talk about "Pollyanna."

I never realized until that morning how far the influence of our "glad" little heroine had spread. There were people from the North and South, the East and West, all talking about the lesson that one tiny book-girl taught them. As I sat there I fell to wishing that every one who loved Pollyanna could be with me in the midst of a crowd of friendly people, listening to Dr. Morgan.

"You all know about the book," he began, "and about the little girl who crept into the hearts of her friends and people who tried not to like her. You know all about the game that she learned from her father, because a pair of crutches came in a missionary barrel, instead of the doll she wanted! I think that we have all learned lessons from her. Perhaps you people do not realize her bravery, but then you've never had missionary barrels, and I have—I've had some barrels that were dandies, and some—but I want you all to tell me what Pollyanna has done for you. Speak up, all of you."

WHERE THE GREAT MEETINGS ARE HELD

From the back seat a man stood up. He had a black band around his sleeve. "Pollyanna," he said in a quavering voice, "taught me to hunt for the silver linings of the dark clouds."

From the very front row a pretty young woman stood up. Her cheeks were a bit pink with embarrassment, but she finally managed to give her message: "Pollyanna," she told us, "taught me the things that should be put in missionary barrels."

"I'm just filling in now," said Dr. Morgan, "but I want to tell you what happened in a Pollyanna meeting in our church. An old Irish woman hobbled down the aisle, and stood up by the pulpit. 'When I was walkin' down th' avenue,' she said, 'I shlipped and sprained me ankle, an' I've been bein' glad ever since that I haven't bruk me leg!' "

The little lady who brought me with her stood up in her seat: "Pollyanna," she said gently, "taught me to be glad every day and—"

"God bless you, sister," said the minister.

The meeting was nearly over; but I want to tell you one more story that Dr. Morgan told us.

"A friend of mine," he said, "had a mocking-bird that he wanted to teach a certain song. He whistled and sang and coaxed, but the bird kept looking through the open window at the grass and the flowers and the trees. At last the man in desperation put a heavy cloth over the cage, and then, with the bird in total darkness, he began to whistle the tune. After a few minutes he took the cover off and the bird, released from close quarters, burst into music and sang the tune, note for note. He had learned it in the dark. That's what Pollyanna is teaching us—to sing in the dark!"

That afternoon I went to a meeting in the Children's Temple. Several hundred youngsters were there singing away at the special songs they were learning for the August camp-meetings. Professor Tali Esen Morgan was leading them, and they looked up into his face with a perfect understanding rarely seen between children and a grown-up. I had wondered, as I came up, how they could get enough children away from their sand forts to make a good-sized attendance; but when I saw them sitting there and saw their happy little faces I realized that they were having a good time and that they loved their leader. I wanted to be a tiny child and sit in a little chair and sing the soul out of me as they were doing. I wished that I could be able to see the real camp-meetings and hear the finished work.

At Ocean Grove the days are crowded full, every hour, with prayer and song, and beautiful meetings and wonderful music, with the inspiration of man and the love of God. Just now everything is in a bustle of preparation for the camp-meeting. Extra tents are being added to the already long avenues, and extra singers are with the regular choir. Thousands are flocking in from all over the country, for the largest camp-meeting in the world is no small matter.

AN IDEAL HOUR ON AN IDEAL BEACH

The camp-meeting begins on Sunday, the 30th of August. It will be opened at 10.30 A.M. by Dr. W. F. Oldham, secretary of the Missionary Society. Although the complete schedule has not been made out, the following preachers have been secured for the meetings: Rev. T. T. McKenney, Philadelphia; Rev. R. F. De Coursey, Wilmington; Rev. A. W. Cooper, Reading; Rev. Robert Bagnell, Philadelphia; Dr. Westcott, Jersey City; Rev. A. W. Hays, Madison, N. J.; Rev. E. L. Watson, Baltimore; Rev. Allan MacRossie, district superintendent, New York City. The evangelist, Gipsy Smith, will be present for five days, and the after-meetings will be in charge of Rev. C. M. Boswell of Philadelphia.

Monday, September 7 (Labor Day), will be last of the camp-meeting, and the most impres day of the week. All the meetings will unite in Auditorium, children will be baptized, the dep ments will give their reports, and the entire gregation will do the famous "Walk About Je salem."

The Devotional Committee this year cons of seven men whose names are known throughout the United States especially to the readers of this jo nal. They are the Rev. A. E. Balla Rev. Frank L. Wilson, Rev. W. Morgan, Bishop Wilson, James L. H Rev. Charles L. Mead, and the H T. E. Andrus. The music is again charge of Professor Morgan and ganist Clarence Reynolds.

During the "Pollyanna" meeting woman got up to give a testimony:

"I am glad," she said, "that we h Ocean Grove—a place where every may worship regardless of creed or nomination, under the same vine fig-tree."

"Yes," responded Dr. Morgan, am I. It is a forerunner of heave for there, too, people will worship gardless of creed or denomination, they are little things, indeed."

I, too, am glad that we have Oc Grove.

One day when I was in a train, flashed past a sign-painter who covering a plain plank with bri colors—making a picture for the wo to see. I hope that I have used my writing-pad effectively as the sign-painter used his plank. colors may be a trifle too light or too dark in sp but I trust you can see the picture clearly—a can understand the drawing that underlies roughness of the sketch:

Sea and sky that meet together,
Tents that creep along the ground,
Buildings large that loom before us.
Music soft that steals around.
Ocean Grove, where earnest Christians
Find the beauty of God's love,
Boundless as the rolling ocean,
Steadfast as the sky above.

ARCHEOLOGY AND THE BIBLE

BY PROFESSOR A. T. CLAY, Babylonian Department, Yale University

CRITICS of the advanced school have maintained that one of the results of modern scholarship is the determination that the patriarchs are not historical. Research, they declare, has disproved the claim that they were real characters. But not alone the patriarchs are relegated to the region of myth and legend, but other prominent personalities of the Old Testament as well. The extreme positions have won few adherents, but the less advanced are popularized to such an extent that they have been brought into some of the helps that are furnished for instruction in the Sunday school; the result being that the child is impressed with the conviction that the patriarchs are not to be considered real characters.

Archeology, however, has come to the rescue, and has upset the theorists. The spade of the excavator and the skill of the decipherer have brought so much light to bear upon the subject that these critics have frequently been compelled to modify or change their position.

At one time, the entire historical background of the patriarchal histories in the Old Testament was declared to be fiction. It was claimed that the political situation was altogether different. Even the names of the kings mentioned in the 14th chapter of Genesis were declared to be the creation of a late Jewish writer, or were etymological plays upon subsequent events. But the very foundations upon which these theories rested are gradually being swept away by scholarly research. Whenever the monuments throw any light upon the subject, the hypotheses are invariably found wanting.

Scholars now generally admit that Amraphel is identified with the great Hammurabi. In some instances, his name is written Ammurapi. No satisfactory explanation of the additional letter "l" in the Hebrew has been offered; but there can be no doubt that the names are identical. The name of the leader of the expedition, Chedorlaomer of Elam, is composed of two well-known elements in Elamitic names, namely kudur, meaning "servant," and Lagamar, the name of a god; i. e., Kudur-Lagamar. A similar name is that of the father of Arioch, namely, Kudur Mabug. It is now held as probable that Chedorlaomer was also a son of Kudur-Mabug, and a brother of Arioch.

The name written with two signs in Sumerian, meaning Uru or Eri, and Sin or Aku, has been identified as Arioch. The name has also been read as if Semitic, namely, Wared-Sin, but the other is preferred. As he preceded his brother named Rim-Sin on the throne, who was overthrown by Hammurabi, there yet remains to be explained how Hammurabi and this king were allied in the campaign to Palestine. The explanation probably is that it took place in the early part of Hammurabi's career.

Although Chedorlaomer of Elam was the leader of the invasion, the account in the fourteenth of Genesis was written after Hammurabi had conquered Elam and Larsa, and had become the ruler of Western Asia. This is shown by the fact that the story is dated "in the days of Amraphel." At the time of the invasion he was only a vassal of Chedorlaomer.

Arioch, who dedicated a lately discovered inscription to his goddess Innina, was an Elamite on his father's side at least, for, as stated, he was the son of Kudur-Mabug. Even his own name may be Elamitic, although ruling over Ellasar, i. e., Larsa of southern Babylonia. This fact is peculiarly important in connection with the discussion concerning the historicity of the fourteenth chapter of Genesis. An Elamite is the leader of the allies in the invasion referred to in the chapter. It is the only reference in the Old Testament to Elamitic suzerainty over Palestine. And most remarkable is it that the only claim made by Elam to suzerainty over Palestine, which is known in the inscriptions, is at this time. Kudur-Mabug, the father of Arioch, uses as his title, "Father," or "Suzerain of Amurru," which included Palestine and Syria. Knowing these facts, we have a reason why the kings of Elam and Larsa were allies in this invasion, for they were father and son. Moreover, there is a reason why Amraphel should also be allied with the others, for until his thirty-first year he was subservient to Elam; after which time he conquered Rim-Sin, the brother of Arioch, and drove the Elamites from the land. And when we reflect that this is practically the first historical reference in the Old Testament that we could hope to corroborate—because here the first contact is recorded with those who have handed down records—the knowledge of these facts derived from monumental sources must be regarded as remarkable.

After having ascertained that these kings of patriarchal times are historical personages, and that the background of the patriarchal period in Genesis is in absolute accordance with fact, t question can properly be asked: Is the histori character of the patriarchs themselves ackno edged by these critics? Here a new hypothesis advanced by the critics. Some late Jewish writ they tell us, became acquainted with these histori facts concerning the invasion, into which he wo his story of the patriarchs, and in this way creat a father of Israel, and the beginning of the Hebr race. Suffice it to say that this is mere theo and that every atom of archeological evidence th can be brought to bear upon the subject corr orates the view that the patriarchs are historical

The new inscription of Arioch, which has be secured for the Babylonian Collection of Yale U versity, is a hymn to Innina or Ishtar. It is s to have been found by Arabs in their clandesti diggings at Larsa. The exact purpose of the votive cones has never been determined. T cone of Arioch, an unusually large one, read "To Innina (or Ishtar), the exalted lady of spl dor, priestess of hosts, the eldest daughter of t god Sin, his lady, Eri-Aku (Arioch), the favor prince of Nippur, the adored of Ur, the overseer the cities Girsu and Shirpurla, who in the temp Ebabbar is revered, king of Larsa, king of Sum and Accad, the beloved lord of the harvest, w fulfils the commands, who built anew the temple the gods, who had made a colossal bronze stat of her kingship, who restored its greatness her overturned city; who truly rebuilt her wa who truly caused to be inhabited greatly her wid spread land; exalted of heart, the warrior w turns them back, am I; to whom a wide unde standing for the conduct of the city's works Ea h given; for the sake of Innina, the lady of petitio her house of splendor, the awe-inspired dwelling her joyous heart, according to its old appearance its interior he filled with light more than before, h E-shu-sig-ga he enlarged for the future, for l life he built it. Its head he reared high; like mountain he made it lofty. On these brilliant d ings may Innina my lady look. A long life, abu dance of years, a well-established throne, a putti down of uprisings, may she as a gift bestow up me."

Though this inscription does not have any dire bearing on questions of criticism, it is interesti in that it was written for one of the kings w invaded Palestine and who carried off Lot.

A VACATION FOR EVERY ONE

"THE laffable thing about it," said the Old Codger, "is this: they don't none of 'em axshully vacate. They vacate their houses, and their stores and offices and so forth, only because they can't tote them along; but they don't never vacate them*selves!*" Then he "laffed" fit to kill. And when he got good and ready he admitted me to the secret of his mystic remark. He meant that people go on vacations leaving behind them what they can't carry along; but their same old, routine habits of talk, thought, worry, planning and what not accompany the vacationists, and so they get little re-creation out of their outings.

"What's the use in writing a vacation article?" expostulated the man in the business office; "you can't say anything new on that subject." H'mm. Well, maybe not. And then again—. My friend the Old Codger has given me a hint, anyway. I remember saying a long time ago, that the essential thing about outdoors, as about the kingdom of heaven, is to get it inside of you. But neither the one nor the other can get inside if we are stuck, jamb full of other things already. See it?

A ministerial friend of mine made himself the laughing-stock of his town one summer. He has a wife, three children, and one of their aunts to support. He was making money hand over foot, as the saying is, getting anywhere from ten to eighteen dollars a week, according to the size and humor of the congregations: he had a fixed salary, but it had been fixed so far above the church's financial high-water mark that he even forgot what the agreed stipend was. Still he had saved forty dollars towards a vacation for the family without letting his trustees know about it, and this summer he intended to spend that hard like water.

This is how he managed it. He bought a 14 by 18 tent, and put it up in the rear of his back yard, with a board floor. He moved a few essentials from the house into the tent. He bought cots, camp chairs, hammock. He set up a regulation outdoor kitchen and built a fireplace under it. Then he locked up the house and forgot it was there. The food supply came from the stores and hucksters, as before, only delivered at the "camp." From the camp, he and his family sallied forth in rough and ready clothes, strolled through the little town, made excursions into the fields and woods, fished, took pictures, gathered specimens of field and stream, and lived exactly as if they were miles away from home, strangers in a strange neighborhood. My friend almost forgot he was a minister, especially when an unusually fierce wind tore the tent loose and hid it behind a neighbor's fence, one day when the campers were off on a jaunt. But at the end of his month's "vacation" the family "returned home" with more real recreation to their collective and individual credit than they had ever known before.

When I was a boy my father was head of the schools in our town of three thousand people. I had two sisters, one nearly worn-out mother, and this father of whom I just spoke. The latter ought to have had piles of money hidden away somewhere, for the only expenses he had to meet were rent and the hired girl. I know, for the groceries and meat and things, our shoes and clothes and all that came from the stores. So he ought to have saved lots out of his school teacher's salary. You know school teachers get even more than some ministers. But when an uncle of ours—my sisters and me—came bustling in to visit us one summer, and said: "See here, John, you're all pulled down. Why don't you take the wife and children away for the summer?" my father said he couldn't afford it. Then what happened? Well, my uncle went out somewhere and bought three tents, about 7 by 9; just plain "A" tents. He got some pieces of tarpaulin big enough for floors under each tent, and several rolls of clothesline to rope the tent with. He bought a three-quart pail to cook potatoes and things in, a two-quart one for coffee, a large pan for making dough in and washing dishes, a frying-pan, a big iron spoon, some knives and forks, and plates and cups and saucers of enamelware. Then he got fishing tackle, hatchet, and a few things that I forgot. He made us all put on light woolen things, stockings too of wool because wool is by far the best material when camping, soft hats, heavy shoes, and take an extra suit of underwear each. Coarse thread and needles, soap and towels, waterproof matchbox, court plaster and witch-hazel, and plenty of twine and some nails were put in a box, along with our blankets. Then he hired a spring wagon and a tired horse, and coaxed us to pile in on top of the truck. Some of us took turns walking. I remember I felt cheap as dirt parading through the village. That was when we went. When we came back, I could have licked the biggest boy in my class.

We were gipsies. My uncle said so. My mother said, "I should think we are! John, hold that umbrella so it will cover my face." Later, mother couldn't bear anything within a mile of her face; said it suffocated her. We drove about six miles out of town, and found a spot in a small piece of woods near a very pretty stream, where we made camp. There was a tent for my mother and father, one for my sisters, and one for my uncle and me. Our tent was the dining-room on wet days. We stayed there seven weeks. We got acquainted with one or two farmers near by, and oh! what times! My uncle made us catch fish nearly every day, and find wild berries. Vegetables, eggs and milk we bought of the farmers. The stream was deep enough in places for swimming, and on the other side was a woods that we used to explore. Father had us spend a little time each day collecting objects of interest. I remember still what a great variety of beautiful stones we found in the stream and on its shore. And uncountable forms of wild plants. And such remarkable specimens of tree bark. And any number of insects. We enjoyed those things with our friends all winter; some of them we kept for years. The most fun was in our expeditions into the surrounding country, gipsy fashion. We would start out early, and go as far as we could, and still get back before dark, with the horse, who was getting fatter every day. People actually took us for gipsies. Father said he clean forgot where he really lived. I know that my mother lost her tired feeling for good on that vacation, and everybody told us how brown and strong we looked when we got back. And we had our vacations just like that for several years after.

But I suppose folks to-day wouldn't call that a vacation.

If I were going to spend a week or two in the country, or at the seashore, now, I think my plan for getting the most rest and lasting enjoyment out of it would be based on the experiences of those summers and of my ministerial friend. I should inveigle two or three new acquaintances whom I might meet into forgetting who and what we were, and to pretend that we were strangers from some other country who had come to this new land to study its natural history and its people. We would walk abroad in the fields, beside the streams, up the hills, or along the seashore, and inland across the sandy plain, and have our minds and eyes and ears open for discoveries of things which I know very well none of us would find at home. I shouldn't overdo it. I'd swim and row and play games and loaf, too. But I assuredly would vacate myself a good part of the time, and let the outdoors, the wonderful things of the outdoor world, get inside my brain, inside my lungs and heart. And as they entered I don't know but that some of the kingdom of heaven would get in, too.

There is just this speck of space left, so I will add a word about a farmer's wife out this way a spell who hit on a novel idea for her vacation. And it was on this same principle of getting away from oneself and seeing familiar things from a new viewpoint. This excellent woman went to a neighbor's over night. The next day she and her neighbor, all dressed up, visited their own homes, strolled through the orchards, the barn, the bits of wood, watched the men at work, commented on the crops, cows and hens, drove a few miles over the familiar road as if new to it, and went to bed with a big sense of having been off on a real outing. It seems to me that by exercising ingenuity, the mothers of the land on farms and in towns and cities might get a whole lot more recreation. The essential thing is to get absolutely away from the routine. Now, if I can get in just a few more words,—but I see I can't.

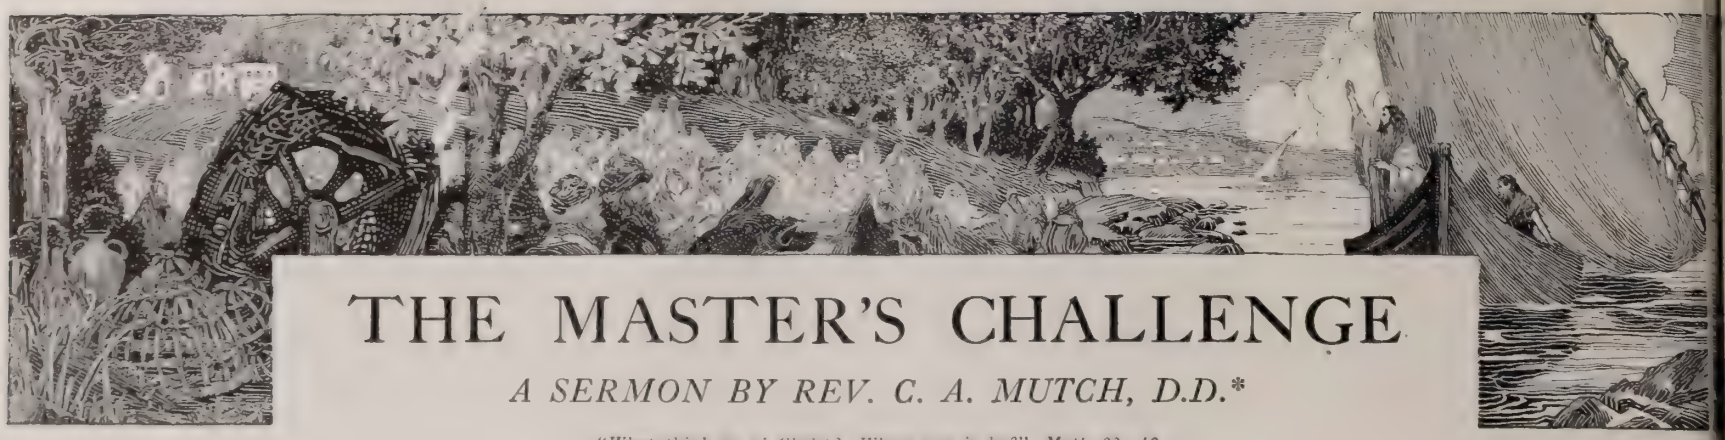
Shadows of Dawn

Written by the famous inventor, HUDSON MAXIM, in appreciation of Henry Neil's work for mothers' pensions

A WHIR of dust is sweeping the hill,
Between the gray dawn and the huge black mill.
There's a drift of rags and of skinny bones,
With skeleton feet on the ruthless stones
What specters are these in the witching light—
This ghostly rear-guard of the night,
Wearily treading the trail of the dark,
Arousing the morn before the lark?
What wights are they, so gaunt and lean,
With lagging pace and drowsy mien,
Who under the dim lamp's flickering glow
Wind into the cavernous mill below?
A sortie of ghouls aloose from the tomb,
Or a rabble of wraiths begot of the gloom?
No—goblins and ghouls such task would shirk—
It is only the children going to work!



THE MASTER'S CHALLENGE

*A SERMON BY REV. C. A. MUTCH, D.D.

"What think ye of Christ? Whose son is he?" Matt. 22: 42

THIS is one of the most important questions that come within the range of practical theology. It is a question with which we all have to do. No one can evade it. And the character of the answer each gives will decide the weal or woe of each for time and eternity. There are other questions that can neither be answered by argument nor by mathematics. They require not only our intellectual assent but our moral consent as well. To this class of questions our text belongs. And every man, woman and child is giving an answer, each in his own way. But aside from all specific theological questions, and looking at Christ from simply an historical point of view, he is the strongest force ever introduced into the world. We pass by the humility of his birth and the years between his advent and the time when he began his public ministry, and notice in a cursory manner the imperial part he has played in the development of the intellectual and spiritual conceptions of the race. Measured by the amount of their influence, the greatest names pale before this Name.

The Orient is the birthplace of religions. With a single exception, the names of Zoroaster, Gautama and Mohammed stand pre-eminent among the world's great religious teachers. Their followers are numbered by many millions. Many of their proverbs, precepts and admonitions are strikingly similar to quite a number of passages of the Holy Scriptures. Those nations that have accepted the teachings of these men are vastly better off than those who accept and practice a lower form of morals, yet their influence is only national; beyond the Orient they never could, or can, flourish. The religions they established are wholly devoid of that element that calls forth the love of the worshiper. Their victories have been won over the secondary races of the world and over them they hold sway to-day. Christ, our incomparable Teacher, is triumphing over the foremost races of earth. The nations that are most enlightened are the illustrious trophies of the Son of God, and the greatest and best of these is a mere prophecy of what is yet to come.

What Jesus Wrought

Says a trenchant writer: "Around this globe is a narrow zone between the thirtieth and fiftieth parallels of north latitude, and within this belt of power have existed all the great nations of the past, and in it exist all the great nations of the present. It is true that north of this charmed circle as well as south of it, have existed nations of wealth and power, but the peoples that have given direction to the thought of mankind, that have created philosophy for the race, that have given jurisprudence and history and oratory and poetry and art and science and government and religion to mankind, have been crowded within this zone of supremacy." And what is profoundly significant, the nations that stand in the forefront within this charmed circle accept the teachings of Jesus, at least in theory, and millions adore him as their Redeemer and Lord. Moses and Elijah, perhaps the two greatest characters of history, tower above all others as the Jungfrau and the Matterhorn rise above the hills surrounding them, yet their names pale before his. Some one has said that "Jesus wrought the strangest and most unexpected of intellectual revolutions"; a revolution many would have thought impossible, for who would have thought that Jerusalem should yet be the teacher of Greece and Rome? But to say that Christ wrought the strangest and most unexpected of intellectual revolutions is to state only a part of the truth.

His teachings have accomplished much more than that. Is it too much to say that this intellectual revolution was merely incidental? That it was the effect resulting from a revolution which had reached profounder depths than that of the intellect alone? He has indeed changed the thought of mankind, but this change has come because he has changed the life. The world owes its progress in morality, in inventions, in the sciences, in everything that is best in our civilization, to the teaching of our Lord Jesus Christ. Man's life was wrong and to effect a revolution that shall completely change the thought of the world he strikes at the foundation of things and proclaims and inaugurates a revolution which is infinitely greater than any that has yet been wrought in man. "I have come that ye might have life." As if he had said, I have come, not to bring right knowledge, or right external practice, or a higher form of civilization, or greater material prosperity, or to effect the strangest and most unexpected of intellectual revolutions. "I have come that ye might have life." Accept life and all these things shall be added unto you.

In the memorable conversation our Lord had with Nicodemus, he solemnly declared the only way of entrance into his kingdom was by being born again. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, except a man be born anew, he cannot see the kingdom of God." (John 3: 3.) Heart-birth as well as brain-birth was necessary, but the latter must be based on the former if we are to account for the marvelous changes that have come since Christ walked and talked with men.

History's Testimony

There are two factors that determine the course of history, God and man. In order that the course of history shall be rightly determined these forces should be in harmony with each other. The more perfectly man has harmonized with his Lord in his plans and purposes and spirit, the more glorious has been his history. "Luther and Calvin," says Dr. C. R. Jefferson, "have left a deeper mark on Europe than Vesuvius with his torch of flame. The mind of one man laid across a nation's heart will sink deeper into it than a bar of light let fall from the heaven-wide arch constructed of God's stars. Jesus of Nazareth, a carpenter, a teacher, without fortune, or reputation, or human learning, has done more to form the disposition and shape the ideals of the leading nations of the world than all the winds and ocean currents, and all the stars of all the heavens, and all the seasons which have traveled with buds and birds and snows and storms across the lands. The foundation of our civilization is not an idea or a philosophy, not a principle or a system, but a man. The music to which we march is the music of the words which he spake and speaks, 'I am the way, the truth, and the life.'"

Nations like individuals are known by their fruits. Evil nations like evil men cannot bring forth good fruit. Some one said to Wendell Phillips: "Hinduism is as good as Christianity." He replied: "India is the answer." "By their fruits ye shall know them" is a law from which there is no escape. As well set aside the law of gravitation, or the laws that govern sound, or of natural descent, as to avoid the operation of this law.

The Indian Witness finds the following results: "The Hindu shastras have given us India; the Koran has given us Arabia, Turkey, and North and Central Africa; the doctrine of Gautama Buddha has given us Burma, Tibet, and Siam; the teachings of Confucius have given us enfeebled, distracted China. The Bible has given us Britain, Germany, the United States—nations which, though unhappily afflicted with numberless evils because the Bible is not allowed full supremacy in the individual and national life, are in the van of human progress, enlightenment, and civilization. In five hundred years no really useful invention or valuable discovery has originated in any land outside the pale of Christendom. Neither Asia nor Africa for twenty generations has contributed a single idea from which the world is reaping comfort, enrichment, or uplifting impulse." The truths which Christ revealed are the highest conceivable. Some of these truths men had dreamed about and a few had reasoned about, yet their best thought was a mere groping in the dark. He cleared away the rubbish of tradition and of mere human opinion and lays bare the Rock as the sure foundation upon which to build a character that shall endure through the eternities.

It was the verdict of those who were sent to arrest Him that "Never man spake like this man" (John 7: 46). That verdict has never been reversed. E if we restrict ourselves to material things and t into account only the blessings that have com the race through inventions and labor-saving vices which have originated in those count where his teachings are best known, though perfectly practiced, that verdict stands. Ther no such thing as philanthropy in the heathen w to-day and there never was. The science of m cine, hospitals, orphanages, homes for the indig are unknown in Christless countries except as t have been introduced by Christians from ot lands. The influence of Christ's teachings upon world has been moving forward in ever widen circles and in this year of grace we are nearer divine ideals than in any period of human hist Unaided by revelation the conception of God a Father had never entered the minds of the wi men. The Fatherhood of God as Jesus revealed was unknown even among the Jews themsel though mention is made of it in the Old Testam Scriptures. However the prophets understood term, the people themselves understood it as ap ing only to themselves. It was a national conc tion only. If the conceptions of the Fatherhood God by his own chosen people were only natio unspiritual, we need not marvel that the heath mind had no conception at all of the true nature the Deity, though the belief in a supreme Being universal. Men have always worshiped; they h always prayed.

Jesus revealed God as a Father, tender, sym thetic, loving, yearning over man with infinite pi For four thousand years God had revealed hims as Father in the splendor of the sun by day and the mellow light of the moon by night; in the twi ling of the stars in the canopy of heaven; in t majestic sweep of the planets; in the seasons of t year; in seedtime and harvest; in the dew of t morning; in the rain as it fell from the clouds; the murmuring brook and flowing river; in t fertile valleys, the wooded hillside and the tow ing mountains; in the singing of the birds; in t gentle evening breezes—everywhere everythi created by him speaks the same language to people, and nature's voice has never ceased to p claim her Maker as Father. "The heavens decla the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth handiwork. Day unto day uttereth speech, a night unto night sheweth knowledge. There is speech nor language, where their voice is heard." Ps. 19: 1-3. But the ears of man we deaf, he did not hear; he was blind and he cou not see.

What Think Ye?

But Jesus is much more than the greatest teach of morals or of religion. When he asked the que tion, "What think ye of the Christ? Whose Son he?" his desire was not to get an expression their opinion of him as teacher or as moralist, n what they thought of him as an individual. H was altogether and always indifferent as to wh they thought of him as an individual. In the mi of our Lord that was a matter too trivial abo which to be concerned. The context shows that wanted an expression of their conception of t Messiah concerning whom their prophets h prophesied. When they replied, "The Son David," he asked them another question, "How th doth David in the Spirit call him Lord?" That w the problem he presented to them. What do y think of the Messiah? What do you think of hi who shall redeem not only Israel, but the who world? That is the question that confronts eve one wherever his Gospel is proclaimed. That is t question that confronts you and me.

We are giving the answer by our loyalty, by ou service, by our willingness to suffer with him, by ou faithfulness to the obligation he imposes, by ou devotion to his cause, and by our loving obedien to him in all things. Blessed Jesus, thou Son God and the Redeemer of us all, give us strengt "according to the riches of thy grace" to alway and everywhere give the answer that shall pleas thee.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, August 9. Luke 7: 48, 50. "Thy sins are forgiven. . . . Thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace." With the Lord's formula of absolution and the exalted place which he always assigns to a person's faith in the forgiving grace of God, we are already familiar from former incidents of this kind. But in the present instance the relation a sinner's love holds to the pardon he obtains from the Lord deserves notice. What the Lord commends in the woman's action is meant as a confirmation of her faith. He puts a distinct emphasis on her faith. It was not the outward expression of her love, not the public act of devotion, not her own works and merit that had earned forgiveness for her. She had been saved by grace, like every other sinner that ever is saved. The acts of love which the Lord has mentioned with approval evinced her great joy over the forgiveness she had received, and showed that her faith was genuine; for "faith worketh by love." Moreover, in a true Christian's life, believing and confessing go hand in hand. She had believed, and therefore she spoke through acts louder than words.

MONDAY, August 10. Matthew 9: 37, 38. "The harvest truly is plenteous, but the laborers are few; pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth laborers into his harvest." At Jacob's well we heard the Lord discourse to his disciples for the first time on the harvest of souls. His observations at that time breathed joy and satisfaction. In the present text there is a note of distress. He has traversed the entire country and everywhere beheld shepherdless multitudes, thousands of souls hungering and thirsting for spiritual meat and drink which their ordained shepherds could not and would not provide. The decadent Jewish Church had become unfit, by training and temperament, to take care of the religious needs of the people. The Lord of the harvest had himself come upon this vast field, and with a handful of believers that had been drawn to him, was providing the true soul food for the masses. In this text he appeals to his beloved people in all ages to recognize their opportunities for extending his kingdom, and to make the need of the spiritually abandoned their own by taking it to God in prayer. Justly, this text has become the slogan of the church in her missionary endeavors. Missions are properly started with prayer; next come the laborers, and more prayer; lastly, all the other means, and still more prayer.

TUESDAY, August 11. Matthew 10: 5-7. "Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not: but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. And as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand." Suiting action to word, the Lord now begins to provide laborers for his harvest. He commissions men to go forth in his name with the message that he himself had proclaimed: "The kingdom of heaven is at hand." God's rule is to be set up in the hearts of men, causing them to live for heaven while still on earth, that they may live in heaven when they leave this earth. But why is this commission limited to Israel? That the Gentiles and Samaritans were not excluded from the kingdom, the Lord's ministry has shown us; for we have noticed most affecting episodes in his journeys which brought him in touch with non-Jews. The mission of Jesus was, first and foremost, to the Jews because of "the promises made to the fathers," as the Jews were the covenant race. The church of Jesus Christ is the complement, yea, the consummation of the church of the Old Testament. It must begin its work where the old prophets had left off, and thence proceed to extend its work to every people, tribe and tongue under the heavens, even as the ancient prophets had predicted. Also in mission work there must be order and system. We must do the most obvious duties and the most necessary things first, and not fritter away our time and means in indiscriminate endeavors.

WEDNESDAY, August 12. Matthew 10: 8. "Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out devils: freely ye have received, freely give." The kingdom of God is to be set up in the midst of human misery; in fact, it is to be constructed out of such misery. Its ordained builders must go where men are suffering, polluted, dead, and under the thraldom of darkness. The legitimate starting-point for Christian soul-winning is this complex evil of sin, with its many disastrous effects, both physical and spiritual. With these the servants of the Kingdom are to wrestle. The sovereign power of the Lord equips them for their work. They are to believe that they have something to "give" which nobody else can give. The Lord does not say: See whether you can do anything for these people! but: Give to the sick healing, to lepers cleansing, to the dead life, to the slaves of Satan liberty! You have the help that is needed everywhere. Only distribute it. And do not stint your favors, nor barter them, nor sell them. You are dispensers of the gratuitous bounties of your Lord. You must not make salvation a merchandise. You must make your clients see that salvation is a free, generous gift of God! It was a grand equipment which Jesus provided for his servants in the days when his church was begun. The equipment still exists, though its application is externally different, now that conditions are changed. Wherever the Gospel is preached, sin and its effects are overcome.

THURSDAY, August 13. Matthew 10: 9, 10. "Provide neither gold, nor silver, nor brass in your purses, nor scrip for your journey, neither two coats, neither shoes, nor yet staves; for the workman is worthy of his meat." Unencumbered with earthly cares, with lean purses and slim baggage, the servants of the Lord are to fare forth on their errands. They will travel with greater ease and expedition without a great commissariat. Their mind is to be wholly on the message which they are to deliver. They are not to create a sensation by their wealth and refinement, but by what they come to say and do. The character of unselfishness is to be stamped on their whole exterior. They are to commend themselves to men, as their Master did, by their humble ways. The faith they proclaim is to express itself in their disregard of worldly advantages. Their whole conversation is to preach childlike trust and reliance upon their heavenly Provider and the promise with which he has sent them forth to their work. They are his workmen. He has engaged them. He will procure for them the necessaries of life in all conditions. They shall not go unrewarded. "Those that preach the Gospel must live of the Gospel"—that is a law in the Lord's kingdom. Pity that the provisions of this law are not always recognized and appreciated by preachers and their people. Those who obey this law, both ministers and congregations, have never found cause to complain of its operation.

FRIDAY, August 14. Matthew 10: 11-13. "And into whatsoever city or town ye shall enter, enquire who in it is worthy; and there abide till ye go thence. And when ye come into an house, salute it. And if the house be worthy, let your peace come upon it: but if it be not worthy, let your peace return to you." The traveler's anxiety about proper lodging at his stopping-places is something that nearly everybody has experienced, even with the almost perfect facilities of modern travel. This anxiety is only replaced by another when you are to be the private guest somewhere, and have the choice of several hosts. Not to offend any, not to disregard social etiquette, not to spoil your visit to others and to yourself by unwise and odious preferences, that is sometimes a problem. The Lord here takes the care about their hostelries entirely out of the hands of his Gospel messengers. Their lodging is prepared for them in advance. Wherever they will have to stop on their journeys they will find people who are glad to take the Lord's strangers in. They need only ask for the parties at their arrival. The people who take an interest in the kingdom will be pointed out to them. With them is to be their temporary home, and there is to be their base of operation. With the greeting of peace they are to enter and establish a fraternal connection with their host, blessing him and his household in the name of Jesus. The greeting may return to them unappreciated, because they had been wrongly directed by their informer; but they themselves shall be without blame for having offered it. The place for the wayfaring minister of Christ to sojourn is with Christ's people. At the humblest cottage inhabited by true Christians, the visit of the man of God will be better appreciated, and he will be aided in his purposes with a more intelligent and active interest than in the brown-stone mansion where the people are so cold and distant and condescending.

SATURDAY, August 15. Matthew 10: 14, 15. "And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words, when ye depart out of that house or city, shake off the dust of your feet. Verily I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrha in the day of judgment, than for that city." Hospitality is a serious matter with Christians, who have been taught to extend it without grudging, and who are cheered in their hospitable efforts by being told that some who were hospitable have entertained angels unawares. True hospitality is a Christian virtue, and its absence is one of the marks of un-Christian character. The selfish man will not share his goods with a stranger, or suffer his domestic ease and quiet to be disturbed by the annoyance of having to attend to the wants and wishes of a guest. A haughty, self-sufficient man will scorn a modest traveler who asks to be sheltered and fed. Now, the Lord's direction how the disciples are to treat inhospitable people is not to be understood as sanctioning violent resentment on their part, whenever they are turned away at some door. Personally, Christians must take any affront in a meek and forgiving spirit. The action which Christ here inculcates must be understood in connection with the disciples' office. They are ambassadors for Christ, and in rejecting them, men reject the Master. It is proper that they be rebuked for such action, as the Lord himself rebuked the cities that had not received him.

Not the least of the good done is that of banishing the superstitions which for ages have hindered medical progress in China. Only recently a native woman of quality applied to have a lot of hard shell turtles removed from her stomach, as in their daily efforts to climb out they kept her an invalid.

With the donor's approval, the gift was apportioned as follows: New Hebrides Mission, $20; Missionary Berthold Lenz, $20; Missionary William Greet, $20; Bishop Hartzell's African Mission, $20; China Orphan Fund, $20. This timely gift will doubtless be most serviceable to the workers in these fields.

The Church in Summer

"THE summer is past"—not quite. "The harvest is ended"—not yet. Some good full weeks of summer left. What are our churches going to do with them?

Is your church keeping active this summer? A kindly critic said recently of a certain church that the only activity or motion he ever saw there was the motion of the fans with which the staid and dignified auditors tried to keep themselves cool. Have you done any more than that this summer—to keep yourself fan-cool while the minister is preaching? By the way, though, that is something. Better go to church and fan yourself than not to go at all. But let us consider the whole matter now—deeply, prayerfully. What are we going to render back to God for the gift and the gifts of this summer?

First, the preachers themselves. Many of them say they simply cannot do full and regular work because their people are not on hand to work for. Yes, but other people are on hand. Hot weather does not take the people out of the hospitals, nor the jails, nor the factories; it does not take them, in some sections of every city, out of the streets. There is unlimited work to do—as the splendid outdoor, tent and shop evangelistic movements in many cities show. The summer is the best time in the year for preaching the grace, the joy, the love, the fragrance and the hope of Christ's religion. At least one brave and energetic man has done magnificent work preaching to beach crowds at a great summer resort, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD told some time ago of two young evangelists who held a boat service, gathering scores of pleasure craft around their own boat, as they sang and spoke the story of the Man of Galilee.

Some churches make splendid summer records. Summer vacation schools, open air services, flowers sent to the sick in home or hospital, the poor carried on river trips or to the country, show a loving determination not to be weary in well-doing. Country and seaside churches may make special efforts for the vacation visitors, inviting, welcoming and serving them.

These are midsummer days. Factory and farm workers toil no less arduously in summer than in winter. Money-makers of every description are busy everywhere. Pleasure resorts thrive. The saloons are busier than ever. Let the church prove herself no sluggard, no idler, no self-indulgent ease-taker. Rather than failing to follow, she ought to lead in summer's tasks. Look about you now. The summer is not yet past. The harvest is not yet ended. The Master is calling you.

Spreading Crime by Suggestion

HOW far does the power of suggestion tend to the increase of crime? This is a question which will naturally occur to thoughtful minds at this season, when a considerable portion of the daily press is given up to the publication of details of crime. Fortunately not all are equal offenders in this regard; if it were so, the case would indeed be hopeless. There are many journals that refuse to sacrifice principle, and which keep their columns clean, resisting all temptations to make them a channel for the foul stream of crime to flow through unchecked. But there are others that gloat over the details of every criminal offense and furnish a surfeit of this stuff for impressionable multitudes. Not only do they disregard journalistic ideals, but they are positively destructive of the sense of morality in other minds. It has been asserted positively by students of sociology and criminology that sowing the details of crime through the press multiplies crime by suggestion. Protests have been made by citizen organizations, books have been written dealing with the evil, and several States, notably Indiana, Missouri and Kansas, have enacted laws to counteract it; but the mills of the sensational press continue to grind out their deadly grist, regardless of the fact that they are spreading poison by familiarizing the public mind with details that properly belong to the courtroom or the clinic.

In a speech delivered before the United States Senate some time ago, Hon. John D. Works, of California, deplored the dissemination of the morbid and repulsive details of crime by the sensational press, and pictured its far-reaching and disastrous effects in these words: "They are read by millions of people, old and young alike. But unfortunately it does not stop there. The lives of the participants in the crimes are laid bare to the world. Their innocent and stricken friends and relatives are hunted down and the alleged history of their lives, more often than not false and distorted, is given out to the world. It gives spice and interest to a story that should never be told, and advertises the newspaper as one of great enterprise. . . . News that panders to the taste of both the horrible and immoral makes more criminals and causes more crimes than almost any other influence."

At this time there is a recrudescence of this sort of literature which is as injurious as it is offensive. We need not go into detail, describing further the nature of the offense; every reader knows it too well. The real mission of the newspaper is that of a conservator of the people's right, a stanch upholder of their best interests, a defender of the purity and security of the home, and a recorder of all that relates to the real progress of the world, the nation, the State and the community. Sensational journalism is the reverse of all this. It is a disseminator of impurity, a breeder of crime by exploitation and suggestion, and an enemy of the best interests of the community in which it circulates.

Are You Working?

ARE you working to increase the membership of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family? On another page you will find our announcement of a reduced price coupon offer. Our six months' offer was wonderfully successful. Many thousands were added to the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family, and now, during the month of August, you will have an opportunity to add an even greater number to the working force through this special offer, whereby you may permit your friends to take THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for five months for only 30 cents. Whether you send 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, or 6 coupons, you will receive a substantial reward. And if you send in six coupons, you will receive in addition to the regular reward a large American flag FREE. These rewards are generous enough. However, the main issue is an increase of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family. Last year, nearly 40,000 new earnest workers were enlisted in the cause; 40,000 new homes feeling the influence of the sermons, meditations, Prayer League, Sunday school lessons, etc., and passing on that influence to perhaps as many more homes where it may never before have been felt.

Let every member of the Family strive to bring in at least one friend. Let those who can influence more than one resolve to do so. We rely upon yo co-operation. We know you will give it, just as y did last year. Mention this wonderful opportun to your friends and neighbors. Ask them to s scribe, or failing in that, make them a present o five months' membership. DO IT NOW!

OUR OBSERVANT NEIGHBOR, The Continent, takes ception to the use of the fist in oratorical gesticulation. points to the prevalence of fist gesture at the Presbyteri General Assembly and the recent Sunday School Convention Chicago. Ministers, like political speakers and lecturers, a largely addicted to the habit; yet, used in moderation and appropriate passages, it does not strike the average auditor particularly offensive. We have seen it employed with smas ing effect on the platforms of national conventions. A after all, in passages of great oratorical intensity, there is action which so convincingly emphasizes the speaker's point a stunning blow of the clenched right hand in the left pal It brings down the house when nothing else will.

A NOBLE ACT, DONE QUIETLY and without ostentatio is recorded of the late Rev. William B. Palmore, long a leadi light of the M. E. Church, South. Among his father's pape there was found an old deed to nearly 6,000 acres of land West Virginia. Dr. Palmore visited the tract and saw that was occupied by hundreds of squatter families, who had bu their cottages in the valleys and on the mountain slopes. I saw them in their homes, surrounded by their wives and ch dren. He went away as quietly as he came and thought deep His lawyers assured him his title was incontestable and t land was now worth millions. He prayed over it and thoug much of what would happen to those humble, thrifty folk if claimed his right. It was a sharp struggle and a severe tempt tion; but he had a vision of a great opportunity which help to bring a clear conviction as to his duty. He had not know of the existence of the property until a few weeks before h death, and one of his last acts—and a very magnanimous a noble one—was the execution of a complete waiver of h claims and the granting of a freehold title to every one of t squatter householders! It would be difficult to find a paral anywhere to this splendidly generous gift by a Christian past to the poor homesteaders, whose names he hardly knew.

IT IS WHEN THE SUMMER is at its maximum and wh fields and woodlands look their loveliest, that the thought vacation takes its strongest grip of us. And poor indeed is t man or woman who cannot steal off for a few days to drin in the full glory of the country in midsummer. Our Children Home at Mont-Lawn is lovelier than ever at this season. It is little section of paradise, set like a jewel among the Rocklan hills, and its full complement of little tenement children a having a glorious, health-giving time. We plan to have near three thousand of these little people—the poorest, the cripple the feeble, who stand most in need of a ten-days' fresh-a outing—as our guests this summer. Here is an opportunit for every kind-hearted reader to have a little representativ there.

Street Sweeper Inherits Fortune

AUGUST NOVAK, of Passaic, New Jersey, was left an estate in Germany by the will of a relative the other day which is worth $25,000. An uncle died a few months ago l named Novak as the sole heir. The German sul has just transmitted to Novak $500 as the t instalment of his money. Some one speaking the fortunate man said, "Now you will get off streets at once and quit work." His answer s, "I will not. I will stay on the job I have, ich I understand, and which yields me $1.50 a , on which, with strict economy, I have supported family of six persons." What a sensible man vak is! His uncle no doubt knew he was leaving money to a level-headed, industrious, worthy n. Eight men out of ten would have said that they were pretty low in the social and industrial le—as the man at the side of the road breaking k, and the one with the broom in his hands eeping the streets are counted at the bottom—y would quit that menial job at once. It is just necessary to have a man break the rock as the tractor to construct the road; t as necessary to have a man eep the streets as for the wheels trade or pleasure to pass over m. Novak made good in a re-ctable job; he had supported family and lived an humble, right life, and did not count calling as unworthy or throw up with contempt. Perhaps en men out of ten would have en up work altogether, saying at the $25,000 would keep them e rest of their lives without rk, and very likely would have len into habits of extravagance well as indolence and exhausted principal in a few years. For vak to have quit work would ve been a curse to him. He can e his family the more generous owance that would be proper, ve some money for benevolences d piety, and then have enough r a rainy day the rest of his e, and the contentment which ch a provision brings. Service the humblest calling and dili-nt toil in the spiritual realm e suggested in the incident. vak, despite his financial good rtune, determined to obey the yal law of labor:

Six days shalt thou labor, and do all work. (Ex. 20: 9.)

Memorial to Pocahontas

N St. George's Church at Gravesend, England, on July , two memorial windows were veiled to Pocahontas. The remonies were elaborate, being participated in officers and crews of two American battleships d cadets from the Annapolis Naval Academy. hey and Ambassador Page were given a great re-ption by the thousands assembled inside and out-de the old parish church whose register bears e name of the Indian princess. The ambassador, unveiling the windows, dwelt on Pocahontas' in-uence as a bond of peace between the United tates and Great Britain. In the saving of the fe of John Smith and in her ministry of peace is royal princess of the wild has merited the nor that has come to her name, and the windows the church remind us of the immortality Christ ave to a woman for her service of love.

Verily I say unto you, Wheresoever this Gospel shall be preached in the whole world, there shall also this, that this woman hath done, be told for a memorial of her. (Matt. 26: 13.)

Saved from Copperhead's Bite

MISS FRANCES HAWKINS of Newton, N. J., was picking daisies the other day when she felt sharp sting in her right ankle. Looking down e saw a huge copperhead snake. She ran half mile to her home, where her mother promptly cked the poison from the wound. A physician id that the mother had thus saved the girl's life. he children of Israel bitten by the serpents in the wilderness, who looked on the brazen serpent on the pole, lived. Christ said that those bitten by the serpent of sin looking at him by faith would be saved, in these words:

And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up: that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life. (John 3: 14, 15.)

Lynchings Reduced One-Half

RECORDS kept by the Tuskegee Institute show that during the first six months of the year only twenty lynchings occurred in this country. This is about half the number recorded for the same period two years ago, and a considerable improvement over last year's figures. This should be good news to the friends of law and order, and especially to Christian people. The heathen nations, to which we give so much money and so many precious lives to evangelize and save them, often point justly to the lawlessness and savagery that blacken the civilization of Christian lands. Especially has there been widespread criticism of the mobs and homicides that have disgraced our land, both North and South. We have a beautiful Christian civilization, but must blush that it has been too often marred by riot and bloodshed. We trust the favorable contrast of the first six months in the taming of savagery reported in the statistics from Tuskegee will be continued, fulfilling as a nation this command:

So shalt thou put away the guilt of innocent blood from among you. (Deut. 21:9.)

CAPE COD'S WONDERFUL CANAL

ON July 29, the canal through Cape Cod, built at a cost of $12,000,000, was opened, with the governor of Massachusetts and other dignitaries in attendance at the ceremonies. The canal has been in shape for navigation since July 4. It will shorten distances and provide a safer route for 25,000 sea craft a year, which have hitherto had to round Cape Cod. The length of the waterway is eight miles, its length from thirty-foot water in one bay to the other is thirteen miles. It has a minimum depth at low water of twenty-five feet, and is never less than 100 feet wide at the bottom. At the passing place for ships it is 200 feet wide. The Cape Cod Canal is greater in its dimensions than the original Suez or the present Manchester Canal, although the Manchester ship canal carries in its small length about as heavy and valuable a traffic as any in the world. How glorious it is to live in the period of the world's prodigious activities. Colossal things are being done in throwing structures up into the air, in digging deep into the caverns of the earth, in constructing continental railways, in driving palaces through the ocean with the swiftness of the wind; in flying over mountains and rivers like a bird; in founding gigantic financial, educational, benevolent and religious institutions; and the climax of the greatness of our age is its goodness, its genuine service for God and for others. The new canal across Cape Cod is another victory for American engineering which has taken a place in the forefront of the world. This enterprise is another expression of that mastery over nature which God bestowed upon man created in his own image: "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth." (Gen. 1: 26.)

Queen Forbidden to Pluck Flowers

ON a recent visit to Paris the Empress Eugenie, widow of Napoleon III, was walking in the Tuileries Gardens, where once stood her own splendid palace. She picked a flower, but was accosted by the attendant with the words, "Picking flowers is strictly forbidden. I must report you." He demanded her name and address, and she answered timidly, "Eugenie." The attendant did not recognize her, but being struck by the melancholy appearance of the aged lady, relented and said, "Never mind this time, but do not do it again." We have here the same old story of the crumbling of dynasties and the humiliation of rulers. Very few rulers in the history of the world have lived so long that they did not find some conqueror. The humiliation of Napoleon I was one of the saddest pictures of history. This is a pathetic story of the woman who was queen in the palace, forbidden to pick a garden flower out of the same palace grounds. This is only the story of the sudden shifting in the financial and social world witnessed almost everywhere upon the earth. Many in this country who have been wealthy are now struggling to make a living on a scant salary, and women who once were queens in society and held their heads haughtily are paupers. Fortunately God looks at the heart and not on the conditions that surround, and we take our place in the scale of being by its relation to virtue and truth. Time settles these questions of earthly condition. It is a leveler bringing the lofty and the humble down to the same level of mortality.

Let the brother of low degree rejoice in that he is exalted, but the rich in that he is made low; because as the flower of the grass he shall pass away. (James 1: 9, 10.)

Found Ring Lost Sixty Years

AN official bulletin of the Navy Department issued July 17, revealed a bit of interesting history connected with the old frigate Constellation. When it was announced some time ago that the old frigate was to be overhauled before being sent to Baltimore to participate in the Star-Spangled Banner centennial, Mrs. Rosa Winston of Windsor, N. C., wrote Secretary Daniels that her father, Dr. Kenney, served on the Constellation during the Civil War, and that he lost a ring on board the ship. The ring had special associations, and Dr. Kenney felt the loss, but remarked that the ring would never be recovered till the ship was overhauled at a navy yard. Mr. Daniels sent the letter to the commandant at the Norfolk yard with instructions to look out for the ring. The ring was found under the iron covering plates of the anchor bitts on the forward gun deck. Mr. Daniels has forwarded the trinket to the daughter of the man who lost it sixty years ago. There is no element of real value in the moral or spiritual world that is lost. No precious jewel of thought, sentiment or action, no ring of love, will ever be lost. They will all be found in memory and character in the overhauling of things and events, in accordance with these words:

For there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed; and hid that shall not be known. (Matt. 10: 26.)

Lightning's Powers

A VIOLENT electrical storm that raged on July 15 played havoc in certain parts of New Jersey and Delaware. Two of the objects of the play of the lightning were affected in strange ways. Mrs. Lucilla Haines of Camden, who had been blind for ten years, was sitting at a window when a terrific flash of lightning struck her, cutting out a perfect half inch "V" down to the center of each lens of the black glasses she was wearing. She was rendered unconscious, but when restored she discovered to her great joy that she could see perfectly. Leon Holloway, of Harrington, Del., an operator in a signal tower, was also struck, the lightning passing through the telephone receiver attached to his head and completely paralyzing his right side. The lightning that brought paralysis to the man of health and sight to the blind woman was itself beneficent. The clarification of the atmosphere by the storm and the lightning is absolutely necessary to physical life. Men have studied the lightning so as to protect themselves from it; they have been able to utilize its electrical energy in beneficent works, and as the sword of justice; but they cannot direct nor foretell the lightning's path through the air. It is God's mercy and love which are revealed in severity and mildness in the physical, moral and spiritual realm. The manifestations of God's severity in nature, human experience and revelation suggest obedience to this injunction:

Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling. (Ps. 2: 11.)

New Coupon Off[er]

You May Also Secur[e]

THOUSANDS of friends took advantage of the opportun[ity] month to enroll new members in the Christian Herald F[amily]. As happened last year, many of them asked for extra tin[e] more coupons. Many also desired to have us repeat our 3[0] Offer of last year for Five Months, so we thought it best to c[ome]

This is an unprecedented offer. It is an opportunity of wh[ich] present members should take advantage to extend the influence of the Christian Herald Family and the principles for which it stands.

We could not afford to make this offer at all had not our experience been that a very large percentage of such short-term subscribers send in their renewals at the end of the period, and thus become permanent members of the Christian Herald Family.

In this manner 40,000 new, earnest workers were enlisted in the cause last year—that is, 40,000 new homes, probably 200,000 souls, feeling the weekly influence of the Sermons, the Daily Meditations, the Prayer League, the Sunday School Lessons, etc.—40,000 homes where such influence may never before have been felt.

Will you not do your share? Surely you must know of several friends who would be better off for reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD every week? This is a form of home missionary work you cannot afford to overlook. In due time these friends will feel in their hearts the inspiring message which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD voices each week.

Will every member of the Family strive to bring in at least one friend? It should be very easy. The special price puts the paper within reach of the poorest. It enables every one who desires to extend the work of evangelization to make a present of the paper to friends, who will be reminded of this kindness every week until next January, and who may themselves become permanent members of the great Christian Herald Family. PLEASE ACT AT ONCE!

MEXICO'S MILITANT WASHERWOMEN

THE women of Cananea, the big copper camp of Sonora, Mexico, went on a crusade the other day to remove from the Chinese laundry-men their sacred rights to wash. How the cry began, how the wives—Chinamen, Mexicans and Americans alike—felt the onslaught, and how the authority, the presidente and even General Carranza himself availed the latter, is an amusing bit of a parable when according to the point of view.

For centuries it had been the undisputed right and duty of the Mexican women to wash the family clothes in the side of some stream or irrigation canal, soaping and beating them on a flat rock and hanging them—when bad rather yellow and impure—dry on the surrounding bushes. Before the village of Cananea became a busy mining camp the men who ran mines were receiving from fifty cents to one dollar a day as ranch hands and the women eked out this wage by washing clothes.

When the village grew into a large mining town the Mexicans became suddenly rich on a wage of three dollars and a half per day, and their womenfolks, like more sophisticated women elsewhere, refused to wash the clothes of the fastidious American managers, foremen and bosses, who demanded starched and well-ironed shirts and collars, and whose wives objected to too much blueing.

The Chinese, at this time, were coming into Mexico freely, and, finding themselves none too welcome, seized their opportunity by doing what comely else wanted to do, and set up their washing shacks, with queer heathen signs on the hotels, in the byways of the town. The Americans, finding out soon that the Chinese had learned a proper restraint in the matter of starching and starch, turned their washing over to them joyfully. Everybody was happy; the Mexican women, because they could set up to be ladies, the Americans, because their garments were no longer beaten to pieces on the rocks; and the Chinamen, because they had a good job.

Then came the revolution. Times began to grow hard and the copper company discharged two thousand out of seven thousand men. Every employer in Mexico knows that if one man in five has work, the rest will live on the hospitality of the neighbors. But after a while the workers grew tired of supporting so many relatives and friends and the women bethought them of the despised clothes of the foreigners which might be washed for money. When they went to get them, however, the Americans refused to take their washing away from the Chinamen, and heartlessly declared that they did not like the Mexican laundry methods.

THE BELLIGERENT WASHERWOMEN ON PARADE

Then the indignant housewives sent a deputation to the presidente of the town, demanding that the Chinese laundrymen be sent away; but the presidente had no power to send them farther than outside the city limits; and the Americans, alarmed at the prospect of having their garments again beaten on the rocks and blue as indigo, carried them to the Chinese laundries in the cañon beyond the town.

At this stage of the contest the would-be washerwomen organized a union under the leadership of the wife of one of the local labor agitators, made themselves a banner, and marching through the streets of the city, warned the Chinese to go. When they refused to go, the women raided a laundry, stole the foreigners' clothes, and scattered them throughout the town. Meanwhile every man in authority was trying to pacify the outraged housewives. The presidente and the Mexican police were afraid to touch them, and the women knew it.

The American consular agent, the protector of all foreigners, protested to the authorities on behalf of the Chinamen—as usual without getting any satisfaction. Although the women were ordered not to parade again, they started out the next day and, meeting a squad of soldiers in a deep cut, bluffed them out completely, while a sympathetic crowd jeered from the banks above. Then they marched triumphantly to the city hall, harangued the crowd for two hours, and, although four of them were finally arrested, it was only to be turned loose again at the demand of the populace.

When it was announced shortly afterward that General Carranza was coming to Cananea on his way northward to Chihuahua, the washerwomen determined to present their case to him; whereupon the general, privately warned against these militants, decided not to come to Cananea. The women, however, marched to Del Rio, the railway junction seven miles away, every day for a week in order to meet him, and again demanded that the Chinese be made to go. The valorous Carranza assured them that all Chinese and Japanese were now forbidden to come into Mexico and there would be no more of them; but at present the state of the republic was so perilous that he could not drive them out and offend the foreigners.

Defeated but still determined, the women returned home to their agitating, but when the Vera Cruz incident occurred, the Americans with one grand rush left the camp and now there were no gringo clothes to wash at any price and the Chinamen still remained. Nothing to wash, and by this time, perhaps, nothing to eat. Fortune has certainly failed the women of Cananea.

A LITTLE ANGEL OF THE MOUNTAINS

BY CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY

CHAPTER XIV—Continued

THE man not yet up had sprung to his feet, and as they heard Old Four Eyes' words they knew him shown. Then they quickly arranged themselves before Mrs. Morrison and the children, men of the unarmed opponents of religion endeavoring to stop them.

"Now, do your worst," said Old Four Eyes contemptuously as the others started. "We don't need no guns to deal with you," he added with withering scorn.

"I want to get in this front rank," said Mr. Morrison, forcing his way through the men. "I don't want to hide behind any man."

"Nor do I," said the intrepid Mrs. Morrison, seeking to follow her husband; but the men would not allow her to pass through them.

The forethought of the women was quite unnecessary, for if both parties had been armed, nothing on earth could have prevented an exchange of shots which, in that crowd, would have resulted in wholesale loss of life. The men with Dead Shot Jackson were not as bad as he, and there was something which kept them from shooting unarmed men and women and children. Perhaps the desperado would not have hesitated to pull the trigger, but he had an uneasy sense of the opposition behind him to that sort of a proceeding. He realized that at any time The Black Pup party might awaken to the situation and come him and turn him over as a fugitive from justice to Old Four Eyes. They might, if necessary, make a sacrifice of him for the purpose of rehabilitating themselves. The restraining influences of the woman and her wise plan of disarmament bade fair to thwart the outlaw's designs. His influence was waning. He could not open fire on unarmed men, much less on women and children.

It would have been all right to have shot the men if they had only had their guns, for he had got the drop on them. Even if they could not have drawn their own weapons, the rough-and-ready ethics of the frontier would have justified such action. That they had not got their weapons out in time would have been their own lookout. But nothing would sanction the wholesale murder of unarmed men. Facing a contempt even more clearly manifested than his own, Dead Shot Jackson made a final effort to recover his prestige and restore his sway over his followers.

"What we said about religion we means," he began fiercely. "But we won't molest you this time. I come here lookin' for a bad man an' a kid, but I don't see either of the cowards."

Little Olaf had been frightfully scared by the arrival of Dead Shot Jackson. He knew what cause the man had to hate him. In other days, before the arrival of the Morrisons, Parson Bill had cautioned him that he must flee the man as if he had been the devil himself, because Parson Bill realized that Jackson's passionate resentment would cause him to do harm to the lad without hesitation. Olaf had at first gladly welcomed the shelter of the cordon of men which had been drawn between the outlaw and Mrs. Morrison, the other women, the girls, and himself. He had prayed for protection and had got it.

But when the boy heard those last words of Dead Shot Jackson, something moved within his breast. His stubborn Norse courage came back with a rush. Before any one could realize what he was about, he broke away from restraining hands, forced himself between the ranks of men and boldly confronted the man of whom he had been so frightfully afraid. He stepped up on a low rock, too, so as to be more nearly on a level with him.

"Here I am!" he exclaimed, his face flaming under his bright hair, his blue eyes like steel. "I'm not a coward and neither is Parson Bill."

"Oh, it's you, is it?" roared Dead Shot Jackson, his eyes flashing with rage. "It's you that slandered an innocent man, an' tried to fix a murder on me. She was only an old Indian squaw, anyhow, an'—"

"You know you killed her," said the boy with splendid boldness—there was a contagion of courage in the camp that morning and he had caught it to the full—"I saw you do it, and you know you had about it."

"Why, you see, not even the little children are afraid of you, Jackson," said Old Four Eyes quickly, his face lighting up with so much admiration for the lad's courage as made him temporarily oblivious to his awful peril.

The desperado was a picture of impotent rage. To be so braved and mocked filled him with fury.

"If you was only a little older," he began hoarsely, his hand nervously moving his pistol. Mrs. Morrison cried out, but in the excitement her voice was unheeded. "But I'm lookin' for a bigger man, the man that took you in an' taught you to lie—"

"Are you looking for me, Mr. Jackson?" broke in a deep voice on the edge of the crowd.

The next instant Parson Bill, the Doc, and the bishop entered the arena.

CHAPTER XV

FOR a moment there was a profound silence. Parson Bill had arrived on the scene unnoticed. His quick eye had taken in the situation while he was yet some distance away. Fortunately he had realized completely what was going on. Therefore, instead of approaching in the usual way around the restaurant, and coming on the scene in the wake of the saloon element, leading the others, he had retraced his steps, passed around back of the eating house and the cabin in which the Morrisons lived, and had suddenly appeared from the rear. The crowd had concealed him until he had made that dramatic appearance. He was now standing right between the church party and the gang of desperadoes. The little bishop had followed him closely, as had the Doc. The Indian, on the contrary, had chosen to stop on the outskirts of the crowd, and as all eyes were fixed upon the newcomers, his arrival was completely unnoticed. A large and convenient pine

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

Mexico Without Huerta

VICTORIANO HUERTA, accompanied by his family and his former minister of war, General Blanquet, left Mexico at the port of Puerto Mexico July 18. Negotiations have been steadily in progress to effect a peaceable settlement between Provisional President Carbajal and General Carranza, and the administration at Washington has been urged to use its good offices in obtaining amnesty for Federal sympathizers and to bring about an orderly transfer of the government to the Constitutionalists. On July 23 the press reported rumors of a serious situation in Mexico City created by the approach of the bandits organized under Zapata, Villa's forces being too far away to protect that city from irresponsible armed bodies.

King Complicates Irish Question

WHAT at first was hailed as a most helpful step in the Irish Home Rule situation quickly developed into a new situation by itself. King George called a conference at Buckingham Palace of the leaders of all parties, and on July 21 made an address which stirred the British public into resentment as bordering too nearly on royal intervention. The king's own words were, "My intervention at this moment may be regarded as a new departure." The most objectionable part of the speech was this: "For months we have watched with deep misgivings the course of events in Ireland. The trend has been surely and steadily toward an appeal to force, and to-day the cry of civil war is on the lips of the most responsible and sober-minded of my people." In attempting to calm the storm of public resentment, Premier Asquith announced that the king had taken no step without the advice of his ministers. The explanation did not receive entire credence, and the total failure of the unusual conference was predicted. The Irish Nationalist leaders, John Redmond and John Dillon, as they left Buckingham Palace received an ovation from the battalion of Irish Guards in Wellington Barracks. Partisan politics may be relied upon to make the most of the incident.

Colombian Treaty in Doubt

SENATE opposition to the treaty with Colombia negotiated by Secretary Bryan, and which provides for the payment of $25,000,000 to Colombia and apologizes, in the opinion of some, for the acts of a former administration, has been strengthened by the formal request of Colonel Roosevelt to be heard by the Committee on the ground that it was during his administration that Panama became independent, and the Canal Zone across that country was acquired by this country. This request is expected to secure complete publicity for the discussions, which so far have been conducted in closed sessions.

Compensation Law Works Well

THE first claim made under the new Workmen's Compensation Law of New York State was based on a fatal accident occurring the day the law went into effect. The Commission awarded the widow of the workman who was killed $30 a month for the remainder of her life unless she remarries, this being 30 per cent. of her husband's monthly wages of $100, the compensation established by the law. The widow resides in Pennsylvania. This law is now in full operation throughout the State, 1,000 claims being filed daily.

Our Own Hunger-Strike Prisoner

THE predicament for prison authorities in England created by the militant suffragettes in their starvation tactics, which some Americans have considered easy of solution, now confronts our own authorities in the person of an I. W. W. agitator, Becky Edelson, who has been sentenced to three months in the workhouse on Blackwell's Island, New York, and has announced her intention to starve herself to death, in which event her friends on the outside threaten retaliation on a huge scale. Commissioner of Correction Katherine B. Davis has accepted Miss Edelson's challenge with complacency.

Discussing Pastors' Qualifications

THE fact that six $10,000 pastorates stood vacant for two years because men of sufficient ability to fill them could not be found was brought out in a recent discussion upon the supply and demand for men of executive ability in the pulpit. The discussion is being continued in the religious press with a view to bringing out an acceptable description of the kind of men who should be regarded as suitable for pastorates paying these large salaries, as well as for smaller churches. The magnifying of executive ability is deprecated by some.

New Haven Railroad Scandal

JULY 21, President Wilson directed Attorney General McReynolds to begin proceedings for the dissolution of the "unlawful monopoly of transportation facilities in New England now sought to be maintained by the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company," and that the "criminal aspects of the case be laid before the grand jury." Negotiations between the government and this railroad resulted some time ago in a plan of dissolution and readjustment, then supposedly agreed to by the railroad. The conditions reported by the Interstate Commerce Commission after its recent investigation of the New Haven System led to peremptory demands that the agreement be carried out, and the directors of the New Haven have refused compliance, especially as regards relinquishing control of the Boston and Maine Railroad. The truculent attitude of the former president of the New Haven, Charles S. Mellen, is a matter of amazed comment. The situation is regarded as one of the most scandalous in the history of railroading. President Hustis of the New Haven claims that the government's course will bring ruin to thousands of small stockholders, who are generally supposed to have already lost their investments! A suit to recover from the old directorate $306,000,000 (three times the amount alleged to have been lost by the manipulation of New Haven finances), has been filed by the estate of a Maine stockholder. The government's civil suit began July 23, and a special grand jury is to hear charges upon which criminal suit may be begun. The New Haven, through some sixteen transportation companies, controls 90 per cent. of New England's freight revenue, 95 per cent. of the passenger, 85 per cent. of the water transportation, and 91 per cent. of trolley mileage.

Dutch Reformed Growing

IN 1664 there were in New Amsterdam, after a development of thirty-six years, a total of eleven churches and seven ministers in the Reformed (Dutch) denomination, the oldest of the Presbyterian type in this country. To-day the denomination has 707 churches, 774 ministers, over 121,000 communicants, and 800 Sunday schools with an enrolment of 123,000. Last year this body raised for all objects $2,200,000 and devoted over a million for benevolences.

Aftermath of Sarajevo Tragedy

ON THURSDAY, July 23, Austria made demand upon Servia for punishment of all accomplices in the murder of Archduke Francis Ferdinand and his wife, the publication on Sunday, July 26, of an official disavowal of all connection with the anti-Austria propaganda, and the suppression of all such societies. Press despatches indicate that the government at Belgrade will refuse compliance, and that there will be a lining up of Germany, Italy and Austria opposed to Russia and Servia, with prospects of a new European war. Significant movements of troops are reported, including the assembling of a fleet of monitors at Semlin on the west bank of the Danube commanding the approach to Belgrade, and of seven armed corps at Temesvar, a railroad center from which several diverging lines could distribute troops along Servia's northern frontier.

Great French Trial On

WERE it not that one noted man was slain and the wife of another is on trial for his murder, the scenes being enacted in the court-room at Paris, where Mme. Henriette Caillaux, the second wife of the ex-premier, is on trial for the murder of M. Calmette, editor of the Figaro, would be almost as comic at times as they are dramatic. The chief characters in this important trial are greeted by the packed audience with cheers or with hoots, with commands or inquiries as the mood of the moment may be. The first wife of Premier Caillaux while on the witness stand exchanges barbed remarks with her former husband, who after complete defeat at her hands and vociferous denunciation by the crowd, grandly salutes and forgives this dangerous witness. The most bitter things are said in the most polite fashion by all parties concerned. By studied theatrical means, the climaxes in the testimony are reached, and the temperamental French audience reverses its judgment as often as it sees fit. The trial is a most sensational event, and the conflict between French chivalry that would protect a woman and French justice that would punish a murderess is expected to lead to an intensely dramatic finale.

DESTROYING OUR BLESSINGS

*SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR AUGUST 16

The Rebellious Workers

By Arthur H. Howland

THREE weeks ago we studied two stories which told of faithful and unfaithful service. To-day our story tells of servants who were not indolent but rebellious. In fact, the parable of the pounds, as recorded by Luke, has also this note of rebellion. "His citizens hated him, and sent an ambassage after him, saying, We will not have this man to reign over us." (Luke 19:14).

Our story to-day is a simple story of out-and-out rebellion. It does not appear that these farm hands and their superintendents were lazy. They were willing to work, but they were not willing to work for the man who owned the farm. In Luke's version of the story (Luke 20:9-18) he specifies that the owner of the farm sent three separate servants at different times to collect the revenue due him. The farm hands beat the first, beat and shamefully treated the second and wounded the third.

Then the owner sent his son, with this confident hope: "They will reverence my son."

But they said: "This is the heir. Come, let us kill him, that the inheritance may be ours." So they cast him out of the vineyard and killed him.

Christ won the sentence of these murderers from the lips of the very people to whom he told the story and whom he intended to rebuke by it. "What will he do to those farm-hands?" he asked.

"He will miserably destroy those miserable men," they answered, "and will let out the vineyard to others."

"That is exactly what God is going to do with your nation," he explained. "He sent his servants, the prophets, to urge you to give God his due, and you rejected them. Now he has sent his Son, and you are going to kill him."

Then he quoted their own Scripture: "The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner." There was an old legend which said that when Solomon's temple was being built one stone was found which had a very strange shape. It could not be made to fit into the temple plans. So the builders threw it away. The temple was "forty and six years in building," so the rejected stone became covered with moss and was a thing of ridicule. But when the day came on which the temple was to be finished the top stone, the cap-stone, was missing. Some one suggested that the rejected stone might have been intended for this place. So it was carried to the top and found to be the missing stone of honor. Christ changed that legend in making his point. The rejected stone was made "the head of the corner." That is the most important stone in the foundation. And he is thinking of himself here as the great Foundation of the religious life of the world. It may be, as Schaff's commentary suggests, that the corner implies a reference to the union of the Jews and the Gentiles. Christ brings these two elements of the world's religious life together, and the structure of spiritual life in both cases is built upon him as the foundation.

But the main fact he is conveying to his hearers in this particular story and the Old Testament quotation is that the kingdom of God was to be taken away from the Jews as a distinct possession and given to other hands who would make wise and fruitful and honorable use of it. "The kingdom of God," he declared, "shall be taken away from you and shall be given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof."

GENERAL SECRETARIES OF THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION

There are some things in this parable which some teachers and leaders will not like, just as there were things in it that the Jews to whom he was speaking did not like. There would seem to have been a "strike" in the business of this vineyard. And it is true that Jesus in his total teaching took the side of the poor against the rich, the laborer against the oppressor. But in this case he sides with the owner. It was his farm and the farm-hands had entered into a contract with him to work the farm and give him his share of the proceeds. It will do our social reformers good to remember that Jesus objected to violence. However matters are to be adjusted, it is not to be through the sword. And he could not, even in a parable, tolerate the laborers who would beat and wound and, as Matthew records it, kill the agent of the owner who had come on a legitimate mission.

But it is very clear throughout the parable that Jesus is here teaching a spiritual and not an economic lesson. The lesson is twofold. First, that it is a hopelessly evil thing to rebel against God; second, that since God has sent his Son into the world to be his representative, it is impossible to reject him and be saved.

We must not forget, in fulfilling our obligations to our neighbor, that, after all, the "first commandment" is that we love the Lord our God with all our heart, with all our soul, with all our mind and with all our strength. The fulfilling of the second commandment, to love our neighbors as ourselves, can have value and bring reward only as it is based on this first commandment. So the lesson of the parable is that just as these laborers should have given the owner of the vineyard his just dues, so we in our lives must bring the "first fruits" of our life and service to God himself. There is grave danger that the church may, as she gets interested in "social service," forget that after all her real business is to turn the hearts of men to their Creator, and to lead the world into the true worship of the true God.

And now, is Christ, in insisting that he should be recognized as "the head of the corner," arbitrary and egoistic? Why does he insist that men should recognize him? How could he, with his gentle lips, say these terrible words about himself—that upon whomsoever this stone, which represents him, shall fall, "it will grind him to powder"? But we shall find that Christ's meaning was thoroughly kind and thoroughly unselfish, thoroughly in keeping with his great and never-failing passion to help mankind.

The rejection of Christ implies a spirit which is totally unfit to be of service in this life and totally unfit to inherit eternal life. All that Christ asks is thoroughly within the bounds of reason and right. He asks a man to submit to a higher law than the law of self; he asks a man to yield his own will to the will of God; he asks a man to consent to become a part of that vast movement of service and helpfulness and brotherhood in his name which is changing the world and preparing the way for heaven. Certainly it is true that a man who refuses to yield to that program will be ground to powder. There is no abiding place for him either in this world or the next.

The Service Training Class

By Frank L. Brown

THIS class for the training of Sunday school officers and committee workers should be composed of those young people, from 16 to 25 years of age, who will agree, after they have had some preparation in the line chosen, to respond to the call for service.

While it would be desirable for the teacher of such a class to be trained, it is not necessary. Any intelligent teacher, or the pastor or superintendent, should be able to direct such a class. All that is needed is to understand the plan and put the material in the hands of the young people and then guide the work week by week.

Young people for this class can easily be found among those who like to do things, but who have not ordinarily the patience to take a special course in pedagogy or psychology as may be required of those who are to fit themselves as teachers. About twenty-five per cent. of all young people are of this motor class. They have the executive function. Their energies are often lost by the school and church to other channels because these energies are not discovered and directed.

There are often classes promoted from the Intermediate to the Senior Department at 16 and 17 years of age that would make excellent material for such a class. In such a case the teacher of the class should be encouraged to make it a service training class and assume the leadership. And at 16 or 17 these young people are eager to train for special service. It is God's time for such training.

While the class can meet during the week if preferred, rather than on Sunday, the results will be larger if it meets during the regular lesson session, for a larger number can attend then and the work is as important as studying a particular Bible lesson.

The question may be asked, Could not this training of Sunday school officers and special workers be carried on as a part of the teacher training class? And I answer, yes. Only I would change the name to a Workers' Training Class for the training of both teachers and officers.

Where such a Workers' Training Class is formed the Old and New Testament Outlines, such as are found in all Teacher Training Courses, may be studied by all until concluded. Then a few principles of pedagogy and psychology could be emphasized, but a detailed study of these subjects should not be undertaken by those who will not become teachers. But the book on Sunday School Organization, which is a part of all Teacher Training Courses, should be studied carefully, for those who are to become leaders in the school life should know something of the history, aim, purpose and plan of the Sunday school. The specialization book and work, suggested below, should be taken up outside of this class session.

If only one or two in a particular school can be found to train for officers and special workers, these can be given the material for training and coached along by the pastor or superintendent on the lines suggested later.

Suppose you ask your young people to choose one or more of the following tasks and then offer to coach them to prepare for service:

Superintendent, Assistant Superintendent, Department Superintendent, Superintendent of Grading and Promotions, Superintendent of Teacher Training, Secretary, Librarian, Musical Director, Treasurer or Chairman Finance Committee, Publicity Specialist, Employment Committee, Social Committee, Committees on Social Service, Welcome or "Friendly Grip," and Athletics, Visitation Committee, Temperance Committee, Purity Committee, Missionary Committee, Sunday School Architecture, Class Organizations, Other Organizations, Mothers' or Parents' Associations, Spiritual or Decision Day Committee, Committee on Special Days, such as Easter, Children's Day, Patriotic Days, Rally Day, Christmas.

In the average school it would be impossible to secure young people to train for all this work. But it will be suggestive of the things within the scope of the Sunday school for which they can be trained. Those lines of service should be selected and trained for that are most needed in the school and community. If only one young person was started and equipped, that young person, the school and the community would be that much richer and stronger.

In these articles we shall take up in turn these several distinct lines of service, beginning with the superintendent, and present under each the best methods for accomplishing the particular task.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

A NUMBER of readers ask what the requirements are for admission to the CHRISTIAN HERALD Prayer League. There are no requirements whatever, except to send in a request for prayer, an acknowledgment of answered prayer, or merely a request to be enrolled in the League. After careful deliberation it has seemed wise not to issue certificates of membership. Experience shows that unscrupulous persons are apt to obtain possession of such documents and make dishonorable use of them. The enrolment is carefully kept at the CHRISTIAN HERALD office, and all applications for membership or other communications accurately recorded.

Mrs. J. C. writes: "I wrote asking for the prayers of the Prayer League for the mental restoration and the salvation of a dear daughter. I cannot express in words the joy and thankfulness I felt last Sabbath when she came to visit me, greeting me in her former gentle, affectionate manner, and during our two hours of lovely intercourse. I had been grieving over the passing of a beloved son, but the thought came that if God has wrought such a wonderful thing for this dear daughter on earth, how much greater must be the transformation for our beloved son where 'the former things are passed away.' Then my faith was strengthened by remembering Rev. 21: 4." M. E. B. writes to thank God that a son has been delivered from the drink habit; M. H., of Toronto, Ontario, that her husband has been saved from unbelief and from the appetite for strong drink. Miss A. R., of Howard City, Mich., writes: "I wish to acknowledge God's wondrous mercy and love in answering my prayer for healing. I am now entirely well, and happy." "Mildred" writes from Natural Bridge, Fla.: "I wish to acknowledge God's answer to prayers for my mother's healing." Miss E. M. writes: "God has graciously answered our prayer. My mother, who was given up to die, has been restored to health." Mrs. M. M. writes: "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness in healing our dear brother, who has been afflicted for years with a severe nervous trouble."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

Mrs. W. F. P., Atlanta, Ga.; M. M. W., Gadsen, Ala.; M. W., Toronto, Ont.; Miss H. B., Baldwin, Kan.; Mrs. M. G. B., Carstairs, Alberta; J. H. O'N., Los Altos, Calif.; Mrs. C. D. M., Harmony Village, Va.; Mrs. T. J. K., Bogue, Kan.; Mrs. S. E. W., Nashua, N. H.; A CHRISTIAN HERALD Reader, Concord, Tenn.

A very earnest request for spiritual help, restoration of hearing and health and deliverance from trouble comes from Mrs. L. D. J. A. G., a retired preacher, feels able to re-enter the work, and asks prayers that a way may be opened. He preaches in either English or German. A resident in an old Ladies' Home asks prayer for spiritual and physical blessing for herself. She writes: "I asked one lady here who is very much afflicted physically if she would like to be prayed for by the Prayer League and what she most desired. She said: 'That she might feel the presence of the Holy Spirit.'" Will all the members of the League especially remember these aged friends? Mrs. A. H. writes: "My desire is to be made well of heart disease. Please pray that I may be spared to raise my two boys and stay with my husband; and that all our family may come nearer to God."

N. R. G. requests prayer for victory for State-wide prohibition in Virginia. Mrs. E. B., for a revival at Vandergrift, Pa.; Mrs. T. I. D., that the love of God may be awakened in church and community at Morris Plains, N. J.; P. N. L., for prohibition in the town of Oberlin, Ohio, and a revival in the M. E. church there; Mrs. E. K., of Albia, Iowa, and Mrs. L. L., of New, Ohio, for temperance victories; M. S. W., for a large work of grace at Rowe, Mass.; Mrs. F. M., for a revival in Harford, Md.; Mrs. B. E., for a revival at Mocksville, N. C.

The following friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing:

M. B.; Mrs. A. W.; J. C. R.; Mrs. C. McL. (to be brought back to the fold); M. L. O.; Sad Hearted, Lenoir, N. C.; L. B.; Mrs. S. D. K.; E. M. G.; Mrs. S. E. W.; Mrs. E. C. Z.; Mrs. J. C. S.; Mr. and Mrs. C. W. H.; S. E.; M. F. B.; Mrs. M. Q. B.; Mrs. R. T.; Mrs. L. L. (to be saved); Mrs. M. G. B.; W. H.; Mrs. D. H. W.; Mrs. A. M.; E. F. F.; Mrs. D. S.; Mrs. A. S. T. S.; H. M.; Mrs. S. M. A.; Mrs. L. D. X.; Mrs. E. A. S.; Mrs. M. C. J.; R. B. (that the will of God may be made clear); Miss A. R.; C. K.; Mrs. R. E. M.; E. W.; Mrs. M. E. S.; M. J. W.

Miss J. C. W., L. B. and W. R. M. request prayer that sisters may be restored to their right minds; Mr. and Mrs. O. E., that their daughter's mind may be strengthened; Mrs. T. I. D., that her husband's mind may be strengthened; A. S. B. E., M. E. T. and Mrs. E. S., that the minds of other relatives or friends may be restored.

P. N. L. and Mrs. L. W. request prayer that sight may be restored; Miss F. S., that mother's sight may be restored; N. R. G., Mrs. E. A. B., J. M. S., Mrs. E. W. R., Mrs. D. L., that sight for themselves or others may be strengthened or restored; Mrs. A. D. Z., Mrs. A. W., Miss R. E., Mrs. J. D D., E. M. G., A. F. G. and Mrs. L. D. request prayer that hearing may be restored; H. W. C., that a daughter's hearing may be restored; Mrs. E. W. R., that a friend may regain hearing.

The following friends ask prayer for the conversion of sons:

Mrs. M. A. F.; A. S. P. E.; Mrs. S. D. K.; Mrs. I. L. M.; J. H.; Mrs. W. E. B.; A Mother (that three sons may be saved); Mrs. H. G.; Mrs. A. A. N.; A. F. G.; Mrs. R. T. (that five sons may be saved); Mrs. H. P. M.; M. E. S.; Mrs. A. N.; Mrs. S. E. J.; Mrs. C. H. W.; Mrs. R. E. M.; E. W.; Mrs. J. J. C.

The following friends ask prayer for the conversion of husbands:

Mrs. B.; Mrs. D. R. A.; Mrs. E. McC.; Mrs. W. E. G.; E. M. G.; Mrs. F. M.; Mrs. G. L.; Mrs. J. S. F.; Mrs. R. T.; A. A. D.; M. M.; Mrs. A. M.; Mrs. R. E. M.; Mrs. L. D. X.; M. E. B.; Mrs. F. E.; Mrs. C. H. W.

The following friends ask prayer for the conversion of other relatives and friends:

Mrs. E. K.; E. E. P.; Mrs. R. T.; Mrs. L. L.; M. G. B.; Mrs. M. E. C.; Mrs. J. K.; Mrs. R. T.; Mrs. L. Y.; M. S. W.; M. E. S.; Mrs. A. P. (that four members of family may be saved); M. M.; Mrs. B.; M. B.; Mrs. A. D. Z.; Mrs. S. D. K.; Mrs. E. B.; Mrs. I. L. M.; Mrs. L. A. D.; P. N. L.; M. L. H.; S. E.

Mrs. E. K., Mrs. L. L., Mrs. A. N., Mrs. S. E. J. request prayer that sons may be saved from power of strong drink. Mrs. E. McC. and Mrs. F. M., that husbands may overcome this appetite; F. W. M., a brother; Mrs. C. McL., Mrs. L. A. D., P. N. L. and Mrs. J. K. that other relatives or friends may be delivered from this habit.

The following friends request prayer for healing for themselves or others:

Miss B. E.; Mrs. E. G. M.; Mrs. R. P. R.; Mrs. F. S. J.; Mrs. E. R. L.; L. C.; C. K.; M. J. W.; Mrs. J. J. C.; Mrs. M. P.; A. A. D.; Mrs. A. P.; Mrs. H. D.; A. P. F.; Mrs. H. V. S.; W. R. W.; W. R. SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS' ROUND TABLE

Conducted by FRANK L. BROWN, General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

—ARE WE IN DANGER of over-emphasizing the social phase of our Sunday school work?—B. L. H.

I do not think, in dealing with young people, there is this danger, provided we keep strong the spiritual emphasis and provided officers and teachers use these social occasions as opportunities of drawing close to the scholars. The way to a scholar's heart is made much more sure and direct if a basis of mutual understanding and comradeship has been reached. And the hunger for the social life in young people is so strong that if we fail to understand and meet that hunger we have missed one of God's splendid avenues of approach to the life.

So if we want to beat the devil at his own game and to hold these young people through these swift moving years we must intelligently and adequately plan for the social life, and home them in the life of the church instead of surrendering them for their social life to the community which commercializes its pleasures and has no moral standard.

It is a great deal better for young people to make their social acquaintances within the church than without it. We cannot criticize and condemn the things young people do that we might not do at our age until we have made every effort to provide a good substitute. We must not say "don't" until we have first said "do." We must remember how we felt when we were young and add to that memory the knowledge of the tremendous social pull of the modern community, which in many places has gone pleasure-mad. And in wholesomely providing for the social life of these young people, we shall be earning their gratitude, be safeguarding them during the most perilous time of their lives, and be one with the great plan of the Master, who entered into life's joys as well as its sorrows and sanctified all.

Reisner's excellent book, Social Plans for Young People, and Five Hundred Social Plans will prove suggestive.

—I HAVE BEEN RECENTLY elected secretary and treasurer of our Sunday school. Our school is not wholly self-supporting. We make a voluntary cost charge for quarterlies, and on special occasions such as picnics, Christmas, etc., we solicit money from people at large to defray the cost of some. At the end of our business year, the moneys which are left are sent to missions, etc. Should a Sunday school be a self-supporting organization? Should the present system in our school be changed there is no doubt that the support for the cause of missions will be lessened.

In theory, the Sunday school, as the Bible teaching service of the church, should be supported by the church, as to its running expenses, and the offerings of the school be devoted to the church and special benevolences. This would bind the church and Sunday school together in a closer relationship than at present. I say in theory, for the fact is that the vision of the average member of the Official Board as to the Sunday school is so limited that it would be a calamity to leave the support of the Sunday school in its modern needs to the tender mercies of the ordinary Official Board. In another generation, when the scholars now in the Sunday school shall have become the Official Board of the church, the plan of church support of the Sunday school can be applied without injury to the great mission of the Sunday school.

I believe you should continue your present system of self-support, and if the income is not sufficient for expenses of lesson helps the church should make a special contribution to supply what is needed. This is all on the supposition that your school is giving now what it can. But you should seek to tell the school for what the money is going, as people will give more liberally if they are informed, and then stimulated by team work, to larger giving.

I think your plan of giving to missions what is left over from your current income at the end of the year is wrong. I believe the scholars should give directly to the missionary cause at stated times, monthly or quarterly, and be then informed what their money does. The missionary cause is big enough to be entitled to a special presentation of gifts, and if we are to train a generation of missionary enthusiasts we must guide the children to intelligent giving when they are young.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Christians Away from Home*

WHAT do we do with our Christian profession when we are away from home at vacation time? This is a question which comes up every year to our young people in the Epworth League and other church societies. It is a bad thing to have principles which fluctuate. You have heard many times of that little animal, the chameleon, who has no color of his own to speak of, but who takes the color of whatever object he happens to be clinging to. It is an easy thing to drift through life like this, not bothering to show by speech or act that we are different from the groups of people among whom we happen to find ourselves. But the kind of people who count, the kind of people who help things along, are the people who are just the same, so far as matters of principle and righteousness go, no matter how the various groups of their neighbors may vary. It is not necessary to be disagreeable or offensive or unpleasantly aggressive. But it is necessary, in a firm, quiet way, to stand all the time, wherever we are, for the things that are pure and right and helpful and Christlike.

There is always a special temptation to let down our standards, change our principles, when we go away from home. In the home circle, the home church, the home town, there are always strengthening and steadying restraints. When we are among people who do not know us these restraints vanish. But it is just then the real test of our character comes. To do right just for the sake of right, to stand for the things that Christ likes even at the expense of a little popularity, this is a part of the opportunity Christians have in these easy-going days of being brave and of taking up our cross.

Remember that Christ does not want to interfere with our fun so long as it is innocent fun. It happens that the Christian Endeavor and the Baptist Young People's lesson for this week is one that will help in this question that we are discussing here. Read the paragraphs on that subject and carry with you on your vacation the idea of readiness to bring cheer to others. Remember that Jesus was perfectly willing to have a good time and always eager to have others have a good time.

Find your way into some group of Christians in the place to which you go, and get into fellowship with them. If it is possible to spend your vacation with some of the great Christian assemblies or at some convention of earnest Christians, young or old, you will find that the vacation will be forever a happy and helpful memory.

Our Social Life for Christ*

A NEW word recently appeared upon the language horizon. It is "undumpisher." The Christian Advocate quotes from a story entitled Gay Morning, by J. E. Buckrose, the paragraphs which will explain this newcomer and its mission:

"Here comes the undumpisher." "What's that?" "Undumpishers," said Mr. Mitchell, "are people who, the moment they come near, cause that sudden lightening of the heart which makes life seem a party."

"The dumps" is a dreadful disease. We hear people constantly complaining that they are having them. Depression, anxiety, trouble, mental and spiritual clouds are widespread. But along comes this light-hearted merry-maker, and "the dumps" disappear. Clouds of worry and trouble, of doubt and disagreement, of difficulty and perplexity and depression, fly away when he arrives.

Jesus was undoubtedly a man like that. There was evidently about him, especially during the first years of his ministry and of course during his life as a youth and citizen and laborer in Nazareth, an atmosphere of cheeriness, of confidence, of light-hearted good-fellowship. The way the little children trooped after him, the way the outcasts and the poverty-stricken and the oppressed followed him, shows that he had this gift of gladness and the gift of communicating that gladness to others.

There is a beautiful verse in the Proverbs: "A merry heart doeth good like a medicine." Prov. 17: 22. This is a perfectly true scientific fact. Laughter and good cheer are recognized as among the greatest health-bringers in the world. A prominent preacher in Indiana, a man of real spiritual power, once made a sermon on that text. He had so much to say in it about laughter and good cheer and told us so many things to provoke merriment that he later developed it into a lecture which he delivered all over the State, and which accomplished untold good. He called it "Good Medicine. Have Some!" And people went in great numbers to share in this good man's mirth and came away to do more than ever in the way of being cheer-spreaders.

But after all, the business of spreading cheer is not the only item of our social obligations. The word "social" is a very large word. It means the whole business of our relation to our fellow men. It is a particularly beautiful word, because it comes from the old Latin word meaning "comrade." It stands for fellowship. It means that entire attitude of mind which feels an interest in the lives of other people, which wants to get close to them, which wants to help, which wants to see justice and opportunity and salvation brought to all. The religion of Jesus was almost pre-eminently a social matter. He taught that the first great requirement of life was to love God, to be in fellowship with him. But he made it very plain throughout the whole of his life and teaching that the only way to show that we are in fellowship with God, the only way by which we can be true to that fellowship and work out its principles, is to live in real fellowship with our neighbor. That is what it means to live "our social life for Christ."

It is a dreadful thing that the word "society" in the worldly fashionable sense has come to mean exclusiveness. It means that a small circle of prosperous people have shut themselves away from real social fellowship. In fact many of those who reign in so-called "society" have made their way to this high place of exclusiveness by treading on the rights of others. They have fought their way, or some one else has fought the way for them, at the expense of others into this exclusive circle. It is a worse than foolish thing to have ambitions to get into society in this sense. To get into society in this way and in this spirit is to get out of society in the sense that Jesus interprets society and in the sense in which he wants us to be truly social.

To have a heart interest in every life we touch, to care not to get up away from the rest, but down among them where we can serve them, to long to bring gladness and cheer and wholesomeness to all, to be close friends of Jesus and lead others to glad fellowship with him, to help him lift the burdens away from the poor and bring more abundant life to the minds and bodies and souls of all men, this is what it means to live "our social life for Christ."

* "OUR SOCIAL LIFE FOR CHRIST." Luke 24: 13-35. (Led by the Social Committee.) Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic for Sunday, August 16, 1914.

"THE SEAMAN'S FRIEND"

AMONG great ships at harbor within the Virginia Capes in the vicinity of Norfolk, a busy little craft known as "the Seaman's Friend" is a familiar visitor to thousands of sailors. In 1826, when the little seaport town of Norfolk was only a borough, a few Christian men and women foresaw the large opportunity of establishing a mission ashore for sailors, and "The Seamen's Bethel" shows a great record of achievement for the many years that have elapsed. The present chaplain, Rev. J. T. Routtan, initiated the practice of making daily visits to incoming vessels; hence the "Seaman's Friend," fitted out in comforts and accessories to welcome the sailors to the more ample quarters of the Seamen's Bethel on Main Street.

A BUSY LITTLE CRAFT

During the summer months, in connection with the distribution from the launch of Bibles and other literature, a personal invitation is given these men by the chaplain to the services at the shore-home. There a hospitable repast is often set out, prepared by women. Chaplain Routtan was himself a sailor, and so is well fitted to the needs of this work. For more than thirty-three years he has watched Norfolk grow as a seacoast town. Thousands of sailors have passed through the doors of the Seamen's Bethel, and have come to esteem with gratitude its homelike atmosphere. It does not provide him lodging, but it does extend help in the time of shore "shipwreck."

Hundreds have witnessed to finding salvation in the Bethel.

tree offered him concealment from the desperadoes, and with instinctive cunning he hid instantly behind it. From its shelter he could see and hear while yet hid from the observation of Dead Shot Jackson and his friends.

The bishop was, of course, unarmed. Parson Bill and the Doc had their guns with them, and what was more to the point, they had them out and they had Dead Shot Jackson completely covered. Blue Wing had his gun out, too; but as no one noticed him, that fact did not enter into anybody's calculations.

A cheer broke from the religious element at the sudden reversal of the situation. Yet conditions were not greatly different, for although Parson Bill and the Doc had Dead Shot Jackson and his nearest friends covered, they themselves were at the same time covered by the guns of the chief desperado and by those of all his friends and followers. The advantage to the Christians in the gun play was only temporary, and in any promiscuous or general shooting their party was bound to come off second best.

Mr. and Mrs. Morrison realized this instantly. It seemed to the latter that the very thing she had striven to prevent—a wholesale battle—was about to occur. The bishop, entirely unaware of the issues which were joined or the causes which were back of them, stood staring in petrified amazement. The fact of being met by an armed guard had partly enlightened him, and from slight allusions by his guards on their upward march, he had learned something of the situation; but he never dreamed of the full extent of the perils of carrying the Gospel, or of the heroic work of the two humble missionaries, his friends, who had broken ground and caused him to be sent there. But he was as brave as any man there, and he stood quietly by, waiting the turn of events. He was in the front rank, and naturally would have been one of the first to be shot if there was any shooting. The situation was too tense for even the ordinary greetings to the Morrisons, save such as could be given by the eyes alone.

Mrs. Morrison now pushed her way to the front. She would not be denied, and it was she who intervened to break the tenseness of the situation. Perhaps only she could have done so.

"Parson Bill," she said, trying to control her voice and keep out of it the perfectly natural tremor induced by the excitement and obvious danger, "you notice that all of the Christian men here have laid aside their weapons, on the ground that they need no armed protection against their fellows other than that God will give them when assembled in an orderly way for his worship on his day. I ask you and the Doc to lay aside yours also."

"What! Lay down my gun with that murderous dog training his on my heart?" exclaimed Parson Bill. "You don't know what you ask, ma'am."

"I do, indeed I do. And you, too," she turned to the Doc. "Please—please give me your guns."

"By heaven," roared one of The Black Pup party from the outskirts in rude appreciation of her faith and courage, "the woman's got more nerve than any of 'em!"

"There are no braver men on earth than my friends here," said Mrs. Morrison quickly. "I am sure you appreciate that. I begin to realize how brave a thing they have all done in complying with my request. I know that none of you would shoot unarmed men, much less me."

"We was all with Dead Shot Jackson," began one of the whilom mockers, won to admiration at last, "but now—"

"Silence!" roared the desperado in final effort at mastering the situation. "Parson Bill, I've got a score to settle with you an' I'm goin' to settle it yere an' now. You done me dirt. You run me out of this yere camp, you an' that yeller-headed pup you took up an' showed how to lie about me. An' all about shootin' of a low-down Injun squaw, which I never done it," he added on second thought. "You've made life a burden for me. I can't go nowhere to git likker, an' it's hard to find some 'un even to play a game of keerds with me so long as you're around. One of us has got to cash in yere and now. You got your gun out an' you've got as much chance as I have."

"Oh, I have, have I?" said Parson Bill, quietly stepping toward the woman. "Here, Mrs. Morrison."

He extended his weapon toward her as he spoke, as indifferently as if there had been no such a man on earth as Dead Shot Jackson and completely oblivious to the fact that the latter's gun was pointed at him.

"Mine goes with his'n, ma'am," said the Doc quietly, "an' yere it is."

"Thank God," said Mrs. Morrison.

SAXON $395

Judge the SAXON by What It Is Doing

The picture above represents the Saxon in a new dress, with a new color scheme—elegant, dark blue body and black running gear, with running boards, headlights in front, gasoline filler cap extending through cowl, hinged bonnet and 38 other detail refinements.

ON JULY 4 the Saxon car finally demonstrated its independence of all road conditions. For on that famous day a Saxon car reached San Francisco, having traveled 3,389 miles overland from New York in 30 days across the Lincoln Highway—the first automobile to make a continuous trip from New York to San Francisco over the Highway, and the first car of its size and price to make the journey from coast to coast.

Over the Alleghanies, over the Rockies, over the Sierras went the Saxon without faltering. Through mud, through sand, over the great plains, across the Great American Desert the Saxon held to its schedule, and averaged 30 miles to the gallon of gasoline all the way!

8,000 Miles in 60 Days

The same car, from April 8 to May 8, ran 135 miles a day for 30 consecutive days—4050 miles—averaging 30 miles to the gallon of gasoline and 150 miles per quart of oil, covering the entire distance on the original set of tires. In 60 days this transcontinental car has covered almost 8,000 miles—as far as the average owner drives in two years.

One hundred regular stock Saxon cars, in as many towns all over the country, made non-stop runs of 200 miles each, averaging 34.53 miles per gallon of gasoline—less than half a cent a mile for fuel, less than ¼ cent a mile per passenger.

Order Your Saxon Now

With this evidence before you there is no reason for hesitating to buy your Saxon now. Why not get the benefit of the motoring season, now at its height—in a Saxon? The demand for these cars is great, so we urge you to act quickly. Call on the nearest Saxon dealer and place your order immediately for the earliest possible delivery.

ULSTER IN DESPERATE MOOD

By Chancellor Day, in The Christian Advocate (New York), July 16, 1911

THE feeling in the Ulster region is as intense on the Home Rule question as were the passions of men in the time of my boyhood on the Civil War. At the same time it is as calm as it is intense, showing that there is desperate determination in it. There is no bluster nor brag. Those who talk of a big bluff are mistaken.

The Irish of the north impressed me as independent, self-reliant and quietly courageous. They do not want to fight, but they will fight for their liberty. Strange as it may seem, they associate their liberty with the very government that Redmond and his followers are trying to remove as tyrannical. The Irishmen of Ulster are satisfied and are prospering under the British rule. They are the most prosperous Irishmen of Ireland. They fear for their great industries, their Protestantism and their common liberties under Home Rule. The ruling power will be in the south, where there are comparatively no manufacturing industries nor great invested active capital in commerce. Belfast fears the tax assessors looking for revenue to carry on a reckless, political government.

The Protestants have no faith in the promises of religious freedom. They say, "Did Rome ever keep her word?" It is not all a religious question, nor all a commercial question. It is the combination of the two. And they are great considerations at Belfast. Ship building is enormous there. We saw the Britannic of 50,000 tons which was recently launched. Here the Olympic, nearly as large, was built. We looked with sad feelings upon the stocks from which the Titanic went out to her fate. Was that fearful iceberg launched the same day?

The linen industry calls purchasers from all parts of the civilized world to Belfast. Why, they say, should we turn over prosperous Belfast to be used for taxes which we cannot control in either levy or expenditure, by a majority irresponsible and indifferent to our future? Already it is more than whispered that the immense shipbuilding firm mentioned, employing over 10,000 men, is planning removal to Scotland.

There is no compromise between Protestantism and Catholicism. The Presbyterians are the strongest of the Protestant bodies. Methodism is numerically weak, but exerts a powerful influence. It is virile and aggressive. It knows its mind and apparently does not cringe. It has been numerically weakened by contributing an average of one church a year of five hundred members for a generation to American Methodism. These two denominations are practically solid in opposition to Home Rule. But in the vote taken in the Irish Methodist Conference one quarter refused to vote against Home Rule. I was told by leading men that this was not as it appeared. Many of the men were decidedly against taking the question in the Conference. Some of them, a comparatively few, live in regions where a too positive pronouncement would cause division in the churches. They must practice the "wisdom of the serpent."

While the Ulstermen are not making much noise, they are preparing with grim determination. I was awakened at my hotel the other night by the sharp voice of command, "Right, left," "Right, left," and the sound of manual of arms. The hour was past midnight. There is evidently a desire not to irritate or make a display. One sees very little of the volunteers in the daytime. A prominent Home Ruler told me yesterday on my arrival here that he had been through Ulster during the week and he said: "The Ulsterman will fight. I thought it was a bluff. It is not; he will fight." Some Catholics are opposed to Home Rule, fearing the consequences to their church if the politicians come into power. Just now the amendment of the bill introduced into the House of Lords is causing excitement, and is pronounced by those opposed to Home Rule insincere and farcical. It has only added fuel to the flames.

All Ireland is in suspense. One influential paper believes that the government will find a way out and that Home Rule will not become a law; that under no condition will the government force a civil war. An American naturally thinks there could have been a better solution, something like our States for England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland, or, better for a land like Great Britain, the Provinces of Canada.

Great Britain has been marvelously wise in her colonies. In this instance she seems to be the victim of a political bargain. It means destruction to the party in power, whichever way it goes.

Baptist Resolutions on Rome

AT THE annual Convention of Southern Baptists, held in Nashville, Tenn., May 13-18, 1914, J. W. Porter, Kentucky, offered the following resolution, which, after remarks by J. W. Porter; J. B. Gambrell, Texas; Joshua Levering, Maryland; W. L. Pickard, Georgia; J. H. Eager, Maryland; H. W. Battle, Virginia; R. A. Kimbrough, Texas; A. J. Barton, Texas, and H. F. Vermillion, New Mexico, was adopted:

Resolved, That we, the representatives of two and a half millions of Baptists in convention assembled, while reaffirming our age-long contention of the right of every man to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, deny the right of any man or organization to force the conclusions of conscience upon any man, woman or child.

Resolved, That we view with serious alarm and vigorous protest the efforts of the Roman Catholic hierarchy to gain control of our government, and thereby be in a position to fasten either its faith or fallacies upon the consciences of a free and sovereign people.

Resolved, That we deeply deplore the presence of a papal legate as the representative of the Vatican at our national capital for the purpose of influencing governmental affairs.

Resolved, That we earnestly protest against the presence of our national representatives in their official capacity at ecclesiastical functions, and the manifest disposition on the part of some of our politicians to show deference to so-called church dignitaries.

Resolved, That we also protest against the sentencing of any person, by any judge, to serve in any religious institution.

Resolved, That since Baptists have borne the brunt of the battle which has given religious liberty to the people of the United States, we herein affirm our determination to perpetuate this priceless boon for the present and all coming generations. To this end we pledge our property, our lives, and our sacred honor.

Enlightenment Needed

I CONSIDER that the educational campaign which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been waging to awaken sleeping Protestantism and all patriotic, liberty-loving Americans to a realization of the serious and awful dangers with which our civil and religious liberties are threatened at the hands of the gigantic political machine of Roman Catholicism, is one of the noblest works that this splendid paper has ever undertaken. The government at Washington has drifted virtually into the hands of this religio-political system, the press is comparatively controlled by the same machine and patriotic speakers are being persecuted on almost every hand. Therefore it does our hearts good and makes our souls rejoice to see THE CHRISTIAN HERALD taking the bold and loyal stand to enlighten the millions of liberty-loving American citizens as to the actual existing dangers.

Famine in Cape Verde Islands

CRUEL famine conditions exist in the Cape Verde Islands. Mrs. J. N. Tourinho, wife of a native evangelical missionary, writes from Santa Antao under date of June 22 to her husband, who is now in the United States to raise funds for the stricken people: "The famine here is growing worse. Many people weak and others found dead in the morning under the trees and stretched out in the valleys like animals. It breaks one's heart to see how the people are disappearing."

Any interested reader may address Mr. Tourinho in care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The Anvil of God's Word

[Around the world this poem has gone, till, losing the author's name, others were attached. It appeared in The Christian Herald Almanac for 1914, wrongly credited to Dr. John Clifford. The real author is Mr. Lu B. Cake, of No. 90 West Broadway, New York, and we give the poem below, in the form in which he wrote it. Some of the current versions are garbled paraphrases of the original.]

I STOOD at evening by the smithy door,
To hear the anvil ring the vesper chime,
And looking down I saw, upon the floor,
Old hammers worn with beating years of time.

"How many anvils have you had," said I,
"To wear and batter all the hammers so?"
"Just one," he answered, "and the reason why,
The anvil wears the hammers out, you know."

The Anvil of God's Everlasting Word,
For ages skeptic blows have beat upon;
Old Balak sparks were seen, Voltaire noise heard—
The Anvil is unworn, the hammers gone!

Apprentice blows of Ignorance, forsooth,
Make blunder sounds and blinding sparks death-whirled;
The Master holds and turns the iron, his Truth,
Love-shapes it as He wills to bless the world.

NEW IDEA
Helped Wisconsin Couple.

It doesn't pay to stick too closely to old notions of things. New ideas often lead to better health, success and happiness.

A Wis. couple examined an idea new to them and stepped up several rounds on the health ladder. The husband writes:

"Several years ago we suffered from coffee drinking, were sleepless, nervous, sallow, weak and irritable. My wife and I both loved coffee and thought it was a bracer." (Delusion).

"Finally, after years of suffering, we read of Postum and the harmfulness of coffee, and believing that to grow we should give some attention to new ideas, we decided to test Postum.

"When we made it right we liked it and were free of ills caused by coffee. Our friends noticed the change—fresher skin, sturdier nerves, better temper, etc.

"These changes were not sudden, but increased as we continued to drink and enjoy Postum, and we lost the desire for coffee.

"Many of our friends did not like Postum at first, because they did not make it right. But when they made Postum according to directions on pkg., they liked it better than coffee and were benefited by the change."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. Made in the cup with hot water—no boiling. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

Questions and Answers

Reader, Illinois. "I have doubted the Bible and refused to accept Christ as my Saviour, and now I have come to realize that to have Christ is the one important thing in all the world, and I cannot find him. My awful sins stand in the way, and although I pray and pray I cannot seem to find either forgiveness, or the Christ I long for. Is there any way for me to get what I want above all else?

If Christ should speak to you now with a physical voice, we are sure he would say: "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God." Do you remember the old hymn:

All the fitness he requireth
Is to feel your need of him?

That precisely expresses your condition, does it not? You feel your need of him. So he is very near you and all ready to help you the moment you will trust him. But that you must do; you must trust him. You must believe that just now he does forgive your sins, even yours. So far as his forgiveness goes it does not make any difference how many or how bad they have been. "I, even I, am he that blotteth out thy transgressions," he declares. "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." Begin at once to talk to Christ; you believe with your mind, but you must make the surrender of your will. Yield to him. Trust him. Think of all the sinners he has forgiven and saved, from the dying thief on the cross to the last drunkard or criminal who found him in last night's rescue mission meeting. He will forgive; he does forgive you. Begin now to praise him for doing so.

S. M. S., Mannsville, N. Y. The MSS. of the Pentateuch form a single roll or volume. They are not divided into books but into two sections, the larger called Parshiyoth, the smaller, Sedarim. The modern Jews call the whole by the name Torah (the law) or Torath Mosheh (the Law of Moses). The present form with the five divisions is believed to have been the work of Greek writers, who translated it from the original Hebrew, and even the titles are not Hebrew but of Greek origin. The "Book of the Law," which was lost and afterward discovered in the temple in Josiah's reign, was substantially the same volume. Popular belief among the Jews assigned to Ezra and his learned associates in "the great synagogue" the important task of collecting the greater part of the Jewish Scriptures, and that work, when completed, was the foundation of the present canon. Corroboration of this is found in one of the oldest Talmudic books, the Pirke Both, and in the Babylonian Gemara. For the story of the Old Testament through its many translations down to our own times, read the Handbook of the Bible, Whittaker, New York.

I. H. K., Alturas, Calif. 1 and 2. Answered by mail. 3. The passage in I Cor. 1: 28 must be read in connection with the preceding verses. It is not always the learned, the rich, the influential who are sought out as instruments for the divine purpose. The "foolish things" of the world which are chosen to confound the wise, implies that God can effect his purposes through his own instruments and save men without the aid of worldly wisdom. The expression in Romans 4: 17 (last clause), is another form of intimating that God is not the God of the dead but of the living, and that to give new life to those who have passed out of human life, and existence to the non-existent, is the prerogative of Him in whom Abraham's faith reposed. For Abraham, even when he was called to a test of his faith, which dealt with God's power to transcend nature and create what did not then exist, in spite of these obstacles, still believed.

J. N. N., Willa, Pa. The pillar which is mentioned in the story concerning the fate of Lot's wife, in Gen. 19, is mentioned by a number of writers. Josephus (in Antiquities II, 4) wrote that it still remained in his day, and he had seen it—i. e., the peculiar formation of crumbling, crystalline rock associated by tradition with the event. Clemens Romanus, Irenæus and Benjamin of Tudela also note of the strange formation as visible in their day, but later writers stated that it had ceased to exist. It is related that, by a singular coincidence, Lieutenant Lynch, who led an American exploring party around the Dead Sea, found on the southwestern shore, at a place called by the Arabs Usdum, a pillar one forty feet high, composed of salt crystals, capped with carbonate of lime, which he assumed to have been detached by the action of the winter rains upon the rock-salt hills. Professor Palmer claims in one of his books to have seen this same formation, which the Arabs, in their usual manner, had connected with the Bible story, although it is not at all certain that the locality is identical with that indicated in Genesis. Several commentators hold that the geological character of the rocks and the prevalence of salt crystals justify the conclusion that the Bible passage might be interpreted to mean "like a pillar of salt," and that the body of Lot's wife "had become fixed for a time to the soil by saline or bituminous incrustations."

Mr. Wilbur A. Christy, of Warren, Ohio, a reader of this journal, commenting on a recent Mail-Bag paragraph touching the baptism of John the Baptist, supplies this enlightening view of the question: "John was a priest by ancestry; but before taking up officially the duties of the priesthood, the law required that he should comply with its requirements by being formally inducted into the priestly office according to the prescribed manner. Now, as we find John actually engaged in exercising the priestly functions of teaching the people the way of righteousness in preparation for the advent of the Messiah, it is at least fair to assume that he did not do this without first being regularly set apart to that office as the law directed. What then were the provisions of the law in regard to this matter? Turn, if you please, to the Book of the Law itself, and read them. The first requirement is that of lineage—the candidate must be 'of the house of Aaron.' The second is that of proper age—he must be 'thirty years old.' Then, after preliminary washing, clad in clean raiment, he must present himself to the officiating priest, and by him be baptized. Now this, be it remembered, was enjoined by a law which was in full force at the time of John, obligatory upon, and doubtless observed by every Jewish priest, and recognized as binding upon themselves by both John and Jesus. There seems to be no room to doubt that this was the baptism, and the only baptism, ever received by John personally, as by all the other thousands of Jewish priests, and that it was this same baptism which was, a few months later, administered in turn by John to Jesus himself, inducting him thus into the high priesthood 'after the order of Melchizedek,' thus, as Jesus insisted, 'fulfilling all righteousness,' for without this formal ceremony there would have been a missing link in the title of our great High Priest."

C. M. H., Altadena, Calif. 1. State Superintendent W. H. Anderson of the Anti-Saloon League, to whom your inquiry was referred and who has made a close study of anti-liquor legislation, replies: (1) The Webb-Kenyon Law has been held constitutional by some of the lower Federal courts, but has not been passed upon by the Supreme Court. (2) The States in which there will be a vote on Prohibition this fall are Virginia, Colorado, California, Oregon and Washington. Recently events have precipitated a vote in Ohio, and the liquor men of Oklahoma have given notice that they will try for resubmission.

A. M., Philadelphia. There are many ways in which we may carry our religion into our daily duties—live it, so to speak. We see nothing to condemn in the description you give. The religion of Jesus Christ should make a man honest and truthful in his business. It should make him decorous in his general demeanor. It should free him from his besetting sin and from petty vices as well. It should cure him of vanity and foolish pride, if these are among his weaknesses. And if with one sex, why not with the other? As for the successive stages, the speaker in question doubtless built them up as a logical setting for her argument.

G. R. C., Hollidaysburg, Pa. Doubtless Joseph, during his long sojourn in Egypt, often thought of his father and his kinsmen at home. There is no passage in the Bible narrative which shows this, but it is a reasonable inference. That all through his Egyptian experience he must have had some premonition of a coming reunion with his people, may be gathered from the two dreams of his boyhood (see Gen. 37: 5-11) which indicated the future development of his wonderful career.

M. A., Germantown, Pa. The "publicans" were tax-gatherers. In New Testament times, the Roman Senate farmed out the direct taxes and the customs in Palestine to capitalists who undertook to pay a stipulated sum into the treasury, and who were called publicani. They banded together closely and put the law rigidly into execution in the gathering of the taxes. Their agents were often accused of fraud and extortion, and the people complained against them unavailingly. As a class they were cordially hated and denounced as oppressors. Some of them were among the earliest converts of the Christian faith.

Reader, Bay City, Mich. The Pharisees, so frequently mentioned in the Gospels, were a religious sect or party among the Jews, the name being derived from the Hebrew word Perushin (separated). They believed in the resurrection of the body, in a future life, in rewards and punishments, and in the existence of angels and spirits. It was their self-righteousness, their reliance upon forms and ceremonies, and their slavish adherence to the letter of the law, neglecting its spirit; their ostentatious piety, their contempt for those whom they regarded as beneath them and their utter lack of compassion for the poor and unfortunate, that made them fit subjects for the divine rebuke to an extent that has made the appellation "Pharisee" one of world-wide reproach.

Mrs. A. J. B., Menahga, Minn. The passage in Dan. 12: 10 concerning the "wicked" and the "wise," is interpreted as meaning that when the predictions mentioned by the prophet shall have come to pass, the righteous, being purified and strengthened by their severe trials, will understand the signs of the times and know that the end is near, while the wicked, blind to all the divine warnings, shall continue in their sin to the close. "The fulfilment of the divine decree," says one commentator, "is not a mere arithmetical problem which the unspiritual can reckon out, but a sacred study in the progress of the divine purpose, the significance of which the spiritually enlightened alone can grasp." The passage in Mark 13: 32 has this peculiarity, that the reference to "the Son" is exclusive here, being found nowhere else in the same connection.

H. F. W. U., Wilson Creek, Wash. One of the hymns to which you refer was recently quoted in the Mail-Bag. The second was written by Isaac Watts, and the opening stanza is as follows:

"Plunged in a gulf of dark despair,
We wretched sinners lay,
Without one cheering beam of hope,
Or spark of glimmering day."

M. M. M., Cressona, Pa. The well-known hymn, "In the Cross of Christ I Glory," was written by Sir John Bowring, an Englishman (1792-1872), who was famous both in statesmanship and literature and of whom it was related that he could converse in twenty-two languages. Originally a Unitarian, he has given in these noble verses a hymn suitable for the whole Christian Church throughout the world. Another fine hymn, by the same author, is "Watchman, Tell Us of the Night."

Southern Subscriber. We have no means of knowing to what orders or organizations they belong.

S. A. B., Ware, Mass. The "secret place" (see Ps. 91: 1) is interpreted as meaning "the covert" of his tabernacle—"the beatitude of the inner circle, or secret shrine, to which that select company of the faithful have access, and where they may taste the hidden wisdom." One commentator writes that this passage applies "to those who are more at home with God than other Christians, and who are also more alone with God. In this inner circle, the childlike spirit is made one with the will and the love of the almighty Father. It is a security and a refuge against whatsoever may await us in this world or elsewhere, and those who belong to it bear on their countenances the seal that they are free from fear of evil and that they have gained the victory over terror and dismay." In brief, it is only those who live closely to God who find those divine attributes which to others are majestic and overpowering, transformed into a sure shelter and a joy that lifts all care forever from the soul.

F. A. R., Gaylord, Mich. The persecutions of Paul began almost immediately after his conversion (A.D. 30) and continued at intervals until his martyrdom in A.D. 67-68. His own summary of his sufferings is probably the best epitome. It is found in II Cor. 11: 23-33.

C. C. J., Blackstone, Va. There is no passage of the kind in Scripture.

HAYNES

America's First Car

Since Elwood Haynes built America's First Car, twenty-two years ago, the public has looked to him to set the standard in motor car values.

The Haynes latest production is this beautiful, powerful "Light Six," with graceful streamline body, unit power plant, 3-point suspension, 55 brake horsepower en bloc motor, having a flexibility that enables you to throttle down to one mile per hour and sufficiently powerful to make a mile a minute—

—With 121-inch wheelbase, left hand drive, center control; weight, completely equipped, 2950 lbs., giving one horsepower for every 53 lbs.; Leece-Neville starting and lighting separate unit system, the economical Rayfield carburetor—

—With exclusive arch frame construction over rear axle. Vacuum gasoline system with gas tank at rear of chassis, force feed and gravity lubrication, centrifugal water pump and fan for cooling, Haynes full floating rear axle, Firestone demountable rims, motor-driven tire pump, Stewart-Warner speedometer, improved One-man top, Collins quick adjusting curtains —These and other exclusive Haynes features make this car truly America's Greatest "Light Six."

Some manufacturers have abandoned the water pump, some the oil pump, and others the full floating axle. In fact, it is very difficult to find a "Light Six" at a popular price that has not been slighted in some way.

You will find this a complete car in every respect. It was designed with the most scrupulous care, with a view of eliminating all complications without sacrificing any of the fundamental features that make for increased power, endurance and general reliability.

In addition we build Model 31, "Big Six," with 65 brake horsepower and 130-inch wheelbase—$2750; Model 32 Haynes "Four," with 48 brake horsepower and 118-inch wheelbase—$1695.

THE new Studebaker cars are now being shown in more than five thousand cities, the world over—

In our judgment these new Studebakers place every other "Six" and every other "Four" on the defensive—

Studebaker cars are manufactured practically complete in Studebaker factories—more nearly so, we believe, than can be said of any other car.

They carry only one profit—that of the legitimate manufacturer.

And it is this one profit idea of manufacturing, together with the vast volume of the Studebaker output, that is responsible for the truly remarkable value you find in Studebaker cars.

Verify these statements for yourself—by careful and immediate inspection of the new Studebaker models.

Proof of Studebaker Value

Eighty companies in the United States sell automobiles.

Only ten of them manufacture the majority of parts in their cars.

Of these we believe Studebaker makes the greatest proportion of parts.

We make all our castings, springs and forgings.

We heat-treat our gears and forged parts.

We make our aprons, hoods, fenders and other stamped parts.

We make the bodies and tops.

Except tires, electrical equipment, Timken bearings, carburetors and a few minor items, we manufacture—in our own factories—all parts of Studebaker cars.

Being complete manufacturers, we are able to build better cars, and to put better value into our cars, at a stated price.

The New SIX

5-Passenger and 7-Passenger

The elements of greater value listed in the specifications printed below result in:

150 pounds reduction in weight, with increased strength;
Even greater gasoline economy;
Increased tire economy;
Increased ease of operation;
More power;
More room and added comfort.

Specifications

Two Body Styles: Five-Passenger and Seven-Passenger Touring.
Wheelbase—121 inches.
Long-Stroke (5-inch), Small-Bore (3½-inch) Motor Six Cylinders, en Bloc.
Smokeless, Non-Leaking Lubrication System.
Larger Valve Openings.
New, Exhaust-Silencing Muffler.
Annular Piston Rings.
Cellular Radiator.
Lighter Reciprocating Parts.
Crowned Fenders.
Lightened Clutch Operation.
150 Pounds Lighter.
15 x 2½ in. Brakes.
34 x 4 in. Goodrich Tires on Q. D. Demountable Rims Safety Tread on Rear.
Roomier Front Compartment; Roomier Rear Compartment.
Continuous Aluminum Footboard.
One-Man Type Top.
Built-in Rain and Clear Vision Ventilating Windshield, Attaching Rigidly to Top.
Scientific Anti-Rumble Gasoline Tank in Cowl.
Magnetic, Non-Leaking Gasoline Gauge, the Only One Approved by Insurance Underwriters.
Full Floating Rear Axle, Shaft Locking into Taper at Hub.
Full Equipment of 13 Timken Roller Bearings.
Uniform Caps on all Four Hubs.
Irreversible Steering.
Removable Instrument Board.
Inter-Locking Ignition and Lighting Switches.
24 Finishing Operations in Painting Bodies Studebaker Blue.

THE WAR IN EUROPE

ALL Europe is under arms. Austria-Hungary is conducting a punitive war against Servia, for the murder of the heir to the Austrian throne. Russia has begun war against Austria on behalf of Servia. Germany has opposed herself to Russia and to France, the ally of Russia. rance is prepared for a defensive and aggressive campaign. Italy, as an ally Austria, awaits developments, prepared for any emergency. England, the owerful ally of Russia and France, is expected at any moment to declare war gainst Germany. The smaller nations of Europe and the Balkan States e prepared for defense. Actual martial law or its equivalent is in effect in ery country: censorships are established, railways are under military con-ol, ports are closed, the stock exchanges in all money centers have sus-ended, food prices are rising and food supplies being accumulated against ie gravest need, tourists by the thousand are marooned in foreign lands, usiness everywhere is on the verge of demoralization, the whole world is in state of suspense awaiting the issue. Socialist organizations, so powerful roughout Germany and Italy, threaten a world-wide cessation of all indus-ial labor, if war goes on. Acts of war have been committed by Austria and ussia and Germany and France. A miracle of statesmanship may yet stay ie conflagration, but at this moment Europe is at war.

The situation which, unless it is speedily ended by the power of righteous-ess working on men's hearts and minds, may mean a period of world-wide ress unparalleled in history, was of long, but at the end amazingly swift, evelopment. June 28, Austria's prince, Archduke Francis Ferdinand, and is wife were struck down in the capital of the Austrian province of Bosnia by Servian. There followed revelations of a widespread anti-Austrian propa-anda among the Serbs within and without that empire. Official denials of omplicity were made by the Servian Government. The royal victims were uried by an amazed and incensed people, and so far as the general public was oncerned the dreadful incident was closed. But the public forgot that that urder was far from being an isolated incident.

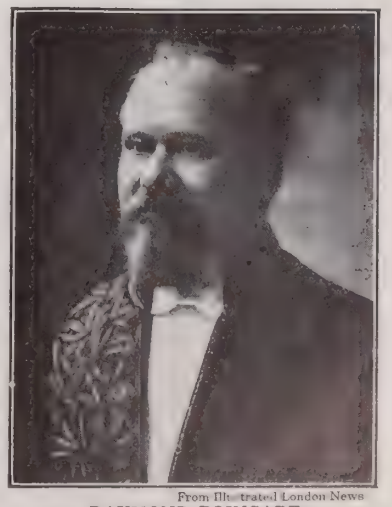
On Wednesday, July 22, among the foreign news items appearing on an side page of the daily papers was one with this headline: "European War pecter Revived." The brief item stated that Berlin was agitated over the ossibility of armed conflict between Austria and Servia that might embroil all Europe. On high diplomatic authority it was asserted that Austria would deliver an ultimatum to Servia at the end of the week, respecting the anti-Austrian movement among the Serbs. The Berlin Stock Exchange had already felt the effect of this news, and of the possibility of Russia's going to Servia's assistance. On July 23, no news on the subject appeared. Friday, July 24, the first pages of the press bristled with headlines of this character: "Austria Ready to Invade Servia." The ultimatum, which had been delivered at Belgrade, Servia's capital, six P.M., July 23, expiring six P.M., July 24, was a demand for the discovery and punishment of all accomplices to the murder of the Archduke, the suppression of all socleties composing the anti-Austrian propaganda, and the official publication of Servia's disavowal of connection therewith. Austria also demanded representation on the Servian Government's inquiry into the murder plot, and the trial of army officers and civilian officials suspected of complicity. The opinion was freely expressed that Servia would refuse compliance with parts of these demands. Significant movements of Austria's army chiefs were reported. The approval of Germany and Italy to the Austrian program was declared to have been announced. Inability of German officers to obtain leave was noted.

VICTOR EMMANUEL III
King of Italy

Papers of Saturday, July 25, reported a determination on the part of the great Powers to prevent a general war. The press of the 26th found more cause to hope than to fear, despite rumors of the mobilization of Russian and Austrian armies and the severance of diplomatic relations between those governments. The German Emperor abandoned his pleasure cruise in the Baltic and hurried to his capital. King Peter, the Servian monarch, with the principal members of the government, left Belgrade for the interior capital, Nish, after the Servian premier had delivered his government's reply to the Austrian minister, the details of which were not then made public.

Monday's news restored the balance between fear and hope. Servia's reply was now known to have been a submission to all Austria's demands excepting that of Austrian participation in Servia's trial of her own subjects, and contained an appeal to the Hague tribunal if Austria found the reply inadequate. London, Paris, and St. Petersburg were reported as making representations to Vienna. Russia, it was said, had advised Austria that invasion of Servia could not be regarded with indifference. Emperor Francis Joseph had personally taken a stand for firm procedure, and at the Austrian capital belief in a general European war prevailed. Great public enthusiasm was reported. A British fleet had been ordered to concentrate at Portland. The war spirit began to manifest itself among Austrians and Servians in this country. No overt act of war on the part of Austria had been committed, and the peace of Europe was still unbroken. Much was hoped for from the influence of England.

Tuesday's news continued to hold out hope that if war broke out the great Powers would be able to localize it between Austria and Servia. An optimistic feeling in European capitals was reported. Diplomats were in constant conference. Austria publicly commented on Servia's answer to her ultimatum, declaring it insincere. The German Emperor advised Sir Edward Grey, the British foreign minister, that Germany could not attempt to dissuade Austria from punitive measures against Servia. Partial mobilization of Russian troops announced. The Paris bourse reflected growing apprehensions on the part of financiers. On that date, Tuesday, July 29, as the next day's press announced, Austria formally declared war against Servia in the following pronouncement: "The royal government of Servia not having replied in a satisfactory manner to the note transmitted to it by the Austro-Hungarian minister in Belgrade on July 23, 1914, the imperial and royal government finds itself compelled to proceed itself to safeguard its rights and interests and to have recourse for this purpose to force of arms. Austria-Hungary considers itself, therefore, from this moment in a state of war with Servia. (Signed) Count Berchtold, Minister Foreign Affairs of Austria-Hungary."



From Illustrated London News
RAYMOND POINCARE
President of France

With Austria actually at war with Servia, the probability of a general conflagration increased, for Russian interference on behalf of Servia seemed inevitable. With Austria attacked by Russia, Germany would be compelled to aid Austria, and Italy, the third Power in the Triple Alliance, would join with Germany. The Powers of the Triple Alliance thus under arms, England and France would be compelled to take the field for Russia, those three countries composing the Triple Entente.

The peace of Europe now depended upon the action of Russia, and it was still hoped that that country might hold off, especially as Austria disclaimed intentions of extending her territory. On the 29th, the Austrian emperor, Francis Joseph, issued a manifesto to his people, declaring that Providence had laid upon him the responsibility of curbing Servia's ambitions. The tone of the news steadily became more warlike. France hastened preparations for war. President Poincaré, returning to Paris, was greeted with wild demonstrations. Russians cheered the Austrian declaration of war. The Czar's armies were in motion toward the frontier. War drums sounded throughout Belgrade. Britain made ready her navy. War risks became the theme in insurance circles. The banking world took steps to withhold gold from general circulation. Withdrawals of gold from the United States by foreign cities was accelerated. The price of wheat advanced. Our stock markets grew feverish. As yet, however, American travelers abroad had not taken alarm. The English Government continued to work for peace. The stock exchange in Liverpool suspended operations. In Paris, business was said to be almost entirely suspended. Austria promptly opened war against Servia on the 29th of July by bombarding Belgrade. The railroad bridge across the Danube that connects that city with Semlin was blown up by the Servians. There was no reply, however, to the Austrian gunfire. The German Emperor called his war chiefs into conference. It was said the Kaiser had despatched a special message to the Russian Czar upon which some hope for peace was still based. July 30 the Austrians took Belgrade. Minor battles occurred in Bosnia near the frontier with some fatalities. All the European capitals admitted the gravity of the situation. Fifteen London stock exchange firms suspended. Bankers in all financial centers considered taking extreme war precautions. Marine insurance rates continued to advance. Governments prepared to establish censorships and other restrictions incidental to a state of war. Officials in every country strove to prevent a European conflict, while the street crowds shouted for war. In Chicago, wheat prices advanced by leaps and bounds, though the business transacted was not phenomenal.

The press of Friday, July 31, stated that the German Emperor had demanded of Russia an unqualified explanation of Russian armies on German and Austrian frontiers, coupled with a warning that unless those movements were abandoned Germany would respond in kind. In Berlin little hope was cherished that Russia would pause. In Warsaw the situation was regarded as most serious, the people were inflamed, freight traffic was suspended, no passengers were allowed to leave any part of Russian Poland for Austria. England had begun defensive measures; Portsmouth and Dover harbors were closed, and coast patrols everywhere strengthened. A fleet of twenty-nine British battleships with many smaller vessels sailed from Portland, destination unknown. In London, it was believed that the peace of Europe now depended upon Russia's reply to Germany's note. The Austrians invaded Servia at different points, but were held in check at the north. The preparation for war on the part of Austria was said to be on a vast scale. Greece was said to be preparing to aid Servia, and activity on the part of Japan was reported. Gold continued to pour out of this country. Unprecedented sales of stock were reported on the New York Stock Exchange. The Bank of England raised its discount rate as a protective measure.

The evening papers, July 31, printed a censored despatch from Vienna by way of London, reading: "Hope of localizing the war has been given up in all quarters." The German Emperor declared martial law in that country, and Berlin expected every moment that a declaration of war would follow. Food prices in German cities commenced to soar. The German liners Imperator at Hamburg and Vaterland at New York were ordered held in port. The New York and London stock exchanges closed, the first time, in the case of the New York exchange, in forty years. Exchanges in other American cities also closed. The same situation prevailed in the markets of the world. Americans abroad began to make frantic bookings for return. Intercourse between German and Austrian and Russian ambassadors established the only remaining basis for continued hope that the war would remain localized. Multitudes of Austrians and Servians in this country flocked to their consulates to offer their services. Men everywhere talked of nothing but the prospects of world-engulfing war.

The tension increased over night. Russia made no reply to Germany demand; instead, the reserves of the nation were called to the colors. Englar and France united in a final effort to preserve peace. German warshi became active in Danish waters, where British vessels also appeared. Ti small European states began measures to maintain their neutrality. Ever where in Europe newspapers were requested to withhold national news of military character. The cities of Germany and of other European countri advanced their plans for provisioning the population in the event of war. Th Warsaw-Vienna Railroad was closed at the frontier; it was stated that th Russians had blown up a bridge across the Vistula. Rumors of a diplomat break between Germany and France prevailed; general communication b tween the states of Europe was practically cut off, both by railway, telegrap and telephone. All countries were prohibiting the export of products. I New York City the cotton market sustained a serious slump after the failu of four prominent stock houses. Congress amended the banking laws to pr vide for an emergency currency issue, if needed.

For a day events moved by leaps and then seemed to fall back into unce tainty. Germany was said to declare war on Russia; her special ambass dor and all her re presentatives in Russi withdrew from th country. Emperor Wi liam signed an order fo the mobilizing of th German army. Franc took the same step. I creased preparations fo defense were reporte from all the small cou tries. England alo held out, but menacin acts by Germany we expected to force a de laration of war by Kin George. Then on th very brink of a gener conflict the news r flected a disposition t mark time. There we movements by Russia artillery across the fro tier into Germany an by German troops int France by way of Be gium, a neutral countr yet actual warfare b tween those countri might still be avoide Austrian advance int Servia had ceased, pen ing developments i Russia. Italy stood o her declaration of ne trality, her war forces i readiness, however, fo whatever might occu England, despite seizu of two of her ships b Germany, still held o against a declaratio that would involve h in a European carnag The condition of tourist abroad became mo acute, and in all bus ness lines, as well he as abroad, preparatio were under way again a time of war. In th churches of the Unite States there was un versal prayer for peac It was even hoped th the neutral governme at Washington might b a factor in bringin about mediation. Th press as a whole, whi admitting that peace wa still possible, held o little hope that a general European war would be avoided. The latest new August 3, was that England was preparing for immediate action again Germany, and reports were already current of actual conflict.

SEAT OF THE TROUBLE: Population (in round figures): Austria—Germans, 11,000,000; Italians, 750,000; Slavs (Bohemians, Croatians, Moravians, Poles, Rumanians, Ruthenians, Servians, Slovaks, Slovenes), 16,000,000. Hungary—Germans, 2,600,000; Magyars, 9,700,000; Slavs, 8,500,000. Rumania, 8,000,000. Bulgaria, 5,000,000. Servia, 3,500,000. Montenegro, 600,000. Albania, 2,250,000. (The last five wholly Slavic.) Events Back of the War

Seven centuries have passed since the Turks possessed themselves of th region below the Danube peopled largely by the Servian branch of the Slav family. By a series of revolts, aided now by Austria, now by Russia, an always settled by Europe, the states of Servia, Montenegro, Albania, Bosni Herzegovina and also Greece and Bulgaria have emerged; and above th Danube, Rumania. Their respective boundaries have changed from time t time as have their conditions of political freedom. The first to shake off th dominion of Turkey were Rumania and Servia; the latter, favored by th circumstances that a vast number of their race had remained outside th Ottoman conquest, within the regions that are now Austria-Hungary. An as of all the population in the Balkan peninsula the vast majority were Serb Servia, selfishly encouraged by Russia, it is believed, has always aspired t create a pan-Slavic state dominated by herself and opposed to Austri Hungary. Such an ambition would supposedly appeal to the Serbs of Austri Its realization would permanently block the extension of the Teutonic rac southward to the Ægean Sea, a deathless anti-Russian ambition, and giv Servia a commanding position on the Adriatic Sea.

Bosnia and Herzegovina were placed under Austrian protection as again Turkey in 1878, and in 1908 were annexed by Austria; an unforgivable blo to the Pan-Servian Union, the society which aims to unite the entire Servia

INTERNATIONAL ENTOMOLOGY

ONE OF THE WAYS IN WHICH UNCLE SAM HELPS THE REST OF THE WORLD

BY L. O. HOWARD

NOWADAYS most good Americans know something about the work of the Department of Agriculture at Washington, and how it is helping the American farmer in possible ways, and how it is protecting the public nerally from adulterated and dangerous food l in many other directions. But they do not know w this same department is teaching and helping rest of the world, not only by its publications, by actual personal contact. Every month in year men from many countries visit Washingn for the sole purpose of studying the methods of rk of this great department and of consulting h its specialists concerning the agricultural blems that confront them at home.

England, with her vast colonial possessions with ir varied climates and crops, has only recently nded an Imperial Bureau of Entomology with avowed intention of trying to duplicate the corsponding organization which exists at Washingn, and, with the aid of scholarships founded by generosity of Mr. Carnegie, is sending specially ected young men to the United States for careful ining under the chief of the Bureau of Entoology of the department at Washington. In 11 Andrew Rutherford, of the University of linburgh, E. H. Strickland, of the Agricultural llege at Wye (Kent), and G. H. Grosvenor, of mbridge, held these scholarships. Grosvenor urned to take up the lectureship in forest enology at Cambridge, but lost his life in the tumn of 1912 by drowning in the attempt to save e life of a comrade. Rutherford on his return s sent to Ceylon to take up work for the colonial vernment, and Strickland to British Columbia.

Other Englishmen have come to us from the colies. In 1911 T. J. Anderson came to the United ates from Nairobi, British East Africa, to study r methods of utilizing parasitic insects against jurious ones, and especially to arrange for the nding from this country to East Africa of paraes of the green fly, an insect which occasionally uses great damage to wheat in this country, but ich is normally controlled by native parasites, d which had made its appearance in Africa without any parasites) soon after the cultivation wheat was begun out there. In 1912 Mr. G. E. dkin came to us from British Guiana to study the me line of work and to learn the way we study the sts of sugar cane and cotton; and the same year r. F. W. Urich, of Trinidad, British West Indies. Still another student of parasites came to us in 09. Nicoläi Kourdumoff, a well-to-do young Rusan graduate of the University of Kieff, attracted the results achieved in America, came over to ake a systematic study of our methods and to arn the classification of the parasitic families. n his return to Kieff, he began the study of the ussian insects of this class and has since published a number of important papers.

HUNTING A DESTRUCTIVE INSECT TO ITS LAIR

A welcome visitor in 1910 was Dr. Arturo Neiva, of the Oswaldo Cruz Institute of Rio de Janeiro, the great sanitary research bureau of Brazil. The institute had previously been in the habit of sending its younger workers to Germany or to France for study, but, attracted by the work done by the United States Department of Agriculture on mosquitoes and other insects which carry disease, Dr. Neiva came here to work with us through the long, hot Washington summer on the various aspects of medical entomology.

More recently Dr. Erich Martini was sent over by the Hamburg Institute of Tropical Hygiene to study with us in the same field, and lately returned to take up the study at Hamburg of the insect carriers of disease sent in from the German colonies in the tropics—from German East Africa and Southwest Africa, from Kamerun, from German New Guinea, Samoa, and the other German Pacific islands.

One of the most important of these foreign visitors, in view of possible results, was Professor Dr. K. Escherich, of Tharandt, Germany, who spent three months in 1911 studying the organization of work against injurious insects at Washington, and in all the field laboratories from Boston to Southern California and through the South. and who, when he returned to Germany, wrote a book which he called Die Angewandte Entomologie in den Vereinigten Staaten ("Applied Entomology in the United States," Paul Parey, Berlin, 1913), in which he points out plainly to his German readers that the United States is far ahead of Germany in this direction (except only in the work against forest insects), and urges the establishment of an official bureau in that country to handle the important question of insect damage in the American way. Inspired by this book, a German Association of Economic Entomologists has already been organized and held its first meeting at Stuttgart last autumn.

Perhaps the most distinguished of the foreigners who have come to Washington to study in this way is Dr. Paul Marchal, of the Ministry of Agriculture of France, a member of the French Academy of Sciences, well known among scientific men for his extraordinary work on certain forms of parasitic life. Dr. Marchal spent three months in America in company with our governmental experts in entomology.

A well-known entomologist, Henry Tryon, of Queensland, Australia, has just been here on a curious mission. The Department of Agriculture has been trying to cultivate in Texas and Arizona certain kinds of Opuntia cacti, which grow down there, in order to adapt them for cattle forage. In the course of this work it was found that the cactus plants were attacked by certain insects. These insects were investigated by the entomologists of the department, and an illustrated bulletin was published. Now, it seems that out in Australia similar cactus plants, originally introduced as ornamental garden plants, have escaped from the gardens, and have spread thickly and riotously over thousands of square miles of good grazing land, rendering it practically useless. So, getting the department bulletin on cactus insects, Tryon came here to study these insects, expecting to introduce them into Australia in the hope that they will kill off the cactus there. In other words, we wish to kill the insects and save the cactus, and they wish the reverse.

A short time ago, Señor A. Maimo Sarasin, of Uruguay, was here not only to study our methods, but also to see, if possible, that American parasites of the woolly root-louse of the apple and of the codling moth are sent down to Uruguay to help the apple-growers.

The first South American to come was Manuel de Rivera, who was here from Chile in 1908. Emelio Costello came from Sao Paulo, Brazil, in 1911, and Roberto Sundberg from Montevideo in 1912, while in 1913 L. Zurcher, of Asuncion, Paraguay, was here. Mr. José C. Zeledon came from San José, Costa Rica, an earlier year. Professor J. Ohmori, of Moriake, Japan, and Professor T. Ito, of the Department of Agriculture, Tokyo, Japan, have been recent visitors, and an early student was Dr. T. F. Dreyer of Cape Town, who came in 1910.

Prior to this main visitation from foreign students, there was a tendency on the part of foreign governments to employ American entomologists to come out to them and take charge of their work against injurious insects; and in this way a number of young Americans secured posts of importance. It was the universal experience of these young Americans on arrival at their foreign posts that the farmers and fruit-growers virtually expected them to exterminate all injurious insects at once, so great had been the popular reputation of American economic entomology. The first disappointment over, they all settled down to hard work, and in all cases have produced results which justified their appointment.

There is in the Department of Agriculture at Washington a mass of information on the injurious insects of this country, which is readily available to all of our own citizens. The writer pointed this out clearly in two articles which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for April 24 and May 1, 1912. All of our principal injurious insects are well known; every phase of their life history has been carefully studied by competent investigators, and more or less perfect remedies have been found; hundreds of bulletins have been written about them by State and government officials, and nearly all of these can be had for the asking. Farmers or fruit-raisers who wish to know anything about any particular injurious insect, whether it attacks vegetable crops, or fruit trees, or shade and ornamental trees, or forage or cereal crops, or live stock, or whether it is annoying in the household, or whether it attacks man himself, can obtain the fullest information available by addressing a postal card to the Bureau of Entomology of the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. In some cases it may be necessary to send specimens of the insects about which information is wanted. In other cases the name or a description of the insect and its work will suffice. There is a large series of handy illustrated circulars published which treat of the principal pests, and these can be sent usually by return mail. There is no reason why any one should suffer from the attacks of an injurious insect without having easy access to the information in the possession of the government.

THE PEACE OF GOD

*A SERMON BY PASTOR H. P. ECKHARDT

"And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Jesus Christ."
Phil. 4: 7

PAUL wrote those words during his Roman imprisonment. It was a time of severe trial, when we should rather have expected him to speak of a troubled mind, of anxiety and fear. But instead, we hear him speaking of peace, and praying that the Philippians, that you and I, may enjoy the same peace that kept his heart and mind in the days of trial.

Who does not desire peace—peace of heart, peace of soul, peace of mind? It is told of Dante that after many wanderings he reached a monastery and stood before the door. Three times they asked him, "What wouldest thou?" and he broke the silence at last with one word, "Peace." But he could not find it there.

Peace—what a gift! What a treasure! It is to be desired and sought after more than gold and silver. Paul, in our text, first describes this peace; and then, secondly, he tells us how it may be obtained. It is called the "peace of God"—of God. It is not the peace which God enjoys in his heaven of heavens. That peace cannot be given to us here below. But it is the peace which Christ, our Saviour, made between God and us sinners. From the day when mankind fell into disobedience and started on its sinful course, there had been no peace between sinning, disobedient, lawbreaking mankind and the righteous God. But Christ came into this world and made peace. He offered an all-sufficient sacrifice for our sins and satisfied all the claims of offended justice. He took away our sins and our guilt and so he made peace. When, therefore, the angels sang for joy over Bethlehem on that Holy Night they expressed the cause of their joy in these words: "Peace on earth; good will to men."

Now, this peace God the Holy Spirit pours into the hearts of all believers, so that the peace is theirs; they know they are at peace with God and there is naught to separate them from their Lord. It is the peace which flows from the consciousness or assurance of his most gracious presence always and everywhere.

And this peace "shall keep your hearts and minds." Such is Paul's emphatic statement. If you have this peace in your soul it shall keep your hearts and minds. We have here the picture of a city surrounded by a strong fortress and filled with troops of armed soldiers to guard and keep it against the attacks of all enemies. Such is the peace of God in the soul of the Christian. Like a strong fortress, like a garrison of angels, it "keeps the heart and mind" that are so easily troubled and disturbed. It fills the heart and mind with firm trust in God, his love and his guidance; and so it guards and keeps heart and mind against all attacks of the evil one and from all disquieting elements. What are the chief disturbing elements of the heart and mind? First, the sense or consciousness of sin and guilt; but knowing that we have peace with God through Christ Jesus, the sense of sin cannot disturb us. Secondly, fear, anxiety, worries; but having peace with God and knowing that he loves me and is always with me, I can leave all things to him, saying, "The Lord is my Shepherd; I shall not want. He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness—the right paths—for his name's sake." Thirdly, there are the constant attacks of the evil one, with his manifold temptations, to plunge us into sin or despair; but if the peace of God fills my heart and mind, that shall most certainly keep my heart and mind. No room there for sin and the love of sin. Temptations strike such a fortified heart and mind in vain.

An artist painted a picture illustrating peace. He threw on his canvas a thundering waterfall like that of Niagara, with a birchtree bending over the foam. At the fork of a branch, almost wet with the cataract's spray, a robin sat on its nest, calm and undisturbed by the raging elements. That is peace—rest. So the soul that rests on Jesus—in Jesus—has peace. And this peace shall keep heart and mind. He goes his way day by day, undisturbed by the raging elements that are constantly surging in upon his heart and mind. It is the peace of God, that "passeth all understanding." It baffles all attempts to explain it.

I have seen a Christian in the depth of poverty, his health gone, earning a few cents by cutting and preparing rags for the shoddy mills. He knew not how the next week would bring him food to eat. Yet how calm and undisturbed he was! If he had had a large bank account to his credit he could not have been more free from worry. I heard him singing as I approached his cottage,

> O Friend of souls, how blest am I,
> Whene'er thy love my spirit calms!
> From sorrow's dungeon forth I fly,
> And hide me in thy sheltering arms.

There is the peace that passeth all understanding and keepeth the heart and mind.

I go to a hospital. I see, as I have often seen, the Christian making ready to undergo a serious surgical operation. He knows that he must go down to the very gates of death. Yet how calm and undisturbed he is! How is that? He whispers, his eyes raised heavenward, "The Lord is my Shepherd; I shall not want. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me." There is the peace that passeth all understanding and keepeth the heart and mind.

Martin Luther is cited to appear before the Diet of Worms and retract his teachings—the truth of God's own Word. There are the potentates of church and state. There are the powerful enemies of the Augustinian monk, thirsting for his blood. And Martin Luther? I see him riding into Worms on that eventful day, calm and unperturbed, saying to his anxious friends, who were warning him not to go, "If there were as many devils in Worms as tiles on the roofs, yet would I go." And trusting in God he went. There he stands before that august assembly—one lone monk. His life is in their hands. He is called upon to retract. One lone monk. But God is on his side. And trusting in him he answers in words that have come ringing down the centuries, "Unless I am convinced by Scripture, I cannot and will not retract anything, for my conscience is bound in God's Word. Here I stand; I cannot do otherwise. God help me! Amen." How calm he is and fearless! They may burn him at the stake as they had burned John Huss and Girolamo Savonarola. There is no fear in him. His heart is undisturbed. For he trusts and rests in God. Behold the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, and keeps the heart and mind!

Paul Gerhardt, the great hymn-writer, was deposed from his pastoral office in Berlin because of his fidelity to the truth. He was willing and ready to endure affliction; but when he saw the grief of his beautiful young wife, his heart was deeply affected. Reduced in circumstances, they set out on foot and journeyed on until they reached a country inn where they sought rest. The courageous preacher tried to comfort his wife with the word of God, saying: "Commit thy way unto the Lord, trust also in him, and he will bring it to pass." The poet went from the side of his weeping wife out into the garden to breathe out his soul to God in secret prayer; and after prayer, he wrote that hymn of heavenly comfort which the churches still sing, and which has brought more peace to burdened hearts than all the wise sayings of the great philosophers:

> Commit thou all thy griefs
> And ways into his hands,
> To his sure truth and tender care,
> Who earth and heaven commands.
> Through waves and clouds and storms
> He gently clears thy way;
> Wait thou his time, so shall this night
> Soon end in joyous day.

Then Gerhardt went back to the side of his wife and read his hymn to her. There was peace. And this peace kept his heart and mind.

Wonderful peace, that, indeed, passeth all understanding. Friend, dost thou not desire this peace, in order that thy heart might be kept amid all fears, cares, troubles, anxieties and temptations, and amid even the terrors of death? Is this pea not indeed a precious gift more to be desired tha gold and much fine gold? How may it be o tained?

"And the peace of God, which passeth all unde standing, shall keep your hearts and minds throu Jesus Christ." It is through Christ that this pea comes to us. It is in Christ that this peace is to found. Men have tried to find peace in wealt Others through great and magnificent possession Still others in their boasted philosophies. But vain. Men have traveled from country to count seeking peace. But in vain. It is to be found alo in Jesus. It comes to us through Christ alone.

And what must you do to obtain this peace whi is found in the Saviour? Only believe; yes, believ Have faith! You must go to Jesus and trust (th is what faith means), trust him for pardon and fo giveness. You must trust him, because he died f you and promised your salvation, full and fre Then you will have peace. You must go to Jes trusting in his constant love; trusting that he love in all his dealings, all his guidance, and all h ways; trusting that he leadeth you in the paths righteousness. So you must always trust and re in him and his love with a childlike confidence.

It is through such faith that there will flow in your heart and mind the peace of God whi passeth all understanding. St. Paul therefore sa in the verse preceding our text, "Be caref (anxious) for nothing; but in everything, by pray and supplication with thanksgiving, let your r quests be made known unto God." Take everythi to him in prayer! And then trust him—have faitl So you will have peace—that peace of which t Saviour said, "Peace I leave with you, my pea I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neith let it be afraid." (John 24:27).

One morning a teacher went, as usual, to t schoolroom, and found many vacant seats. Tv little scholars lay in their homes cold in death, a others were sick unto death. A fatal disease h entered the village. As the few children prese that morning in school gathered around the teache they said, "Oh, what shall we do? Do you thir we shall be sick and die too?"

She gently touched the bell for silence and a swered, "Children, you are all afraid of this terrib disease. You mourn for the death of our dear litt friends, and you fear that you may be taken als I only know of one thing to do, and that is to hide The children were bewildered, and the teacher we on, "I will read to you about this hiding-place." S opened her Bible and read Ps. 91:

"He that dwelleth in the secret place of the mo High shall abide under the shadow of the Almight I will say of the Lord, he is my refuge and m fortress: my God; in him will I trust. Surely shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, a from the noisome pestilence. He shall cover th with his feathers, and under his wings shalt th trust."

All were hushed and composed by the sweet wor of the psalm, and the morning's lessons went as usual. At noon one little girl slipped up to t desk, and said, "Teacher, are you not afraid of t diphtheria?" "No, my child," she answered.

"Well, wouldn't you be if you thought you wou be sick and die?" "No, my dear, I trust not." Lool ing at the teacher for a moment with wonderi eyes her face brightened as she said, "Oh, I know you are hidden under God's wings. What a ni place to hide!"

Yes, to hide and to rest! So if we go to him in a our cares, troubles, anxieties, fears and sins, a just hide in him by trusting in him and resting i him—then we shall have peace; sweet peace all t days of our life.

And when the evening comes and the shades night gather around us, even death has no terror for we have found the safe hiding-place—the res ing-place. We look up to Jesus and say, "Ye though I walk through the valley of the shadow death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me."

Such is the peace of God, which passeth all unde standing. And this peace shall keep your hear and minds through Christ Jesus.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, August 16. Matthew 10: 16. "Behold, I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves: be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves." To his instructions regarding the externals of the ministry of his disciples, our Lord now adds important instructions which are to fit them inwardly for their work. First, they must not expect a friendly reception from the world at large. The attitude of carnal men is enmity to God. They do not feel any pleasure in the ways which God proposes to them, either in his law or Gospel. They resent God's message as an intrusion upon their carnal peace. They read out of it a declaration of war upon all their views, beliefs, habits and preferences. They will turn upon the bearers of the message. Over against these people the disciples seem defenseless, like sheep in the midst of wolves. Nevertheless, the Lord tells them to go, and counsels them to be discreet and circumspect, quick to detect danger and to escape it. But their prudence must be free from double-dealing. In all sincerity and simplicity they are to speak the truth and act honestly. The Shepherd will be with them in the midst of the wolves.

MONDAY, August 17. Luke 12: 1-3. "Beware ye of the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy. For there is nothing covered, that shall not be revealed; neither hid, that shall not be known. Therefore whatsoever ye have spoken in darkness shall be heard in the light; and that which ye have spoken in the ear in closets shall be proclaimed upon the housetops." Not only worldly men who know not God, but also holy people, whose entire life is supposed to be spent in intimate fellowship with God and who claim to be God's representatives among men, will at times prove an obstruction to the work of the disciples in evangelizing the world. The Lord warns them of the leaven, that is, the teaching, of the Pharisees. He had often expressed his opinion of these people. He had discovered the fatal and damning error of their doctrinal system and practice. He knew that the former was wide of the truth and the latter void of love. Their whole life was a sham, and he had, on occasion, denounced them as hypocrites. But as yet the power of these people was very great. The common people had not yet seen through the false pretense of Pharisaism. Its true motives had not been laid bare before them. The disciples would meet with them and be deceived by their ways. Hence the Lord's warning: Beware! Some day the truth about the Pharisees would be published trumpet-tongued over all the cities, towns, and villages of the world. Pharisees may deceive men for a while but not forever.

TUESDAY, August 18. Matthew 10: 17, 18. "But beware of men: for they will deliver you up to the councils, and they will scourge you in their synagogues; and ye shall be brought before governors and kings for my sake, for a testimony against them and the Gentiles." In his instructions to his Gospel messengers, our Lord includes the prospect of martyrdom. Councils of churchmen and great assemblies of statesmen will take notice of their work, however, not to aid them in it or reward them for it, but to check it. They will subject the ministers of Christ to cruel punishment at the flogging post, at which a victim might expire before the thirty-ninth stroke was laid on, or in their jails. "Beware of men!" says our Lord. "This heat of tribulation, when it comes, must not surprise you." The ministers of Christ must suffer for his sake, that is, because they propagate his teaching, which is so hateful to the world. Their suffering shall serve as a testimony against their ungodly persecutors. It shall be cited against them one day, as evidence that God had come to them with his grace to reclaim them from their errors and wickedness, but they had met his entreaties with scorn and violence. The martyrs of Christ will be God's vouchers on the day of reckoning.

WEDNESDAY, August 19. Luke 12: 11, 12, and Matthew 10: 20. "And when they bring you unto the synagogues, and unto magistrates, and powers, take ye no thought how or what thing ye shall answer, or what ye shall say: for the Holy Ghost shall teach you in the same hour what ye ought to say. For it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you." To be haled before a court and to have to undergo a public examination before the secular magistrates like a criminal, is to the child of God an ordeal at the prospect of which the heart sinks. He despairs of his ability to speak acceptably to unholy men about the holiest matters in the world. Yet even this agony is included in a faithful ministry of the servants of Christ. In order that the testimony against the Gentiles may be all the more effectual, God so orders the course of the Gospel of his Son among men that its blessed truths must at times be proclaimed in very august and solemn assemblies of the great, in the halls of kings and nobles, and at the tribunals of justice. The feeble instruments which God employs on such occasions for declaring his gracious will only serve to heighten the astonishment of the ungodly. "How came such wisdom to such simple folk? Who taught these low-bred fellows such eloquence? Who gave these weak and timid people such heroic courage?" We know the answer: it is the Spirit who supports, prompts, directs the confessors of the Gospel at such trials. Think of the apostles at their arraignment before the Jewish Council and the Roman governors. Think of Luther at Worms.

THURSDAY, August 20. Luke 12: 49, 50. "I am come to send fire on the earth; and what will I, if it be already kindled? But I have a baptism to be baptized with; and how am I straitened till it be accomplished!" The Gospel of peace, thrown like a firebrand among the nations!—is not this an awful view which the Lord opens up to his disciples whom he sends to proclaim that Gospel? And is not his open avowal that he would like to see the conflagration started at once still more startling? Conflagration means destruction, devastation, chaos. Yes, this is not a pleasant prospect; still ruin is a blessing when the things ruined do not deserve to exist. This text is not a command to propagate the Gospel with fire and sword, but a bold figure which illustrates the consuming force of light, truth, sincerity, upon darkness, lies, hypocrisy. The fire of the divine Word is a purifying fire: it devours the noxious briar-growth of falsehoods and the dross of impure affections in the lives of men. Out of its ashes rise the temples of Christian men and women, whom divine grace makes abodes of God through the Spirit. Thus might a farmer stand before a wilderness of brush and weeds and say: "Wish all this were burned away that I might begin tilling my fields." The Catholic Duke George of Saxony complained that Luther's teaching was causing an uproar in his country. Luther told him that the uproar came not from his teaching but from the duke's opposition to it.

FRIDAY, August 21. Luke 12: 50. "But I have a baptism to be baptized with; and how am I straitened till it be accomplished!" Not only for his followers, but chiefly for our Lord himself, the immediate future holds in store a most unpleasant task. The greater agony will be his, his disciples' trials will be but a feeble reflex of his own. And he will have no such support in his agony as he promises the disciples. He shall have to tread the wine-press of God's anger alone. As he speaks of the critical times ahead for them, when they shall go out to evangelize the world, there looms up before his eye the vision of Gethsemane and Golgotha. He calls that coming trial a baptism. He will be overwhelmed with inexpressible sorrow and grief. His human heart contracts at the thought of that fearful ordeal; but his divine will rises superior to human fear, and he is firmly determined to enter into this deluge of heart-breaking sorrow and go through it to the terrible climax of the cross. Until all shall be accomplished that is needed for the salvation of the world, his mind cannot be easy. Thus did our Saviour thirst and long for the completion of his great life-work, the redemption of our souls.

SATURDAY, August 22. Luke 12: 51-53. "Suppose ye that I am come to give peace on earth? I tell you, Nay; but rather division: For from henceforth there shall be five in one house divided, three against two, and two against three. The father shall be divided against the son, and the son against the father; the mother against the daughter, and the daughter against the mother; the mother-in-law against her daughter-in-law, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law." The thought of his own suffering had broken into our Lord's train of thought while he was telling the disciples of what was in store for them as his messengers. He quickly dismisses it; for his time is not yet come, and he returns to the panorama of their future, which he had begun to spread out before them. The same Christ who spoke of the one fold and one Shepherd, and prayed that all his followers might be one, as he and the Father are one, foresees the saddest divisions arising in the very homes of men in consequence of the preaching of his Gospel. The line which divides the friends from the enemies of Christ will in many cases run right through a man's family. The love of the truth and grace of Jesus Christ, or the hatred thereof, will prove stronger than ties of blood relationship. Sometimes there will be a majority, sometimes a minority for Christ in the home-circle. True Christians must prize the peace of God in their hearts, which passes all understanding, even greater than their domestic peace. They must love also the unbelieving members of their household and show them every kindness; but they must make them understand that they cannot be their associates in ungodly views and practices.

GOSPEL NEWS FROM VARIOUS POINTS

—"Friends and their Friends" are enjoying all summer's program of social conferences modern questions as touched by the aker conception of religion," meeting at beautiful site of Harriford College, near iladelphia, the Whittier Fellowship Guest use, at Hampton Falls, N. H., Saratoga rings, Winona Lake and other familiar ces.

Rev. Nicholas Zamora, pastor of the angelical Methodist Church of the Philip- es, writes to The Christian Herald that church has now thirty-two pastors, four ndred "predicadores," and ten thousand members—all this since 1909. It is proposed to erect a central church in Manila, at a cost of $50,000.

—Cartersville, Ga., the county seat of Bartow County, is to hold a nine days' campaign in the great "Sam Jones Tabernacle," from September 4 to 13, and the joint committee have secured Rev. Aquilla Webb, of Louisville, Ky., to assist in making the meetings a great success.

—Christian Endeavor has decided to work for the observance of Sunday, October 18, as Good-Citizenship Day. The co-operation of religious and patriotic societies will be encouraged. Leaders in the Epworth League, Baptist Young People's Union, Sunday School and other organizations have warmly endorsed the plan.

—The Bulgin-Rose meetings at San Diego, Calif., began May 3, and continued five weeks. Evangelist E. J. Bulgin was assisted by Professor George L. Rose and wife. Thirty-five churches united, representing eleven denominations, and a tabernacle, seating five thousand people, was erected by volunteer labor. Dr. Bulgin is a converted infidel lawyer. Professor Rose led a choir of six hundred voices. Hundreds accepted Christ as their Saviour. Features of the revival were a Sunday school parade, noon lunches for business men where evangelists, ministers, mayor and others spoke; collections for needy ones, cottage prayer meetings daily—sixty-eight in one day.

—On September 6 Evangelist William A. Sunday will begin a campaign in Denver, Colo Over sixty churches, representing ten denominations, join in the movement, but the total working force will be much smaller than the forces that have supported Mr. Sunday in the cities of the East. Christian people are asked to join with the Christian forces of Denver in prayer for success.

Actual Bloodshed in Ireland

BRITISH troops and Irish Nationalists came into conflict July 27 in the streets of Dublin, when a detachment of the King's Own Scottish Borderers tried to prevent the distribution of rifles which the gun-runners had managed to land from a yacht. The troops had been called upon to assist the police and when surrounded and assaulted by a huge crowd, fired, four persons being killed and a number injured. Intense excitement stirred the city as a result. The use of troops was denounced in the House of Commons, and the local official who called them out was suspended. The city continued in a ferment for days, and the incident caused a postponement of consideration of the Home Rule Amending Bill until a calmer state of mind prevailed. Considerable "gun-running" is reported to have taken place subsequently.

This Peace Secure

THE celebration of the centenary of peace between the United States and Great Britain is proceeding to its culminating ceremonies February next, one of the most interesting events on the program being the formal transfer, through its purchase by popular subscription in Great Britain, of Sulgrave Manor, the English home of the family of George Washington, to the American people. The ceremony took place July 25 in the presence of Ambassador Page and many prominent men and women. The keys of the ancient manor were handed to Mr. Page by the Duke of Teck. It is said that moving pictures taken of the exercises will be first shown to President Wilson in the White House. The Postoffice Department is preparing to issue stamps of two- and five-cent denominations as a contribution to the centenary celebration.

Millions to Move Bumper Crop

SECRETARY of the Treasury McAdoo, in consequence of replies received to an inquiry sent to 5,000 national banks asking if government funds would facilitate the movement of crops and promote business generally, has announced that $34,000,000 will be deposited by the government in banks of the South, Southwest, and Middle West; other sections reported in no special need of government funds as yet. The replies from all sections indicated bumper crops and enlarged business activities. Two per cent. per annum will be charged by the government and additional deposits will be made if required. The crop is already being moved out of the wheat belt with exceptional expedition.

Sixteen-Year-Old Ruler Crowned

IN Teheran, Persia, on July 21, Sultan Ahmed Mirza, sixteen years old (his official majority), was crowned Shah of Persia in the presence of the customary dignitaries and foreign diplomats. He was driven to the palace in a glass coach drawn by eight white horses, through gaily decorated and carefully guarded streets. The press account states that the crown was so large the young Shah was obliged to hold it in position during the brief ceremony, after which he resumed his usual head covering, which was decorated with the Great Mogul diamond, said to weigh more than 200 carats. Persia is a constitutional monarchy.

Preparing for Oil Fuel Steamers

IN the latter part of July, reports appeared of activities by the British Union Oil Company and others looking to the control of the California oil industry. The personnel of the directorate, some of whom are members of various shipping lines, gave support to the belief that shipping interests are looking to oil as the principal fuel in the future. The movement of late to acquire oil fields in this and other countries, both by private and governmental interests, which has been noted from time to time in the press, is significant.

GENERAL HUERTA AND GENERAL BLANQUET ON WAY TO STEAMER DOCK

EVERYTHING now points to an early peace in Mexico by agreement between Provisional President Carbajal and General Carranza, under which the government will be turned over to the Constitutionalists, the protocols arranged by the mediators at Niagara Falls accepted by the latter with consequent recognition of the new government by the United States, Argentina, Brazil and Chile. Early in the week, President Carbajal appointed Cepeda, a Madero senator, as envoy to treat with Carranza. The Constitutionalists were unwilling to promise an unconditional amnesty, but a compromise excepting only persons directly responsible for Madero's overthrow was in sight July 29. All such persons are supposed to have fled from Mexico, however. No fighting of importance has been reported, and General Villa is said to have prepared to move his army to the locality of the Mexican capital. The present government is understood to be seeking a $50,000,000 loan against which to issue legal-tender government bills. Attempts were made to circulate a report of a plot between Huerta and Felix Diaz for a counter revolution in Mexico, but official denials soon quieted anxiety on that score. Brigadier-General Funston reported that the Federal troops in Mexico City had driven off the Zapatistas. The religious question has come up to disturb the new administration.

Compulsory Idol Worship in China

THE New York Post on July 2 reported that according to a letter received at the Seventh Day Adventist headquarters from Elder R. C. Porter, head of the Asiatic division of the church, the village of Chinkiang, China, was recently the scene of a violent attempt to compel converted natives to worship idols. A part of the letter is quoted as follows: "There are about twenty members of the Baptist Church at that place and they ignored the request of the officials to worship idols and their ancestors. As a result of their failure, idols were placed in their yards and tablets were hung on their walls. When the Christians persisted in refusing to worship according to the ancient custom they were roughly handled. All the men who were Christians were taken out, bound with ropes and led through the streets. Some of them fell down and were dragged for a considerable distance and suffered painful injuries. A native pastor and six preachers from a nearby Bible school who attempted to help the natives were similarly treated."

MEXICAN ANTI-CLERICAL MOVEMENT

BY REV. J. S. CHEAVENS

ONE phase of the conflict in Mexico has been little known and less understood in the United States—that is the anti-clerical campaign waged by the Constitutionalists. his is due in part to the fact that the Constitu- nalists are not seeking publicity, and in part to e attitude of the daily press, which fears to offend atholic interests and so minimizes the importance such despatches as would involve the Catholic rty.

At the outset, it will help us to understand the uation if we keep in mind the fact that there is avowed Catholic party in Mexican politics—a rty that came into the open during Madero's ndidacy and opposed him. One of the chief men this party was Francisco de la Barra, the pro- sional president. Francisco I. Madero was an ti-Catholic, but not a Protestant. He was a eosophist and a Mason of high degree. When he ossed the Rio Grande at Eagle Pass, beginning s triumphal progress to the ty of Mexico after the vic- ry at Juarez, he was greeted . Piedras Negras by a clerical ator who began denouncing enito Juarez for having con- cated church property. Ma- ero stopped him, and defended e reforming president. This as the entering wedge.

During Madero's incum- ncy, a strong fight was made gainst Romanism. A Span- h dame, Doña Belen de árraga, went from city to city eaking against Romish dog- as and Romish politics. She as a woman of more than rdinary eloquence, and her ctures attracted wide atten- on and brought upon Ma- ero's government the censure f the church; for it was well nderstood that the lectures ere delivered with the ap- roval of the government and that the lecturer eceived from it financial support. It was cur- ently reported that the president's own mother ent to him and asked him to expel the woman nder Article 33 of the constitution, which pro- ides for the banishment of all undesirable for- gners. It was said at the time that he professed willingness to do so—provided the Jesuits went ith her!

Then Madero received from the hands of a com- ittee of Protestant preachers a Bible, and asked hem to co-operate with him in building up the ation on the morality inculcated by the Book.

What part the church, or rather the Mexican lergy, had in the plot to overthrow Madero will, erhaps, never be fully known. In July, 1913, I as at Spofford, Texas, waiting for a train. A arty of Mexican revolutionists who had been to Ionclova to consult with Carranza were waiting t the same place, among them Felix Sommerfeld, ho had been Madero's chief of secret service, and uan Sanchez Azcona, Madero's private secretary. asked these two men the direct question: "What art had the clergy in Madero's downfall?" The wo men answered in the same breath, their fingers ointed at me in impulsive Latin fashion: "Una arte muy grande." Then followed details, names nd statistics. Archbishop Mora, so it was alleged, ad given Huerta 7,000,000 pesos to prosecute the ar. Bishop Montes de Oca of San Luis had helped, s well as others whose names I do not now recall.

To those of us who knew the situation it soon ecame evident that the revolutionary movement ow closing was something more than an uprising gainst the dictator Huerta—something more than n agrarian campaign against landlordism. That ame afternoon at Spofford they told me of a priest t Candela whom they had caught with a smoking ifle in his hands and that the Constitutionalists ad shot him. Then came newspaper stories of Villa's outrages at Torreon and Chihuahua, how he ad shown himself an implacable enemy of the lergy, treating the priests with great cruelty. The mpression left on the reader's mind was that none ut savages, such as Villa was depicted, would do uch things.

But it is becoming increasingly evident that Villa is not alone in his anti-clerical tendencies. It as Obregon who imprisoned the Bishop of Tepic. In no way has Villa slackened his anti-clerical ctivities. In the recent battle at San Pedro, a riest was caught with arms in his hands; it was roved that he had been firing on the Constitu- ionalists. When this was reported to Villa he re- plied: "Alabado sea Dios! Maten al padrecito" (Praised be the Lord; kill the little father). And they killed him. But so far as I have been able to learn no priest has been killed who was not found actually fighting. At Saltillo the British vice-consul went to intercede for the priests who had been arrested. Villa said: "They are in no danger. I am not as bad as I am painted."

Not a printed word can be found about this matter in any revolutionary "plan." I was told by persons in a position to know that there was a quiet agreement among the leaders themselves to strike a heavy blow at clericalism while the revolution was in progress. Some wished to defer it until the revolution was over. But they were answered: "If we wait until afterward, there will be another revolution. The priests will foment it."

Here are some of the results: All foreign priests have been expelled. Many Mexican priests in sympathy with the Huerta government fled southward on the approach of the Constitutionalist armies. The few priests who remain in the captured cities are closely watched and their activities limited. Priestly garb is not allowed to be worn on the streets. In Saltillo I saw a priest whom I had known before, dressed, as a Mexican friend said, "like a human being." He wore an ordinary business suit and his collar was parted in the right place. When he passed the San Francisco Church he lifted his hat as politely as if to a lady, but no throng of children followed the padrecito to kiss his hand. Mass is permitted but once a week, and the church bells ring only by government orders.

THE CONFESSIONALS ON FIRE

In some places Constitutionalist soldiers are quartered in the churches. I saw them in Monterey in an old church on the Calzada Union. In Saltillo the Jesuit College—San Juan—is used as a barracks and its library transferred to the State Normal School. In passing I should say that Huerta's troops occupied the Normal building.

Bishop Echevarria of Saltillo fled southward when Villa's men took the city. The Episcopal carriage with its coat-of-arms was used by Constitutionalist soldiers. The bishop's residence was stripped bare of furniture when I passed it a few days ago, but whether the stuff was carried off by soldiers or friends of the bishop I could not learn, the reports were conflicting.

Confession has been prohibited under severe penalties. The first offense is to be punished by a fine of a thousand pesos, the second by two thousand, the third by expulsion from the country. Perhaps the most radical thing yet done was to burn the confessionals. An order was given to burn the confessionals in the State of Nuevo Leon, and on June 7, 1914, the order was carried into effect. In Monterey the confessionals were collected on Calzada Union, a broad, well paved, much traveled boulevard, and then set on fire. At Villaldama some of the lower classes helped in the burning. Nowhere did the populace protest or offer violence. One who witnessed the burning at Villaldama said that "a very black smoke issued from the burning boxes, because of the many sins that had been confessed there."

I asked a Constitutionalist officer if it was their purpose to pursue the same policy in the South. He smilingly answered: "Una revolucion que no barre, no es revolucion" (A revolution that doesn't sweep clean, is not a revolution.)

Some conservative Protestant leaders among the Mexicans think extreme measures will be followed by a reaction, but most of them expect that a decided turning toward evangelical faith will follow the revolution.

It should be explained that the repressive measures used by the Constitutionalists are merely part of their political program. It does not represent an anti-religious sentiment. The leaders say that the confessional becomes a means of disseminating anti-liberal opinions among the people, and for that reason confession must be abolished.

At Laredo several army officers were discussing the present condition across the border. I told them some of the facts contained in this article. A captain said: "I sympathize with the movement, but I predict that the Constitutionalists will soon get a jolt from Rome."

Will Rome try to deliver the "jolt" through Uncle Sam?

A Decree Against the Church

Despatch in New York Times, July 28, 1914

TAMPICO, July 26 (via Laredo), July 27.—A decree limiting the scope of the Roman Catholic Church in the State of Nuevo Laredo on the ground of "public health, morality and justice" was issued to-day by Antonio I. Villareal, governor and military commander. He said:

"During the life of the nation the church has been a pernicious factor in disruption and discord and has entirely forgotten its spiritual mission."

The most drastic feature of the decree is the prohibition of confession. Villareal gives as his reason for this the charge that the confessional and the sacristy in Mexico have become a menace to morality. The decree issued in Monterey contains the following orders for the government of Catholic schools and churches:

First—All foreign Catholic priests and Jesuits of whatever nationality will be expelled from Nuevo Leon.

Second—Of the remaining Catholic priests, those who cannot prove their complete abstention from politics will be expelled.

Third—Churches will remain open daily from six in the morning until one in the afternoon. Only priests having permission to do so will be permitted to officiate.

Fourth—Confession is prohibited.

Fifth—The public is prohibited from entering the sacristy.

Sixth—Church bells shall ring only to celebrate fiestas in honor of the country, or for triumphs of the Constitutionalist army.

Seventh—All Catholic colleges shall be closed which do not obey the programs and texts ordered by officials, and which do not have at their head some professor who is a graduate of the normal schools of the country, who will be responsible to the government for any infraction of the rules.

Eighth—Any infraction of these laws will be punishable by a fine of $100 to $500 and arrest and imprisonment from two to four months, or both fine and imprisonment.

Explaining the ground for this action, Villareal's decree says:

In the interest of public health, morality, and justice the State of Nuevo Leon will limit the scope of the Catholic Church, which during its life has entirely forgotten its spiritual mission, its sole right to be recognized by modern society. The church has consecrated itself principally to conquest in polities. To secure its object it always has been allied with the reactionary government and the despots, and even with foreign invaders. It has showed itself an implacable enemy to the Liberal movement and progress from the first revolution of Ayutla until the present, and has fulminated its ridiculous excommunications over the most grand and glorious benefactors of the country, Hidalgo, Juarez, and Lerdo de Tejada.

The pretorial and clerical rulings of Porfirio Diaz and Huerta, against which the Mexican people have been struggling heroically for many years, have had the sympathy and assistance of the Mexican church, the church has had its benedictions for the crimes and corruptions of Huerta, and has unsuccessfully worked to incite the public against the Constitutionalist cause.

Some of the ceremonials of the church were criticized, Villareal alleging that in Mexico they had tended toward weakening moral character. He said it was wise to close the clerical schools because it was necessary "to stamp out at the root the arrogant abuses of the Catholic Church and remove the grave danger which the institution represents, more political than religious, for the tranquillity and future progress of the country."

Catholic churches recently have been closed in Saltillo, San Luis Potosi, and Nuevo Laredo.

A PASTOR ON THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

The editor of a religious paper speaks to an unseen, dumb, and ofttimes unresponsive audience, and yet I cannot see why he is not entitled to a recognition of his work as much as any one else. As a result of these meditations, I desire to express my highest approval of the material that comes to me, week after week, in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. H. H. SAVAGE.

Christianity and the War

WE CALL ours a "Christian age." If the spirit of Christ were in the hearts of kings and statesmen, that shameless desire for conquest which does not hesitate to plunge a whole continent in war, could not exist. It is an almost incredible thing that in these days of peace treaties, arbitration boards and Hague tribunals, war should be even named among governments professing Christian civilization.

We must leave it to others to discuss the diplomatic aspect of this European quarrel, which has set the great nations aflame with a mad desire to slay. Beyond and above all other considerations, there stands the solemn fact that these nations all claim to be Christian; their statesmen are regarded as Christians; their standing before the world is that of civilized Christian governments and communities. Yet we find them engaged in a titanic struggle, the end of which no man may foresee. Should it go on, it will mean the sacrifice of innumerable human lives and incalculable economic waste that will make existence a hard and sorrowful problem for multitudes for years to come. True, the map of Europe may be changed, and the long-cherished ambitions of certain "great Powers" may be realized; but the glory of such a triumph will be won at the cost of a great tragedy of human suffering, the memory of which will continually rise in accusation against them.

One of the popular delusions which has been dispelled by recent events is that which declared vast armies and giant navies the best guarantors of international peace. Militarism is not protective but provocative. "All the loudly proclaimed pretensions of professional militarists," says the New York World, "that huge armaments and incessant preparation for war are the best assurances that can be had of the preservation of peace are disproved. There never was a time when Europe was more fully armed, and there never was a more needless and wicked war than that into which Europe has suddenly plunged."

While our own position as a nation is that of a neutral, as a Christian country and a government professing civilization, we should at least protest, if not officially, then through the Christian churches of America, against this needless slaughter. It has been laid down as a general principle that no dispute can arise between governments which is incapable of being adjusted by arbitration. International law and established tribunals provide for such emergencies. It is a tremendous indictment against Christianity that a whole continent should be embroiled as Europe finds itself to-day, without a serious effort at pacific adjustment. The Czar of Russia is accredited as the father of the Hague Peace Tribunal. Emperor William, during his entire reign, has been a consistent advocate of peace and has done more than any other ruler now living to maintain, through fine diplomacy, the tranquillity of Europe. Yet in the struggle between Slav and Teuton, Christianity has not availed, though, had its principles been applied practically, the whole situation would now have been very different.

Let us hope and pray that the struggle may be shortened and that He who sits in heaven will overrule events and bring peace and order, even at this late hour, out of the European turmoil.

The Gift of Prophecy

IS THERE such a thing as the gift of prophecy? Religious and irreligious people alike have from time immemorial been interested in this question. The idea of finding out what is to happen at some future time, the idea of a finite mind getting into definite touch with an infinite mind and receiving messages from it, these have been alluring hopes, and whoever has claimed to realize them has been listened to with interest, if not always with faith.

Is there such a thing as modern prophecy, and has the church any interest in it? Prophecy throughout the Bible means the act of announcing messages from God, whether the messages relate to the future or the present. In the Old Testament the feature of foretelling was very prominent, while in the New Testament the emphasis is upon getting into communication with God and receiving from him any message for the hearer.

What Paul meant by prophesying was not foretelling, but speaking under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. In this sense all may prophesy. He exhorts the church to covet this gift of prophecy (1 Cor. 14: 1), and in the twenty-fourth verse of this same chapter implies that all may possess it.

The true minister has the strangest experiences while preparing to preach; he feels that a special message is coming to him from the Almighty, and almost feels that even to save his life he could not deliver any other message. This is prophecy. Many a prayer-meeting testimony or revival exhortation has the same ring of divine authority. Those who listen know that God is speaking to their souls.

Nothing is so necessary in these days of crisis, crisis in international affairs, crisis in social, political, ecclesiastical, industrial readjustments, crisis in changing moral ideals, crisis in the conflict of truth with error, of doubt with faith, as that God's people go to their knees in prayer for a re-bestowal of this old gift of prophecy. Not to forecast the future, but to learn how to teach, to warn, to exhort, to persuade; to announce with glowing fervor the good will of God; to testify, with glowing lips, the gladness his grace has brought.

For the gigantic tasks awaiting the church and the nations God is needed. And for the carrying out of his purposes in the church and among the nations God needs—not great fortunes, not great armies, not great and book-stocked intellects, but little groups of brave and humble men and women, boys and girls, who have learned to say: "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth."

The Dramatic Sense in Crime

IN ONE of his books Mark Twain tells of the lawless condition of some of the Western States half a century ago, and the dangers encountered by travelers from bandits along the "Divide." Those perils have been regarded as belonging to a past generation, and one cannot help being startled on reading, a few days ago, of a bold and successful wholesale hold-up in the people's great national park, the Yellowstone. It was a hold-up of mammoth proportions that would have made old-timers of the "Black Bart" type of highwayman open their eyes in amazement. Fifty-five stage coaches, carrying one hundred and forty-five joyous excursionists, were halted by a summons from the dense woods, and at the pistol's point the surprised travelers were compelled to drop their money in a flour sack which one of a pair of bold freebooters had rigged up by the roadside. It was just like putting in contributions at a church collection, only there were the menacing guns and the frequently repeated admonition that "cash only" was wanted. So wholly theatrical was the entire affair and so perfect the stage management that, when the last coach had driven away, and the pair of bandits had taken to the woods with their loaded sack containing $4,000 in cash, the victims might easily have fancied that they had been participating in an open-air moving picture rehearsal—had it not been for their empty wallets and handbags, which truthfully told the inglorious story. Yellowstone Park is a vast natural area of mountain, rock, valley and woodland, and it would require a good sized army of scouts and soldiers to patrol every section of it. Perhaps the practical thing to do would be to supply a strong guard for the protection of tourist parties. Whatever the means to be taken, they ought to be sufficient to safeguard the lives and property of tourists and to make a repetition of anything like the recent outrage an impossibility.

Comments by the Way

IN HIS NOTABLE WORK, just issued, on The Influence of the Bible on Civilization, Professor von Dobschutz of the University of Halle, a distinguished authority, reaches these conclusions: It is not a scientific text-book, but a source of historical information. "It is the book for Christian devotion. This was its original intention, and I venture to think that it is not a loss, but a gain, if the Bible is once more applied to its proper purpose."

IN THE Philippine Christian the statement appears that a number of Catholics, priests and laymen, have protested formally against the burning of Gospels at Vigan a few months ago, the story of which event was published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It was denied at the outset by several Catholic journals, but now the facts being admitted by Philippine Catholics it is apparently the plan to find a scapegoat and lay the blame upon his shoulders. It appears that the burning of the Gospels took place at the instance of one of the Catholic bishops. It is hardly to be expected that the Church of Rome, which has countenanced Bible-burning in other parts of the globe in recent years, will ever call the responsible cleric to account. It has always opposed giving the Bible to the common people in lands where it has the power to carry out its policy of cultivating superstition and ignorance.

SOME TWO HUNDRED pastors from New York and vicinity were reported on August 3 to be marooned in Europe by the war conditions. Among them were Bishop Luther B. Wilson, Bishop Charles H. Burch, Dr. E. S. Tipple, Dr. Walter Lindlaw, Dr. James R. Joy, associate editor of the Christian Advocate, Dr. Charles K. Gilbert, editor of the Churchman; Dr. Thomas Nicholson, Rev. Frederick Lynch, secretary of the New York Peace Society and editor of Christian Work; Dr. Charles P. McFarland, secretary of the Federal Council of Churches; Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady, the author; Dr. William Wilkinson "Bishop of Wall Street"; Dr. Leighton Parks, Dr. DeLancey Townsend, Dr. Milo H. Gates, Professor William Adams Brown, Professor William W. Rockwell, Dr. Wilton Merle-Smith, Dr. Anson P. Atterbury, Dr. Henry A. Stimson, Dr. Cornelius Woelfkin, and Dr. J. Edgar Tilton. It was stated that the American Government was making banking arrangements whereby American citizens who found themselves unable to make use of present currency in Europe will be relieved of their distress, and as rapidly as possible transportation facilities will be found on American lines, now that the shipping of all the European countries is suspended. It will be a comfort to these exiled pastors to know that the affection and prayers of their people at home are with them in battle-torn Europe and to know that the faith of the American church is staunch that their lives will be protected in the midst of the perils of war and of the sea.

WHEN WE READ IN THE NEWSPAPERS that men dispossessed of fortunes running far up in the millions, we are apt to draw a contrast between the possessors of so much wealth and the multitudes who find it hard to make a bare living. We conclude somewhat hastily that the age is degenerate when such fortunes can be amassed by the few, and it is sometimes even broadly asserted that the rich to-day eclipse in their opulence the same class of any previous age in the world's history. Nothing could be further from the fact. It is true we have a number of men who are fabulously wealthy, and women who spend extravagant sums on personal adornment; but, with only a few notable exceptions, our present-day Croesuses of either sex are far behind the ancients. Aristotle left a fortune of $50,000,000. A single festival given by Ptolemy Philadelphus cost $2,400,000, which was but a trifle when we learn that he possessed $350,000,000 in gold. Lentulus, an augur, had a modest bank account of $17,000,000, and Seneca had a few millions more. Paulus, it is said, received as a bribe $2,000,000. Lolia Paulina's wardrobe was valued at $1,664,480, and she wore, at a supper, $1,562,000 worth of jewels; but this opulent lady had $200,000,000 in her own right. Nero built a villa which cost $15,000,000. Nicias, an artist, refused $7,500 for one of his pictures, and made a gift of it to his country. Aristides, the sculptor, for a single figure received $125,000 and $20,000 for a smaller one. We read on apparently good authority of individual fortunes of from $70,000,000 to $500,000,000, and of incomes of $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 a year, of dazzling gifts to favorites and of almost incredible extravagance, but of gifts to religion very few, while the columns of charity and philanthropy were wholly neglected. On the whole, therefore, we may conclude that the owners of great wealth to-day, however we may criticize their methods of accumulation, are making a better use of their money than the ancients did.

Scientific Farming in Africa

DIETLOF POTGIETER, a recent graduate of the University of Wisconsin, College of Agriculture, has just returned to his native land of South Africa to carry into effect new methods of scientific farming on the great plot of 120,000 acres which he and his brother own. His father was the Boer burgomaster of Pretoria before the Transvaal War. He was a large land owner and decided to send one of his sons to America to study. Now the son has carried out his wishes and returns to introduce new methods and machinery into the development of the property. "Our land is mostly a ranch," Dietlof Potgieter said: "there has been very little scientific farming done in South Africa, and there is a great deal of room for it. As matters stand, we are not growing all the food we eat. We are importing eggs and meat from Australia and a good deal of butter. The first thing I am going to undertake is raising chickens. We have a fine, healthful country, and there is no reason why chickens should not be a prosperous investment. Anyhow, I am going to put about $4,000 into a plant, and raise chickens and produce eggs on the American plan. At Wisconsin I specialized in the economic or business side of farming. We have imported a good deal of American farming machinery. I expect to order two steam plows. The climate of our part of South Africa is similar to that of California. There must be a lot of things grown in California that we can grow, but there may be great differences in soil. But we have good local markets for everything in the way of produce, and farming if done skilfully is bound to pay in South Africa." The Dark Continent is steadily being uncovered and enlightened. Its yellow gold and brilliant diamonds have attracted the eyes of the world, and its untold agricultural possibilities have just begun to be manifested. This excellent specimen of a splendid race, as bright in mind and devout in religion as it is hardy in body, will with his experiment doubtless produce wonderful developments and become a bright light in illuminating the rural life of South Africa. The greatest wealth of a nation is its farms. The crops of the season usually mark the figures of the commercial exchanges of the world. It is to be hoped that success in his farming experiment will fulfil the words of the wise man:

He that tilleth his land shall have plenty of bread. (Prov. 28: 19.)

$10,000 for Lost Son

EMIL HAVAS, manager of the Budapest Bank, Budapest, Hungary, has written a letter to the authorities in New York begging them to institute a search for his lost son, and offering a reward of $10,000 for his return. The young man of twenty-seven years has been law clerk of the bank. He is a man of fine education and is described by his father as "very tender and affectionate." He disappeared from his home in Nice in March, 1913, and has not been heard from since. The father expressed the hope that the young man might be found in some Hungarian quarter in America. The ideal father the world around is one who loves his son better than his life, and who counts ease, fortune, fame, friends as nothing if the child of his heart be lost. What a beautiful spirit! A copy and expression of the heart of the Infinite Father. It is to be hoped that the search of this father for his boy will be successful, that his dear one will be returned to him in physical, mental and moral soundness, and that the joy of the father in Christ's story may be experienced by him in saying:

For this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost and is found. (Luke 15: 24.)

New York's Splendid Policemen

AN interesting test was made recently of the kindness of heart of the police of New York, as well as of their ability to direct the needy to sources of charity. Stuart Rice, an investigator for the Department of Charities, with the consent of the police commissioner played the part of the "down-and-outer." He approached fifty policemen in different parts of the city, and forty-seven of these took a sympathetic interest in his case. Forty-four directed him to the Municipal Lodging House. The good-natured policemen overwhelmed him with kindness. Several of them actually obtained employment for him. One bought him a lunch, sharing his last 25 cents to do it. Another took him to the kitchen of a prominent café and got him a sumptuous dinner. Few sent him on his way without an offer of carfare or a dime for coffee and rolls. All the men he approached seemed to recognize him as an honest man and to be anxious to help put him on his feet. Some of the policemen of New York have been proven to be very bad men, usually led astray by corrupt political leaders; but the rank and file of the police of New York and of most cities are men of fine physique, good mental ability, splendid moral character and devotion to the public good. And we are glad to believe that the policemen receiving medals and those helping a down-and-out man, represent the average policeman, and that those behind the bars and within the death cell are the exceptions to the rule. The forty-seven policemen were the Good Samaritan of whom Christ said:

And went to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him. (Luke 10: 34.)

A CYCLONE VISITS HENDERSON, KY.

A DISASTROUS cyclone lately visited the beautiful city of Henderson, Ky., laying waste much of its territory. During the progress of the storm, a large tree was uprooted and thrown over on a frame building, demolishing it. Henderson has been famed as having been the home of a number of distinguished men. Before the Civil War several statesmen of national standing came from there, and through the years it has had an excellent representation of able men. It was the home of Audubon, the naturalist, during the period of his greatest activity in searching the woods and fields for his feathered specimens. God's truth is revealed in severity as well as mildness in the realm of visible nature, in the angry cloud as well as in the sunshine, in the terrible tornado as well as the gentle zephyr. His providences are not always easy to interpret. The severe side of divine truth is seen in revelation, in the threatenings against moral evil, as well as in mercy and love toward the obedient. The protection of the human soul against the spiritual storms is the Rock of Ages, answering this description of the divine shelter: "And there shall be a tabernacle for a shadow in the daytime from the heat, and for a place of refuge, and for a covert from storm and from rain." (Isa. 4: 6.)

A New Diving Invention

A NEW diving suit has recently been invented, which will enable man to explore far lower depths of sea than he has ever reached. Because of the intense pressure of water, the diver incased in a rubber suit has never gone deeper than 154 feet. The new suit, made of particles of steel, will protect the diver to a depth of 300 feet. Its first use will be in examining the wreck of the Empress of Ireland, which lies about 200 feet below the surface, in the St. Lawrence River. There is no direction of benevolent endeavor in which science is not busying itself with new inventions for the protection of life and of property. The governments of the civilized world are compelling safety devices for travel on the ocean and land and for the various industrial enterprises. This new invention for recovering heretofore abandoned property will be welcomed. There are spiritual treasures to be reclaimed. There is One who can go down through all depths and bring up all lost spiritual treasures:

The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost. (Luke 19: 10.)

Record-Breaking Freight Train

THE other day at Binghamton, N. Y., the world's record for a train-load was broken by the new Erie centipede locomotive, which weighs 410 tons and has twenty-four driving wheels. It hauled a train of coal cars fully loaded. The officials in charge kept adding car after car, until 250 were coupled to the train. This total weight of 21,000 tons was drawn by the giant engine a distance of forty miles, at a rate of fifteen miles an hour. It was easily 10,000 tons heavier than any train that has ever heretofore been pulled anywhere in the world by a locomotive. The tremendous, subtle forces of nature, their mastery by man in concentration and beneficent use, are all the product of that infinite energy which is the Almighty our Father and Saviour, of whom it is said:

All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. (Matt. 28: 18.)

Wife No Hired Servant

A MAN in New Jersey recently tried to give his wife the sum of $4,500 by mortgage on his property, basing it on his wife's bill of $6 a week for sixteen years for the performance of household duties for her husband. The court dismissed the claim in these words: "When a husband pays a wife for performing household duties he is putting her on the plane of a servant. This is degrading to a wife. It is her duty under the law to care for her husband's home and for her family." This singular case in court was revealed when a suit was brought against the man by a bank in Hoboken for the foreclosure of a mortgage of $8,000, against which the husband had set up this defense. The bank charged that it was a wrongful attempt to put his property into his wife's name, out of the reach of creditors, and the court held that her claim was not valid. His decision is in the interest of a dignified and normal wifehood as well as of business integrity. It was proven in the trial that the wife had loaned the husband $1,000, which amount she will get. The bank and other creditors will then get out of the estate what is coming to them. Slipping the money of others into the name of the wife to defraud creditors is a device not uncommon, and it is well for the law to be vigilant and stop this wrongdoing. The rebuke of the man by the judge for attempting to treat his wife as a hired servant, paying her so much a week for wages, was just, for his conduct is far from the divine ideal of marriage, which says:

Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself for it. (Eph. 5: 25.)

Ends Dishonest Lawyers' Practices

THE Workmen's Compensation Commission of New York State the other day passed a resolution designed to abolish, as far as possible, the ambulance-chasing lawyers who have been making big profits in handling damage suits. The commission, in investigating one group of fifty-one cases, found that in only fourteen was the fee less than 25 per cent. of the amount recovered. In thirty-seven cases the fee was more than 25 per cent., including fourteen cases where the lawyer received over 50 per cent. as his toll. It is wise to thus protect the working people against the imposition and robbery that have been too long practiced. One of the severest arraignments of the Scribes and Pharisees by Christ was their financial oppression of those who were helpless:

Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye devour widows' houses, and for a pretense make long prayer: therefore ye shall receive the greater damnation. (Matt. 23: 14.)

OUR MAIL-BAG

A CALL FOR HYMN-BOOK REVISION

PASTORS, EVANGELISTS, COMPOSERS, HYMN WRITERS AND CHOIR LEADERS UNITE IN THEIR DEMAND

THIS week we devote the Mail-Bag page to a free discussion of the absorbing topic of the urgent need of hymn-book revision. At frequent intervals during recent years it has been brought to the surface by some outspoken preacher or evangelist, the latest occasion being the recent church convention in Chicago, when a leading Methodist minister, the Rev. John Thompson, in the course of an address said:

"We are singing a good many hymns which are nothing more than doggerel. They would be just as good sung backward. Many of them are full of theological untruths. If a preacher preached the heresies sung in many of these hymns he would be rushed to trial and theologically decapitated. It is time to drop empty sentimentality and return to the Gospel in our music."

It will be remembered that some time ago, President (then Governor) Woodrow Wilson, at a church celebration in New Jersey, spoke of a hymn which had just been sung as being meaningless and nonsensical. His opinion has been echoed many times by those who are interested in church and Sunday school hymnology.

With the purpose of ascertaining how the subject of hymn revision is regarded by lovers of sacred music throughout the country, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD recently wrote to a number of leading evangelists, choir-leaders, composers and hymn-writers, preachers, Sunday school superintendents, inviting a free expression of their views in the question. We give to-day a number of the replies, and others will follow in future issues. We make no comment at this stage of the inquiry, preferring that the contributors—all of whom speak with a degree of authority born of experience—should express their attitude frankly and fully, until the whole case is ready to be submitted to the tribunal of public opinion. The first instalment of the letters are given below:

All Hymns Should Have Sound Gospel Truth, Writes Marion Lawrance

I BELIEVE that all music should be worthy of the name and that all hymns should have sound Gospel truth. I am quite well aware there is much music used nowadays in our Sunday schools that is "pointless and nonsensical." On the other hand, I believe, there is middle ground which is often overlooked by those who stand for a more practical thing, and I have no sympathy with anything else.

Any music that lifts people nearer to God cannot be condemned in a wholesale way, and I have no doubt that some of the music these days is not of the highest order. Personally, I love high-grade music, though I believe that a good deal of the popular music is helpful.

MARION LAWRANCE,

Composer Doane Defines the Standard of Good Church Music

WHILE you do not say what denominational hymnals you refer to, I feel quite sure your position in regard to some hymnals which have been published is quite correct. Every denomination desires its hymnal to express certain views that it holds with regard to its own special religious beliefs. There are a large number of hymns that have found their way into some hymnals which may safely be regarded as doggerel—simply a rhyme without a central leading thought which would inspire devotion in the heart of the user. The same can be said of music. Many compositions are unworthy of a place in a Christian hymnal, and convey no spiritual uplift when rendered, while as you say the words are puerile, faulty and heterodox.

To my mind, music is part of worship, and compositions of music and words that have graceful, melodious settings, that tend to lift the heart when sung to God in sincere devotion, are what is needed. I have compiled three hymnals in the last thirty years, which have been received with great favor and are still popular. I am in favor of anything that will elevate the service of song in the churches and give us a purer hymnody, better music if possible, and inspire the heart and voice to greater devotion and worship.

WILLIAM H. DOANE.

An Interdenominational Hymnal Needed, Writes Composer C. C. Converse

I THINK that a "hymn revision" committee, representing all our evangelical denominations, should be appointed. I'd be glad to serve on it, with or without compensation. I am, as you know, a Presbyterian. The latest hymnal issued by our Board of Publication, Philadelphia (The Westminster), contains two or three of my tunes, including "What a Friend We Have in Jesus." This tune slumbered in one of my Sunday school hymnals eight years, when Mr. Sankey happened to see it; took it and sang it, and put it in Gospel Hymns, afterwards estimating its world-wide publicity to equal seventy-five million copies.

Meaningless Words Wedded to Beautiful Music Worse Than Useless, Says Dr. Chapman

I AM in sympathy with the Rev. John Thompson when he criticizes a certain type of so-called Gospel hymns. "They are doggerel. They would be just as good sung backward." Better still, they would be better not sung at all. I think the song "Beautiful Isle of Somewhere" is meaningless. The music is beautiful, the words worse than useless. Some one ought to write sensible words to what might be a most useful devotional song.

But when all this is said, we must remember that there are thousands of wonderful Gospel songs. Their harmony is sweet, and the truth they teach is in keeping with the doctrinal standards of the church. Personally, I think that Gospel singing (so-called), when at its worst, is not so bad as the doggerel we hear in some pulpits, and the meaningless twaddle which some men who think the Gospel has lost its power preach from the sacred desk.

A good Gospel hymn is a treasure. The people sing them and remember their teaching when they have entirely forgotten some sermons they have heard. Our church services would be far more effective if beautiful Gospel hymns were sung occasionally by choir and congregation. I love the old hymns of the church. The Psalms to me are wonderful; but Gospel hymns of the better sort have their place, and nothing can displace them.

We are living in a flippant, irreverent and sensational age. It is not strange that the spirit of the times is found in some of the songs used.

I know of only one test as to the value of a Gospel hymn: Does it help the singer or the hearer to know God, to find Christ, and to resolve to be a truer follower of the Master?

Too Much Sensationalism in Our Modern Hymnology, Writes Pastor Pannkoke

UNQUESTIONABLY many hymns sung today are far from desirable from any viewpoint. They are neither true nor spontaneous. Dr. Thompson seems to think especially of hymns of a former day. The revival and the Sunday school movements have in our day, perhaps, unwittingly, ushered in a taste in church hymns that in many instances runs out into the cheapest catch-phrase, forced rhymes, and tawdry sentimentality accompanied by the surprising lilt and unmusical melody of "popular" music, so-called.

The number of really inspiring hymns, the truest expression of a deep, true, noble Christian faith, runs into the thousands. The Lutheran Church alone is said to have a hundred thousand, of which a great number are priceless gems that have again and again stirred Christian congregations in their innermost souls. For instance, the massive battle hymn of the Reformation, "A Mighty Fortress is Our God," or the Te Deum of the German people, "Now Thank We All Our God,"

The fault, to my mind, is not so much the fault of standard collections, although none of them are perfect. The fault rests primarily with the responsible human factor. It is in many instances, I believe, more than a want of good judgment. It is a part of the atmosphere of that cheap sensationalism which mistakes the excrescences of popular taste for the vigorous, massive timeliness of the Christian Church, which appropriates the best of every age and makes it subservient to its great mission of saving men by the Gospel of Christ Jesus.

"Doggerel" and "Ragtime" Abound in the Hymnals, Writes Eben E. Rexford

YOUR query is a rather embarrassing one to me, because I have written so many so-called "Gospel songs" myself. However, I have always tried to avoid the faults complained of in the recent church convention at Chicago, and I do not recall anything that would be likely to put me under the ban. If I have sinned in any of the respects indicated I am heartily sorry for it, and hope to be forgiven.

I am sorry to say that the charge of "religious doggerel" applies pertinently to a majority of the words that are set to music for Sunday school use. Many of them are silly in the extreme, if one takes the trouble to analyze them. Sickly sentimentality takes the place of sense in them. Theology is something they do not concern themselves about. They bear the same relation to real literature that the ragtime jingles of to-day bear to real music. And the music to which they are set is generally in keeping with them.

Publishers of Sunday school music are largely responsible for this condition of things. Scores of new books appear each season. These draw upon composers for material, and these composers buy their words where they can get them cheapest. The result is seen in every new book that is put on the market.

I have had occasion, several times in the last few years, to "edit" the words to which music had been set, for one of the leading music-publishing firms in the West. "Hymns" came to me for revision that were "fearfully and wonderfully made." It was simply impossible to make anything out of many of them, but the composers who sent them in had bought them because they could get them at a dollar apiece. It is to be presumed that previous experience had convinced them that anything that rhymed and had a "swing" to it would answer the purpose quite as well as that which had some literary merit and a basis of religious truth.

How to remedy the evil I don't know. I am inclined to think there is a middle ground between that which most people consider "classical" music and the jiggy music of the average Sunday school book, which would appeal to the majority of persons favorably if we could get it before them. What is needed is a collection from which all chaff has been eliminated.

The Real Union of Christians Should Be in the Te Deum, Writes Professor Hugh Black

I AGREE that a revision of most hymn books is sadly needed. The chief principle for the inclusion of hymns ought to be whether they are suitable for common praise. A hymn book is not a collection of religious poetry, but is designed for public worship. All peculiar and exceptional and very personal sentiments are out of place.

On this whole subject I should say that more important is it that the churches should discourage the endless hymn books published by private firms and edited by one or two individuals. However good such books may be, they make for disunion. Most of the editions of books of praise should be rejected, and one book accepted on which the churches everywhere could unite. It is preposterous that every other church should have a different book. If there is any practical place where we can have union, it is surely when we unite in praise to God. The real union of Christians is not in a creed, but in the Te Deum.

Give Us Hymns and Songs That Will Lead Men to Christ, Writes Composer Butts

REV. JOHN THOMPSON'S views are mine exactly. For twenty-six years I have given my entire time to church music in the capacity of singer, leader and hymn-writer. There has been a fearful "let down" in the character and style of music in our churches and Sabbath schools in the past ten years, due, I believe, to the inroads made on the home life of the young people (many times sanctioned by their elders) by the popular rag-time and sickly, sentimental, suggestive love-songs. I am speaking now of Christian homes. Traveling all over the country, you find this grade of music. Ask the one who plays or sings this style of music to play or sing some of the familiar standard hymns of the church and you will find that in most cases they are unable to even play the music correctly. Why is this? First, because the popular music of the day is permitted to be sung in many church concerts and social gatherings, ofttimes the pastor leading the choruses. Second, music committees too often void of all musical taste and ability to judge of text and musical composition.

Sabbath school superintendents, teachers and even pastors in many cases are to blame for the lack of "spirit-filled" hymns and songs in the church and home. They select for prayer and praise services songs that are sentimental and theological trash.

The songs which in my own experience have been used of God to help many souls have been those that have held up the life, death and resurrection of him who said: "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." If we are to have a nation-wide revival, I firmly believe with Rev. Mr. Thompson it must start with a cleaning out of our sentimental, unscriptural, trashy music, and a return to the standard hymns and Gospel songs that will lead souls to Christ and cause them to grow in the Christian life.

Haworth, N. J. BENJAMIN FRANKLIN BUTTS.

REFUSING TO BE HAPPY

*SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR AUGUST 23

A STRANGE STORY

By Arthur H. Howland

JESUS tried in every way to impress upon his hearers the fact that his religion was a thing of joy. Look up the New Testament passages in which he speaks of joy and promises it to his followers. See how willing he was to go to feasts. Notice how he said to the Jews in effect: "You found fault with John because he was too severe, now you find fault with me because I am too merry, and try to make the people glad." Matt. 11: 17-19; Luke 7:31-35. He performed his first miracle at a marriage feast and spoke more than once to his disciples about weddings.

A wedding is the happiest, cheeriest event in the world. And in this parable of the wedding feast he likens the whole of the kingdom of heaven to a marriage feast given for the son of the king.

Now of course the thing that Jesus describes in his parable could hardly have happened. He did not expect that any of his hearers would think it ever had happened or ever would happen. Nothing could have been more preposterous or more unbelievable to their minds than that people should be invited to the wedding of the king's son and refuse to come. It was a thing they would rather do than almost anything else in the world. And yet in the story that Jesus is telling, when the people had the opportunity to go to this royal wedding they would not go. In Luke's account of the story he specifies the excuses which the invited guests made for staying away. And they were amazingly flimsy. One had bought a piece of ground, another had bought some oxen; another had just been married. Matthew sums it all up by saying: "They went their ways, one to his farm, another to his merchandise." But he adds something that is still more incredible. Those who were invited to the wedding took the king's servants who brought them the invitation and killed them.

Then the king said: "Go ye therefore into the highways, and as many as ye shall find, bring to the marriage." Luke has it: "Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city, and bring in hither the poor and the maimed and the halt and the blind." After this had been done there was still room for more guests. "Then the lord said unto the servant, Go out into the highways and hedges and compel them to come in, that my house may be filled."

Why did Jesus tell this almost impossible story? He told it because, untrue as it is in the social life of the world, it is perfectly true in their soul life. The invitation which Jesus brought to earth from God was precisely the invitation of the king in this story: "Come, for all things are ready." There is no reason under the sun why men and women and little children should not partake gladly of the joy and the feasting of the kingdom of heaven. It is a marriage feast. Every possible excuse that could be thought of as hindering is infinitely more flimsy than the silly excuses the invited guests made to the hospitable king. Read Isa. 55: 1-2; Ps. 4: 7, etc.

Of course, as in our lesson last week, Jesus was speaking this parable especially to the Jews. They were the chosen guests at the King's feast. But they refused, so the invitation was sent out to the strangers, the Gentiles.

What about the churl who would not put on a wedding garment? He was willing to go to the palace; he was willing to share in the joy; he was willing to eat at the king's table; but he was not willing to submit his will to the desires and the program of the king. Like Duncan's ghost he spoiled the feast. When they asked him why he had not done the simple thing required "he was speechless." So he was not allowed to stay where the rest of the guests were making merry.

The riches of God's feast are for those whose wills are altogether surrendered to him. The careless guests who were first invited "went their ways"; the foolish guest who came but rebelled met only disappointment. That is the matter with us all. We pray, "Thy will be done," but we do not really want God's will done, and so our joy is spoiled and we spoil the joy of others who would feast in gladness at the King's bountiful table.

Shall we not all, officers, teachers, pastors, yield ourselves more completely than ever to the "sweet will of God"? Only so can we have the power and skill to lead the children of our Sunday schools away from the follies and sorrows of sin to the abundant gladness of the King's eternal palace.

THE LESSON IN LIFE

By Amos R. Wells

IT IS profoundly significant that our Lord, in picturing the kingdom of heaven, likens it to a king's feast, the most splendid of all feasts, a marriage feast for the king's son. This means that religion is happiness; pure, exultant, delicious joy; joy beyond all measure.

Once the Duchess of Argyle wrote to several of the crowned heads of Europe and asked whom they especially envied. The Czar of Russia answered: "I sincerely envy every man who is not loaded down with the cares of a great empire." Francis Joseph of Austria wrote: "I envy the fate of a man who is not an emperor."

Truly the kingdoms of this world do not bring happiness; but the kingdom of heaven does. Joaquin Miller once wrote a lovely poem about a rich man's son who wandered far in search of happiness. He went over Europe and to distant India. He saw many lands. He won many honors. At last he returned to his childhood's home weary and disappointed, for he was still unhappy. He sat groaning in his forest one day when a child, straying near, stumbled and fell. Grudgingly he lifted the bruised and weeping waif, and carried it into his stately home. "And oh, the rising sun he knew, that day, and all his after days!" The little act of unselfishness broadened out and grew till his whole life was flooded with happiness. He had accepted the invitation to the King's wedding feast. He had entered the kingdom of heaven.

What a glorious privilege is that of the King's servants who distribute the invitations to the feast! How can a Christian ever look upon evangelism as a hard and unpleasant task or as less than the highest honor and joy? Caravans in a desert, when they want water, send out a camel with a rider, then after an interval another, and then another. As soon as the first rider finds water, even before he takes a particle of the liquid into his parched mouth, he shouts to the nearest, "Come!" He in turn shouts "Come!" and the next takes up the cry, and so it is repeated till it reaches the caravan. Is it a hard task to shout that "Come"? Is it not rather the instinctive shout of joy over a beautiful discovery?

We are a little frightened by one feature of the parable. Some of the invitations were ridiculed and turned off slightingly. Others were met with violence and the messengers were tortured and slain. These results of evangelism have occurred many, many times in the course of Christian history. They were illustrated most terribly in the life of Him who spoke the parable. But in our modern times we have no such perils to fear. I have heard a rescue-mission superintendent who seeks fallen men and women in the worst parts of Boston and at all hours of the day and night, and who has done this for years with unflagging zeal, say he has never been rebuffed. Men and women may refuse his invitation to the marriage feast, but they respect and often thank the messenger.

What are the "highways" into which the king's messengers were sent when the king's nobility rejected his invitations? We are likely to think they mean the slums of our cities. They do, but they also mean the shops and the banks and the clerks' desks and the schoolrooms and the factories. The highways are wherever men and women go about their daily duties. A young telegraph clerk, troubled over his sins, heard this message clicking through his instrument: "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world." A brother was making the telegraph wire a highway to reach a distressed sister, and reached more than he knew with the King's invitation. My old professor of mathematics kept me one day after a recitation in calculus to ask me if I was a Christian. He made his recitation room a highway for the King's invitation. In Massachusetts there is a railroad ticket agent who, forced to work on Sunday, has converted the platform of his station into a King's highway, and every Sunday for years has held there a rousing Gospel service, pressing the King's invitation upon the hearts of men. Oh, every place and every opportunity will be made the King's highway, if you are really the servant of the King!

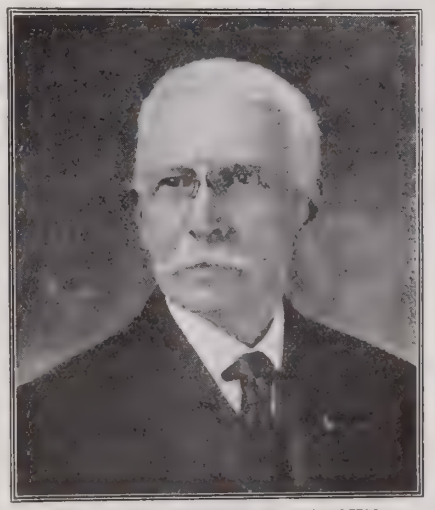
* THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON for Sunday, August 23, 1914. The Wedding Feast. Matt. 22: 1-14. GOLDEN TEXT: "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, that killeth the prophets and stoneth them that are sent unto her! how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her own brood under her wings, and ye would not!" Luke 13: 34.

ANNIVERSARY OF A FAMOUS CLASS

By William W. Greene

THE famous Vaughn Class of men in Calvary Baptist Sunday school, Washington, D. C., has celebrated its silver jubilee. This organization, from a small, apparently insignificant beginning, but founded in prayer and faith, has grown, under the blessing of Providence, to a position of wide influence in the District of Columbia, and has become actually a world-force for practical uplift in good citizenship. The work of the Vaughn Class is among young men, with their lives before them—not with the journey's-end human wreckage.

On the first Sunday in February, 1889, Francis W. Vaughn, a plain, humble man, whose heart went out for the thousands of away-from-home boys in this great town, gathered a little band of five young men together in the Calvary Baptist Sunday school and told them in his homelike style the truths of the Bible, and pointed the way to largest and best manhood. The Sunday morning attendance now has on a number of occasions been over three hundred, while upon the rolls there are between four and five hundred men. Owing to the shifting population of Washington, this class has a large number of "alumni."



THE LATE FRANCIS W. VAUGHN
1839-1913

After the death of Mr. Vaughn his mantle fell upon the shoulders of General W. S. Shallenberger, second assistant postmaster-general for ten years. The hand of death very recently took this good man also, and his successor has not yet been appointed. One of the former co-teachers who has done good work for the class is Professor Mitchell Carroll, now secretary of the Archeological Society of America. Dr. Eugene C. Rice is the only one of the original five members who has continued with the class all these years.

"Once a member always a member" is the Vaughn Class tie that binds past members closely to present membership. There are Vaughn Class men to-day on every continent, and the little blue-and-gold button with "V. C. C." (which stands for Vaughn Class Club and also for Virtue, Charity, Courage) is worn all over the world.

Among the Vaughn Class men are numbered to-day congressmen, judges, high railroad officials, managers of great business houses and manufacturing concerns, consuls and other government officials, lawyers, preachers, physicians, educators, scientists—a whole host of successful men in professional, business and political life, in big positions of responsibility and usefulness.

One of the things in which the "Commander" took great delight was carrying bouquets to sick fellows, and this feature of it is perpetuated in the Vaughn Memorial Fund permanently maintained for the purpose chiefly of purchasing flowers from time to time for the members who are sick. The chief adjunct of the Vaughn Class is the Class Club, which has been maintained for many years and is the business dynamo of the class life and work. Within the last eight years the David and Jonathan Brotherhood has been established, having later been gradually developed and enlarged.

There are various committees: Executive, lookout, social, relief, religious work, nominating, and membership. Monthly meetings are held and the business is followed by social features, music, supper, speaking, and initiation of new members. Among the annual events are a formal banquet in the spring and a concert in the fall.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

FROM Dickinson Center, N. Y., Mr. and Mrs. Byron Bowen write asking that if any one knows of the whereabouts of their son, Floyd Bowen, information may be forwarded to them at once. They ask the prayers of the League that he may be found and return home. When last heard from he was in California. His mother is ill, and his father wishes to send him money for the journey home.

Mrs. E. M. E. writes from Omaha, Neb.: "We asked God to heal a dear one. She is well. We rejoice and give thanks." M. E. M. writes from Washington, D. C.: "Some time ago I asked prayers for the restoration of my health. I thank God it has been restored." Mrs. E. B. McC. writes from Westmoreland, N. H.: "I praise the Lord that he heard your prayers at the Bowery Mission and of the Prayer League for healing my dear daughter, who was very ill."

Mrs. A. H. G., of Shushan, N. Y., writes: "Prayers for the restoration to health of my daughter and for help in financial troubles have been answered. My faith has been strengthened." Mrs. F. A. R. writes from Zurich, Mont.: "The request sent in recently for prayer that some property be disposed of has been answered."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

W. F. H., Garfield, Kan.; Mrs. A. A., Westville, Pa.; Miss E. A., Owen Sound, Ont.; A Reader, Triadelphia, W. Va.; G. A. L., Wyalusing, Pa.; Mrs. H. B., Amsterdam, N. Y.; M. I. W., Kingsley, Pa.; A Christian Girl, McPherson, Kan.; Miss M. E. R., Clayton, N. M.; A. P., Wichita, Kan.; Mrs. A. J. B., Manchester, N. H.; Mrs. C. P. O., Lexington, Va.; Mrs. B. F. S., Canton, Ohio; Mrs. E. L., Rea, Wash.; I. W. W., Shenandoah Junction, W. Va.; Mrs. B. M. B., Hagerstown, Md.

Mrs. J. A. Hardy, of Portsmouth, Va., the "Mother of the Prayer League," sends two dollars for the famine sufferers in China, and suggests that the members of the League remember these sufferers in our prayers. A pastor's wife writes urgently to request prayer for help for her household at a time of great need. A young widow with three small children asks prayers that a way may be opened for her to keep her family together and maintain a home.

A Christian physician writes from San Diego, Calif.: "I wish to ask the prayers of the Christian League for one of my patients, Mrs. B. S. W., an aged lady, who has lost her eyesight. We have been praying for the return of it, and this morning she told me over the phone that things looked like late twilight. I believe in prayer with all my heart and believe she will be able to see again as well as ever. Please pray, also, for a man past thirty, that he may be delivered from the drink habit. And for one of the best men and most successful and tender-hearted physicians I ever saw. Pray for his conversion, so deep and full that he will live it and talk it wherever he goes.

The following friends ask prayer for assurance of sins forgiven, a deeper work of grace, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing:

E. M. D.; S. E. B.; Mrs. C. P. O.; L. A. W.; Mrs. B. M. B.; B. T. L.; Mrs. G. L.; Mrs. O. L. V.; Mrs. J. S. H.; Mrs. J. S. P. L.; Miss E. V. E.; B. M. B.; M. F. S.; Mrs. F. E. H.; Mrs. J. F. C.; C. E. G.; Mrs. R. G. P.; Mrs. S. H. H.; B. H.; B. R.; R. G.; L. B.; K. H.; Mrs. F. L. R.; Mrs. O. S. R.; N. E. E.; Mrs. R. M.; J. T. B.; Mrs. P. E. W.; Miss E. A. V.; Mrs. I. McN.; Mrs. C. A.; M. L. H.; E. McL.; A. S.; An Orphan Girl, Texas.

Rev. M. M. S. requests prayers for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit during revival meetings at Saluda, N. C.; Mrs. P. C., for a revival at Gashland, Mo.; S. V. S., for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on revival meeting to begin in August at Ransomville, N. C. B. H., B. R., R. L., L. B., K. H. and R. G. request prayer for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit in their church in Booth, Ark.; L. A. W., that many souls may be won in a revival meeting to be held in San Francisco; Mrs. M. R. M., for revival in the churches of Ness City, Kan.; Mrs. J. T. D., for a Sunday school class of nine girls in Daytona, Fla.; Mrs. P. B., for a Sunday school class at Reading, Ohio; M. F. S., for a Sunday school at Oxford, N. Y.

Mrs. H. G. S. and Mrs. A. M. F., that their sons may be delivered from the drink habit; Mrs. G. E. M. and Mrs. W. M. that their husbands may be saved from this appetite; Mrs. R. M., E. K., C. E. R., and M. L. W., that brothers may be saved from drink; E. G. L.; F. A.; M. E. H.; M. E. S.; Mrs. A. W. and Miss M. A. C., that other relatives and friends may be delivered from this habit.

Mrs. M. W., E. G. L.; Mrs. I. McN., C. D. and Mrs. L. W. request prayer that relatives or friends may be restored to their right minds. Miss S., Mrs. E. C. Z. and Mrs. M. A. M. request prayer that their sight may be restored; Miss I. F., that her mother's sight may be restored; M. M. I., that a little boy's eyes may be healed; Mrs. P. C. and J. V. C., that sight may be strengthened. E. G. L., C. L. M., Mrs. J. S. P. L., Mrs. P. C. and Mrs. A. L. O. request prayer that their hearing may be restored; Mrs. L. W., that a friend's hearing may be restored; Mrs. A. L. O., that her sister's hearing may be restored.

The following friends ask prayer for the conversion of sons:

Mrs. R. M.; Mrs. C. A.; Mrs. C. A. T.; O. S. K.; Mrs. J. C. J.; Mrs. J. B.; Mrs. A. J. B.; Mrs. S. S.; E. H. L.; Mrs. J. V. C.; Mrs. K. H. M.; Mrs. L. W.; S. L. H.; Mrs. E. H. B.; Mrs. M. H.; J. T. S.; Mrs. C. W.; Mrs. J. T. D.; Mrs. L. W.

The following friends ask prayer for the conversion of husbands:

The Prisoner's Relief Society

THE organization known as the Prisoners' Relief Society, recently formed in Huntington, W. Va., is now actively at work. The president of the society, David Gideon, has associated with him a number of business men who are resolved to extend aid wherever possible to the families of men who are in prison, and also to send spiritual help and encouragement to the prisoners themselves. Secretary C. M. Love, of the society, writes: "The experimental stage of our organization is now over, and we are at active work extending aid to those in need. We feel that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is closely related to the Prisoners' Relief Society, because of the fact that one who is active in our organization was trained into this work through his communications with you while he was in prison. We are extending our work into all the States, and we realize the magnitude of the undertaking." Secretary Love will be glad to answer any inquiries addressed to him at Room 210, First National Bank Building, Huntington, W. Va.

Contributions to The Christian Herald Children's Home

This is a partial list of contributions received in aid of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home. The season is now at its height, and the capacity of Mont-Lawn is taxed to its utmost. The co-operation of all our readers is invited in maintaining this greatly needed institution.

A LITTLE ANGEL OF THE MOUNTAINS

BY CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY

CHAPTER XV—Continued

MRS. MORRISON rejoiced over the almost sublime dignity and courage of the miner and his companion as she took the two pistols and rifles, holding them awkwardly enough.

"Now," said Mr. Morrison, hopeful that the crisis had passed at last, "we can go on with our worship. The bishop will, I am sure, now take—"

He never finished the sentence. Indeed, his words fell more or less on deaf ears. One of the gang back of the outlaw snickered, another followed suit, the snicker became a laugh. The crowd, keenly alive to his discomfiture, roared, Christians and others alike. He who laughs last laughs best, though. Dead Shot Jackson, his gun arm now hanging loosely by his side, was a picture of impotent, baffled rage. Parson Bill, now some distance away, looked at him with such withering contempt, and yet with a sort of a smile at his impotency, which was even harder to bear than disdain. In the face of that look and smile and the general mocking, biting merriment, the desperado lost all control of himself, as the derisive laugh behind him became more general. He would turn this comedy into a tragedy, and at once.

"Well, I'll git you, anyway," he gritted out through his clenched teeth. "We'll see whether your God kin protect—"

As he spoke he once more lifted his heavy revolver and pulled the trigger. There was a blinding flash, a stunning report, a scream—and there between the two men lay a small figure, its ruddy face suddenly white beneath its tousled hair, blood spurting from its breast!

Little Olaf Tryggvesson, standing upon one of the boulders nearest to Parson Bill, attentively watching the course of events, had seen and heard the words which passed. Before any one could stop him, he had leaped in front of the big miner, and into his small breast had gone the hateful bullet from the outlaw's pistol. God had protected Parson Bill, after all!

For one second both parties stood still, and then with a roar like maddened animals the good men of the camp leaped toward the desperado. They were unarmed. Dead Shot Jackson's party had the advantage of them. They could have shot them down in scores, but their leader's act had suddenly and completely alienated even the worst of his followers. Their gunbarrels slowly fell. They afforded their leader no help; they shrank away from him; they offered no resistance whatever. The murderer had brought his own fate upon himself. Even the worst of those with him would not stand for the wanton shooting of a child.

Everybody was fond of little Olaf, even those whom he had cut from his acquaintance when he had reformed. He lay there, the blood welling out frightfully on his little white shirt, to all intents and appearances dead. Dead Shot Jackson was himself appalled by the consequences of his mad act. He had intended to shoot Parson Bill, never dreaming but that he would have the countenance of his friends and make a successful get-away. And even had he not been able to win free, he was almost willing to give up his own life in order to kill Parson Bill. To do him justice, he had never intended to shoot the child.

He might have got away even yet if he had not been so dazed; his party might have assisted him to escape; but he hesitated and was lost, for leaping through the little opening between the masses of men came a bronze, athletic figure. The Indian had thrown aside his blanket, and before any one could stop him he had seized Jackson by the shoulder, thrust the muzzle of his gun in the desperado's face and shouted in strident tones:

"Me got you now. You move, me shoot. Same like you kill my mother."

"That's well done, Injun," said Old Four Eyes, stepping forward. "But I'll take charge of this yere prisoner," he added. He took Jackson's gun from his unresisting hand and then turned to the crowd. "Git back, gents," he said. "There must be no more bloodshed. I take it no gent wants to do any more shootin' this mornin'. We've got our man. That's enough. Here." He called to two of his friends, handed them Dead Shot Jackson's own gun, took Parson Bill's weapon from Mrs. Morrison's hand, gave it to the other man, and finally restored his own gun to the Doc. "You three gents jest hold this man right yere till we all decides what's to be done. If any man 'mong you gents moves an eyelash," he continued sternly to the saloon crowd, "it'll be the death warrant for your leader. You all understands?"

"He ain't no leader of ourn no more," said one of the men.

"Curse him!" cried another. "Shootin' up a kid!"

"Well, you all jest wait where you are," said Old Four Eyes, "until we sees."

Meanwhile, Parson Bill and Mrs. Morrison, in an agony of apprehension, had bent over the boy. Water had been brought, restoratives also; his shirt was ripped open, showing a big ugly wound in his shoulder.

"I've studied medicine a bit," said Mr. Morrison. "Let me see him."

"Gents," said Old Four Eyes to the men crowding close with murmurs of pity and anxiety, "keep back. Give him air."

"If there is a God in heaven and he saves the life of this boy, I am his forever," cried Parson Bill solemnly, and all heard him.

The group in the center, consisting of the wounded lad, Mr. and Mrs. Morrison, the two girls, Parson Bill, the bishop, and Blue Wing, was the focus of everybody's attention. Mr. Morrison worked over the lad, willing hands having brought him basin, water, bandages, and a probe from a simple medicine chest that he carried. The two little girls wept silently; Mrs. Morrison skilfully aided her husband; Parson Bill, with the boy's head on his knee, sat dumb, his rugged face working, his eyes filled with tears. The bishop's lips moved in silent prayer. The Indian stood silent, impassive, close at hand.

"For God's sake!" said Old Four Eyes at last, "somebody say somethin'. We can't stand this much longer."

"Friends," said the bishop, "this gentleman is right. Some one should say something—should say it to God. Stand where you are while I pray."

He had not thought to be introduced to his new congregation in such a way, or under such circumstances. He was not prepared by any similar experience to offer up the prayer it now devolved upon him to make. But as he bared his head beneath the pines, the words came to him as they never came before. He prayed for the life of the boy who had interposed to save his friend; he prayed for the forgiveness of the man whose mad passion had laid the lad at their feet; he prayed for the spirit of restraint and self-control for all those about him; he prayed for the dispossession from their sore hearts of the spirit of revenge; he prayed for peace, for law, for order, for love, for the indwelling presence of the Spirit of God, for the example of Christ. Such a prayer none there had ever heard, broken as it was by the sobs of the children, long sighs from Parson Bill, the deep breathing of the men.

God was with his messenger that day. When he had finished, Mr. Morrison had completed his dressing and little Olaf had opened his eyes. He caught the close of the prayer. The familiar name of Jesus, in whom as their Advocate the bishop had made his petition, came to his consciousness.

"Jesus," the boy whispered.

It was so still that every one heard him. Not a sound save the soft silt of the breeze through the pines was there.

"Jesus," he whispered. His eyes went upward, seeking what? The face of Parson Bill intervened between him and the sky. "Parson Bill," he went on very slowly, "are you safe? Did he get you?"

"No," replied the man. "I'm safe."

"I am so glad."

"Thanks to you, my boy."

Little Olaf shook his head.

"It was God who saved you, Parson Bill. He whispered to me that Jackson was going to shoot. He told me to jump."

"Yes, yes," said the miner. "I wish you hadn't done it."

"I saved you, Bill; won't you give yourself to Him?" continued the lad.

"I reckon I'm his."

"His faithful soldier and servant?" faltered the boy.

"Until my life's end, so help me," said Bill, lifting up his hands and turning his face to the sky.

"Amen, amen," said Mrs. Morrison.

"Praise the Lord God for his mercies," added her husband.

"Parson Bill has expressed my sentiments," said Old Four Eyes.

"We're all with you, kid," cried one of the bystanders.

"We're goin' to follow your lead," exclaimed another.

"I'm glad I got shot," murmured the boy, closing his eyes.

"Is he dead, sir?" cried Bill, turning to Mr. Morrison.

"No," said the latter. "My skill is not very great, but I don't think he is going to die unless fever or blood poisoning sets in. He has only fainted. We will take him over to our cabin."

"There's a young doc down at Ravine City," said one of the men bystanders—and he happened to be one of the men who had come there with Dead Shot Jackson! "I was over there a week ago, and they was all talkin' about him."

"Let him be fetched at once," said Old Four Eyes. "We'll pay well for his time. Two of you saddle up an'—"

"We ain't showed up very well in this yere business, but we'd like to do somethin' now, which we repudiates Dead Shot Jackson an' all his ways," said the man who had spoken of the doctor. "If you all will trust us to go—"

Old Four Eyes looked him over and saw the eagerness in his face.

"Go," he said. "We'll trust you. Bring him back quick if you have to rope him."

Meanwhile, by the direction of Mr. Morrison, boards had been fetched. The boy's form was lifted upon them, and from the many pressing forward to offer their services, two of the miners were selected. The moving of the lad recalled him to consciousness again. He opened his blue eyes once more and stared about him. The men opened a way, and as they bore him gently along, Parson Bill holding his hand on one side and Mrs. Morrison on the other, they passed by Dead Shot Jackson.

"Stop," said the boy, recognizing him.

In obedience to his whisper, the bearers halted.

"I am sorry for you, Mr. Jackson," he said faintly. "I know you didn't go to shoot me."

"As true as there's a God—if there is one," said Jackson vehemently, "I never meant to git you, kid."

race. By the Balkan war of 1912 and 1913, to complete the freedom of Servians from Turkish rule, Servia secured a foothold on the Adriatic, but was forced by Austria to withdraw and be content with an extension of territory southward. Turkey was thrust out of Europe almost entirely, but a united Servia seemed as far off as ever.

The present situation threatens to involve the six great Powers at once, and all of Europe before the end is reached. This means a present struggle between 9,000,000 on the one side and 12,000,000 on the other. Approximately the fighting strength of the great Powers is shown below.

It is estimated that a war on this scale will cost the nations nearly $20,000,000 daily. One authority states that over $30,000,000 daily will be expended directly upon the war, and an additional $25,000,000 lost in taxes, support of population without means, and repairing damage done by passing troops. The possibilities, irrespective of indemnities later, run into the billions.

Effect in the United States

A general war of any duration in Europe will affect the whole world for a period far beyond the cessation of hostilities, and practically every interest in this country will be influenced. But no man can say yet exactly how. If the west sells half its wheat abroad at war prices, for example—and wheat quotations fairly leaped as war news came in—there would still remain the greatly increased difficulty of getting it transported, the question of marine insurance, and the danger of confiscation as contraband of war while on the high seas. Assuming that the wheat were shipped, there would be just half the usual quantity left for our own bread. Shall we than eat less bread and also pay war prices?

Just such conflicting conditions make a clear forecast of what the war will do to America impossible. Wheat is the one commodity most likely to be in demand abroad. Farming there for a while will be left largely to the women. Crops will fail and also will be destroyed by the moving armies. The hugely augmented armies themselves will constitute a new demand for breadstuffs. England is entirely dependent upon other lands for her food supplies, irrespective of war. Russia's wheat will be her own. North and South America will be looked to to prevent starvation in Europe's cities.

Europe's armies will be swelled by millions of reservists now on the farms, in the mills and the stores, chiefly the mills. That means curtailed production along all lines, a diminished local demand for everything but the necessaries of life, and certainly less money with which to buy. Idle mills abroad means no foreign market for our cotton. And that in part explains the phenomenal slump in cotton that caused several failures. And foreign merchants will hardly import our products, because prohibitive prices must prevail in order to meet the increased cost of handling and transportation and the risks incident to war, exactly as in the case of wheat. Thus at home the demand for cotton is threatened. Assuming a normal demand abroad, carrying conditions are abnormal; there are less than a score of American ships available. Confronted by such conditions, our manufacturers naturally hesitate to proceed on a normal basis. Millions of tons of freight are now tied up in American ports for lack of neutral vessels to carry it. In this situation economists see opportunity for the United States to take first place in world commerce, and to build up a merchant marine that for all time will enable this country to control freight transportation across the seas. In 1913 American vessels carried our exports and imports to the value of $381,000,000; foreign vessels to the value of $3,392,000,000.

Many other questions enter into the subject of a business boom in this country as being incidental to a European war, such as the liability of all ships to being searched for contraband of war, and their seizure even if neutrals, if the cargo is more than fifty per cent. contraband. Practically everything that can be used by an army in its operations is treated as contraband of war. There is also the factor of the impoverishment of Europe's finances, fields and manhood by the war, which will mean years of lessened purchasing and productive power.

Investment securities have already shown how war affects them: their heavy depreciation because of a wide preference for gold in the hand has closed the world's exchanges. The foreign market for our securities will of course be closed. Our gold will be in demand by foreign creditors, and also for foreign loans at high rates, but shipments of actual gold are subject to the same dangers that threaten other shipments. This country may now become, in the event of war, the banking nation for the whole world, but it remains to be seen if profitable advantage can be taken of that fact.

If ships can get them across, probably a million able-bodied men will leave our shores to fight under their national colors. Such an emigration might create a new labor situation, unless a lessened foreign market should throw even more than that out of employment. On the other hand there is the prospect of a rich South American market hitherto monopolized by Germany. The Panama Canal is opportunely ready to permit our coastwise ships access to both shores of South America. South American imports amount to close to a billion dollars in value annually, of which the United States supplies less than $100,000,000. This natural market for American products may come to us as our greatest benefit, if we may so speak of the indirect fruits of war, from the European conflict.

The United States will be a neutral power, of course: in fact, the greatest of the neutral world powers. The close of the war should find us enjoying more than ever the confidence and friendship of the nations.

CONGENIAL WORK
And Strength to Perform It.

A person in good health is likely to have a genial disposition, ambition, and enjoy work.

On the other hand, if the digestive organs have been upset by wrong food, work becomes drudgery.

"Until recently," writes a Washington girl, "I was a railroad stenographer, which means full work every day.

"Like many other girls alone in a large city, I lived at a boarding house. For breakfast it was mush, greasy meat, soggy cakes, black coffee, etc.

"After a few months of this diet I used to feel sleepy and heavy in the mornings. My work seemed a terrible effort, and I thought the work was to blame—too arduous.

"At home I had heard my father speak of a young fellow who went long distances in the cold on Grape-Nuts and cream and nothing more for breakfast.

"I concluded if it would tide him over a morning's heavy work it might help me, so on my way home one night I bought a package and next morning I had Grape-Nuts and milk for breakfast.

"I stuck to Grape-Nuts, and in less than two weeks I noticed improvement. I remember I used to walk the 12 blocks to business and knew how good it was simply to live.

"As to my work—well, did you ever feel the delight of having congenial work and the strength to perform it? That's how I felt. I truly believe there's life and vigor in every grain of Grape-Nuts."

SHADOWED CHILDHOOD

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

THREE times a week, during all the drearily hot, utterly merciless summer months, the little tired children of the city gather together for their journey to Mont-Lawn. Their meeting-place is on the top floor of the Bible House, almost directly over my head—and, as I pause in my work, I can hear the pattering of small feet and the confused murmur of eager voices. Sometimes, when my thoughts are easily held captive, I drop my pencil and finally I get up from my desk and follow the sounds that have come to me faintly from above.

The rooms upstairs are always crowded with children, tiny children, middle-sized children and—just children. Little boys with close-cropped heads and round eyes, little girls with lisping tongues, "little mothers" with braided pigtails and anxious smiles. It was a few days ago that I met the children I am going to tell you about.

There were three of them sitting stiffly in a row—a boy and two girls. The boy with a thin little face and short, crisp hair, the smallest girl with a great mop of soft golden-brown curls, cut Dutch; the largest with long dark, wavy hair. Before long I found my way over to their side of the room.

Somehow, it is always rather hard for me to open a conversation with a group of kiddies. After one gets started there are a million perfectly good subjects to talk about—fairies and Santa Claus and public playgrounds, for instance. However, I was not called upon to start the conversation, for the little boy raised his round eyes solemnly to my face and inclosed a small, rather damp, fist. A bright nickel lay in the palm of it.

"See what a lady give me!" he hissed.

"Oh, how lovely!" I gasped in astonishment. "What are you ever going to buy with it? Lollypops, I guess."

"No." It was the oldest of the little girls that spoke. Proudly she patted a deliciously lumpy bag that lay in her lap.

"They're in here—a whole ten cents' worth of 'em! The lady give 'em, too."

"My—" again I was deeply surprised. "Isn't that a lot of candy for you three—isn't it?"

"You bet!" the little boy chimed in, luxuriously smacking his lips. "You bet!"

The smallest girl had not spoken at all. Her round blue eyes were fixed on me with a steady glance so unwavering that I thought of a deep blue lake that I had once paddled over all alone in the early twilight.

"Are you going to the country, too?" I asked rather needlessly. (Some day I am going to stop asking foolish questions.) "But of course you are going with your brother and sister."

The big eyes never left my face, but the head with its wavy Dutch cut nodded slowly once, and a fat finger crept into a small red mouth.

"She's bashful," murmured the tiny older sister in my ear. "She never talks much unless she knows you and loves you lots!"

A little later I heard the story of the children from one of the young ladies who has charge of the Mont-Lawn work. It was one of the stories that are so common in New York, one of the pitiful little tales that go to make up the tragedy in the game of life.

"I saw you talking to those three children," she said to me as I was walking out of the room. "Weren't they sweet? They're orphans, poor little tots!"

"They are?" I questioned. "Will you tell me about them?"

"There are four of them," began the lady, "the three you saw here and another older child, a boy, who is on a farm for a month. Their father and mother died when they were very young, and left them to an old grandmother to bring up and send to school. They were very poor; then, as though they did not have troubles enough, the grandmother began to lose her eyesight. Now she is totally blind and the oldest girl tells me that she has to feel their hair to tell them apart."

"But they are such sweet, polite little things," I remarked, "and their clothes are so new and fresh. How does she manage?"

"She has a hard time," conceded the Mont-Lawn lady, "but she has brought them up very well. "Of course, they are poor and their clothes are not always fresh and new—the ones they wear now were bought by the settlement worker who brought them to us. She got shoes and stockings for them, too. It's wonderful what a difference clothes will make."

I went away with a story fast in my heart, and a picture clearly carved in my mind. And as I sat alone at my desk a little later, the bare outlines that I had gathered came to me with startling distinctness. I could see a little blind woman in a shabby room, trying to pierce through the eternal darkness by means of swift fingers that moved from a close-cropped head to a golden brown one, and from there on to the dark wavy locks. I could see an old bent form walking slowly from stove to tiny mattress beds; tidying the pitiful little home while the children were out at school; I could see a lonely woman with nervous hands folded, trying to be glad that her little charges were away in the country, yet aching to feel the little heads again under her fingers, and to have the touch of small, soft lips on her withered cheek.

And then, bright with the radiance of God's sunshine, I saw another picture, the picture of three little children, pale from the dulness of a tiny cramped room and tired from endless helping, growing strong and brown and ruddy in the Children's Paradise. I saw them coming home from their outing full of songs and glowing pictures, and I heard their happy voices at bedtime telling "really true" fairy tales to the grandmother whose eyes could never see the glories they tell of, but whose aged hands, happy again, wandered lovingly from one head to another.

So, all through the summer months, three times a week, little children of the slums gather together in an upper room to prepare for their pilgrimage to the country; and very often I drop my work and follow the call of the childish voices and tramp of the eager feet. And always, if I choose to look, I can find some little tale of real child life, with its lights and shadows, its small joys and its pitiful sadness, waiting for me. For, though there are books, many of them, coming from the presses every day, there are stranger stories printed on childish faces, and deeper sorrows painted in the droop of a baby mouth, than you will ever be able to find between the decorated covers of a best seller.

An Old Reader's Pleasant Recollections

I sometimes notice an item in your paper stating how long some persons have been subscribing for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I used to get a Christian Herald in England forty years ago. It was published in London. Over thirty-three years ago I came to Fayette County, Pa., and continued to receive my Christian Herald from England until I found that there was one published in New York, when I subscribed for the latter. This is thirty years ago or more. I was delighted at that time to read Rev. Talmage's sermons and Henry W. Beecher's sermons, which were published then. I was successful in introducing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD into several homes in our community, with the hope that it might lead them to the higher life. As my children married, I subscribed for them also. In this list enclosed I have three sons-in-law, two daughters-in-law (both widows), two other widows, and a friend in Missouri. All these are presents. I hope the paper will help to uplift them to a more consecrated life, and do their families good. Some of them are hardly able to subscribe. I have been doing this for many years, and I hope God will bless the effort to do good.

It is sweet to remember that I took part in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S work, such as the Russian famine a great many years ago, the Indian famine, and that of China. May God bless your work and our little efforts to help.

Some Tire Prices

Will Buy You a Half-Inch Wider Goodyear

Note these amazing facts:

Today some tires are costing one-third more than Goodyears.

Their price—or less—buys a half-inch wider Goodyear. And the wider tire will fit your rim.

For instance, the price on a 30x3 will buy a Goodyear 31x3½. Their price on a 36x4½ will buy a Goodyear 37x5. So on other sizes.

Or you can buy four same-size Goodyears for the price some ask for three.

So the price of some tires will buy you in Goodyears a wider tire, or one extra tire in three.

Too-High Prices

Nowadays, 16 makes of tires are selling for more than Goodyear prices. Those prices, we claim, are too high.

Goodyear prices buy the utmost in a tire—the best we know after 15 years of research and experiment.

They buy four great features found in no other tire. And they buy the tire which outsells any other, the tire which holds top place in Tiredom after millions have been tried.

Our prices are low because of mammoth production. They are half what they used to be. But smaller output and higher prices do not signify better tires.

Exclusive Features

These four great features can be found in No-Rim-Cut tires alone. That is why these tires have become the most popular tires in the world.

The No-Rim-Cut Feature—the only way known to make a faultless tire that can't rim-cut.

Our "On-Air" cure—which saves the countless blow-outs due to wrinkled fabric. This one extra process costs us $1,500 daily.

Our rubber rivets—hundreds of which we form in each tire to combat tread separation. We control this patent.

Our All-Weather tread—the tough, double-thick anti-skid. It is flat and smooth, so it runs like a plain tread. But no other tire grasps wet roads with such deep, sharp, resistless grips.

In No-Rim-Cut Tires, at Goodyear prices, you get all those extra features. Any dealer will supply you.

She can end that Corn

End it in two days.

Blue-jay would stop the pain the moment she applied it. Then it would gently loosen the corn. In 48 hours, the whole corn would lift out, without any pain or soreness.

Blue-jay, each month, ends a million corns in that way. No hard corn can resist it. Since this invention it is utterly needless to suffer from a corn.

Yet thousands of people still pare corns, or use some old-time treatment. They simply coddle corns, and every little while they become unendurable.

Try this scientific way.

See how Blue-jay stops the pain. See how it undermines the corn. And see, in two days, how that corn forever disappears.

After that, so long as you live, you will never let corns bother you.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Lowly Service*

IN EUROPE the guests at hotels and often at private homes set their shoes outside the door at night and find them in the morning blacked or polished. This custom has pretty nearly come to an end in the United States, excepting in the case of the Pullman sleeping cars. But in Great Britain it is the custom, even in private homes. And in homes where there are no servants, the boots of guests "of quality" will be blackened by the housewife.

The writer had an odd experience in a quaint little town on the West coast of Scotland to which he had gone to preach on a certain Sunday. The servant of the manse was more housekeeper than servant, a woman of grace and intelligence. She was distressed that he had not left his shoes outside the door to be blackened, and begged to be allowed the privilege of blacking them for him before he went to church. She even got down upon her knees to do this, and was greatly grieved when he absolutely refused.

Now it was precisely this kind of a service which Jesus performed for the disciples. Foot travelers in those dusty Eastern lands upon arriving at home, or at the house of a guest, had their sandals removed and the dry dust of the fields or streets washed from their feet by a servant. It is not likely that many of the disciples themselves had had this service done for them very often, for they were nearly all poor men, so the act of Jesus amazed them still more. But he insisted upon performing the service, even for impetuous Peter, who had at first refused.

Why did Jesus do this? The reason is very plain. He wanted to make his disciples feel the glory of service, the glory of helpfulness which springs from love. It was an illustration in act of his earnest words that the Son of Man had come not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and of his exhortation that the one who would be great must become the servant of all.

The question for every follower of Christ must be: "How many people can I help and how much can I help them?" One of the great distinctive wonders of Christ's message is his insistence that self must be forgotten. Self-will and self-esteem hinder and may altogether destroy our work. Pride, greed or hate ruin our usefulness. We must get the attitude of Jesus, eager to help. The ambition to get rich, the ambition for social rank, the ambition to be recognized as successful, even in religious work, these are low ambitions, incompatible with the spirit of Christ. "I am among you," he said, "as one that serveth." So must we be if we are to follow him.

Shall not we henceforth do two things: Determine that the whole motive and plan and program of our life shall be directed by the ambition to serve others in the name of Jesus, and then train ourselves for finding daily and hourly details in which we can so serve and help?

This lesson would be very incomplete unless a word were said about the necessity of having the heart changed and cleansed by the power and the blood of Jesus, before we can hope to have any success in keeping true to this heaven-high principle of lowly service. Only he can take out of our hearts the feelings and wishes which make us selfish and unwilling to help, which may lead us, if we are not careful, even to harm others. And only he can fill us with such love for himself and for others in his name that we shall delight in following him in paths of humiliation, of neglect, of discomfort, in order that others may be helped and cheered and saved.

Methodism in Europe*

SOME years ago I had the pleasure of attending an Epworth League convention at Frankfort, Germany. The same spirit which marks the Epworth League in America was present there. And the visits at the Methodist theological seminary at Frankfort and in the homes of some of the professors were full of delight. In the little town of Marburg I lived some time in the home of faithful Pastor Walz. I have never forgotten the sweet spirit of that German Methodist parsonage and the modest heroism of the good pastor, going about his work in that city and in outlying towns where he preached, bearing cheerfully, humbly and with a quiet song, the reproach which is still suffered in Germany by the people called "Methodists."

In Italy I visited the Methodist Building at Rome, getting a glimpse of the enthusiastic and successful work of Italian Methodists, stopping with my good friends, Rev. and Mrs. Adnah Leonard, and having the delightful experience of waking up in my pleasant room on the Quirinal Hill to the familiar strains of our old college fraternity whistle. Attention has been recently called to the new plans for the flourishing theological seminary, for which six acres at the southern end of historic Monte Mario, directly facing St. Peter's, has been purchased. There a Methodist college is to be erected "embodying the highest intellectual, moral and physical ideals." The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society conducts a school for girls on the Via Veneto. Dr. Walling Clark is now in charge of the Methodist work in Italy.

John P. Larsson, a Swedish sailor who was converted in New York, began the work of Methodism in Sweden, and as long ago as 1853 Rev. Olaf Peterson began the work in Norway. The real beginnings of Methodist Episcopal work in Europe were in 1849. In that year Rev. Ludwig Jacoby, who had been converted in America, returned to tell his friends in Germany about his new-found joy. The work was begun in Bremen. There are now two German Conferences, north and south, and a conference in Switzerland. In 1883 Methodism was established in Finland, and in 1892 was begun in Russia.

Many European Christians resented the idea of America sending "missionaries" to preach the Gospel to them. But our Scripture paragraphs indicate the reason for this work. The Continental churches there, to a large extent, lapsed into formalism, and the note of joy, confidence and triumph for which Methodism stands was a note which many people in Europe were hungry to hear. Then, too, particularly in Italy, where the Catholic Church has so long been dominant, it was necessary to take the message of the free and true salvation. Multitudes of thoughtful people, particularly the younger generation, were drifting away from the Catholic Church and far larger numbers thus would have lapsed into infidelity if it had not been for the work of the Methodists.

There are now on the continent of Europe 72,000 members and probationers in the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Try this easy way to clear your skin with

Resinol Soap

Bathe your face for several minutes with Resinol Soap and warm water, working the creamy lather into the skin gently with the finger-tips. Then wash off with more Resinol Soap and warm water, finishing with a dash of clear cold water to close the pores.

Do this once or twice a day, and you will be astonished how quickly the healing, antiseptic Resinol balsams soothe and cleanse the pores, remove pimples and blackheads, and leave the complexion clear, fresh and velvety. When the skin is in very bad condition, apply a little Resinol Ointment and let it remain on ten minutes before the final washing with Resinol Soap.

Resinol Soap costs but twenty-five cents at all druggists and dealers in toilet goods. For a guestroom size trial cake, with a miniature box of Resinol Ointment, write to Dept. 32-G, Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

Guiding Stars

STAR of Love! Beneath thy rays
We would journey ever;
Gladden thou our passing days,
Elevate endeavor.
By thine aid our path shall be
One that leads to victory.

Star of Promise! Send thy light
All the way to cheer us.
We are safe, though dark the night,
When our Lord is near us.
Star of Promise! Lend thine aid
When we're sinking, or afraid.

Star of Duty! Far above
All our selfish labors,
Add thy light to that of Love
For God and for our neighbors.
Star of Duty! Brightly glow;
Ever guide us here below.

Star of Hope! Thou givest joy!
Throw thy bright rays o'er us.
Spread thy light where clouds annoy,
Drive them all before us.
Go thou with us all the way,
Turn our darkness into day.

Star of Promise! Star of Love!
Stars of Hope and Duty!
Guiding light from heaven above,
Fill our earth with beauty.
Drive away whatever mars:
Brilliant galaxy of stars!

THINKS IT BETTER AS THE YEARS GO BY

I find THE CHRISTIAN HERALD more and more interesting and helpful to myself and family as the years go by, and would not willingly be without it. MRS. W. B. D.

Fayetteville, N. C.

A LITTLE ANGEL OF THE MOUNTAINS

"We'll take care of you in a minute," said the Doc viciously to the outlaw.

"No," said the boy feebly, "I want you to let him go."

"Good God!" exclaimed the desperado.

"Yes," whispered the lad, "he is good. Parson Bill, Old Four Eyes, Doc, Mrs. Morrison, where are you?"

"We're all here, son," said Old Four Eyes.

"Make them let him go. I forgive him."

"Well, I'm dashed," said the old man, as the boy closed his eyes again. "Here," he said, turning to Jackson, "git. Drop your we'pons, you men; turn him loose."

"Me no let him go," roared the Indian, his face dark with passion and revenge. "He shoot my mother."

His voice aroused little Olaf again. "I saved your life, Blue Wing," whispered the boy.

The Indian stopped, stared, lowered his weapon as the other three had done.

"Well, you're free," said Old Four Eyes.

"I'm a Christian," said Parson Bill, "from this day on, but don't you ever cross my path again, Jackson."

"Which also goes for the rest of us," added the Doc.

"My friends," said the bishop, "the wounded boy hath forgiven him as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven us."

"Do you all mean to tell me that I'm free?" asked Dead Shot Jackson in a sort of a daze. "That there ain't no charge agin' me? That I kin go?"

"What the boy says goes this mornin'," said Old Four Eyes. "He's the boss of this camp to-day."

"Thanks to the lad here," said Mr. Morrison, "that is the situation. You are free. Go in peace."

"I won't have it," said the man vehemently. "Whatever I am, I ain't no coward. I didn't mean to shoot the boy, but I done it an' I'm goin' to take the consequences of my action. I'm goin' to hunt up the United States marshal of this yere districk, an' give myself up to him an' tell him the whole story. I don't care what happens to me after this. I've got to the end of my string. I'll be known as a boy-killer to the end of my days." He threw up his hands. "You all kin come down an' bear witness agin' me at the trial." He turned away with lowered head in shame, in a very agony of humiliation, in fact.

"Here's your gun," said Old Four Eyes, handing him back his weapon.

Dead Shot Jackson took it by the barrel and threw it far down the cañon.

"I've had enough of it," he said. "I reckon it's too late for me ever to be decent, but at least I kin make amends."

"'Though your sins be as scarlet,'" said the little bishop, stepping nearer and laying his hand on the outlaw's shoulder, "'they shall be as white as snow. Though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool.'"

The desperado shook his head. He shook off the bishop's hand and stumbled down the trail. Two or three men started after him.

"The boy said he should go free," roared Parson Bill suddenly.

The men stopped. They watched the man go down the trail, his head hanging, his feet dragging after him, a burden on his back which every one could see. And farther down the trail they could see something else—two men galloping madly in the direction of Ravine City to fetch the doctor.

"I reckon we won't have no more services this mornin'," began Old Four Eyes. "Take the kid into the house an'—"

"Yes, you will," said little Olaf. "I want to hear the men sing and—"

"The services will go on if you're willin' to conduct 'em," said Old Four Eyes instantly to the bishop. "As I said, the kid's the boss of this camp."

"I shall be glad indeed," answered the bishop. "While some of you must stay with the lad—"

"I'll stay," said Parson Bill.

"And I," said Mr. Morrison.

"Oh, let me stay, too," said Mrs. Morrison.

"No," said the bishop gently, "we shall need you for the hymns."

So the little group separated in accordance with this designation. Little Olaf Tryggvesson, lying on the best bed, with Parson Bill holding his hand, with Mr. Morrison busily attentive to him and the little girls coming back and forth, anxious to be of service, or to learn the latest tidings, could not hear the bishop preaching a great sermon from the text, "These are they which came out of great tribulation and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb"; but he could hear the strains of the melodeon, the voices of the many men and the few women and children joining in the old familiar hymns. His soul was much comforted thereby.

His wound suddenly began to pain him terribly, but he gritted his little teeth together, and took comfort in the thought that what might have been a frightful and brutal affray had only resulted in his being shot. In his heart he rejoiced at the public testimony to Christ given by Old Four Eyes, the Doc, and the rest of the men. Yet the joy of these conversions was as nothing to the intense gladness and satisfaction with which he recalled that the leader of the army about to enlist in the service of the Lord was no less than his big, brave-hearted benefactor and friend, Parson Bill.

Those about him assured him he would get well; but in his boyish way he seemed to think that even if this had not been true, what had been gained would be well worth the price he might have had to pay—his life, the life of the lonely little orphan of the city, who had become the little angel of the camp—the light-bringer to Cañon Creek.

The New Detroiter

Literally and absolutely, the finest ideals of two continents have now been combined in one motor car,—the 1915 Detroiter. The result is a new type—the first pure European streamline to be produced this side of the Atlantic. The first actual high-speed, ball-bearing motor in this country. And all at a modest American price.

First Actual European Design

The DETROITER has always equalled the most expensive cars in type of chassis construction. It is the only car of its class with such features as long-stroke motor, full-floating rear axle, and platform rear spring. And now even the expensive cars must follow the Detroiter, to reach the new ideal of European design. The Detroiter has it first,—this exquisite perfection of curving lines and luxury of refinement.

A True "High-Speed" Motor

European motors won the four first places at the Indianapolis race this year. All these motors were ball-bearing. So is the Detroiter motor, the only motor of this type, to our knowledge, made in America. It is a high-speed motor of tremendous power and low gasoline consumption.

A red electric flash gives warning when the oil level drops too low. All recording instruments are combined in one unit. Every control is at your finger tips. The latest and best engineering genius of two continents is found in the new Detroiter.

This is the car that first got clear of the rut of commonplace design. Mark it as the leader of the coming type—the biggest advance ever made at one stride in the history of American automobile construction.

Other models without starters, $850 to $925

Keeps Quality Up and Price Down

Double Value in Firestone Volume

The big difference in quality between Firestones and ordinary tires would make Firestones cost much more under ordinary conditions.

But Firestone conditions are not ordinary.

The picked experts of the tire making industry build Firestone tires.

The largest exclusive tire factory in America produces Firestone tires.

The most efficient distributing system in America markets Firestone tires.

That's why these tires have the quality and endurance to beat all the tires of the world—and still come to you at the price of the ordinary kind.

The Ingersoll

DOLLAR WATCH

Year after year, the buying power of the dollar has decreased. Year after year, the prices of most standard commodities have increased. The Ingersoll is one of few exceptions.

The brain that was responsible for the first Ingersoll Dollar Watch has worked all these years to make the Ingersoll a still greater dollar's worth. Every year has seen the Ingersoll thinner, finer, more elegantly finished, more expensive to make—but still sold at the same price.

Only an article that has the confidence of the public, the widespread reputation and tremendous demand of the Ingersoll, can tell the same story. See for yourself how much your dollar buys in an Ingersoll.

The five leading Ingersoll models are:—

The IDEAL CAR for COUNTRY or CITY Use

In officially conducted long-distance tours and hill-climbing contests, the METZ "22" has repeatedly won against a field including 90-horse-power racing models and other cars costing from five to ten times the price of the METZ.

It won the last Glidden Tour, with a perfect score.

It won a perfect score in the Australian "Reliability Trials."

It won the second event in the three-mile hill-climb at Uniontown, Pa., on June 18.

It won both the Class "A" and the Free-for-All events in the hill-climb at Richfield Springs, N. Y., on the Fourth of July.

These and many other similar performances demonstrate conclusively that it is not necessary to pay an excessive price in order to secure a strictly first-class and absolutely reliable car.

The METZ is ALL QUALITY.

HUDSON Six-40—This Year $1,550

New-Day Refinements

Which Now Mark the Quality Car

The HUDSON Six-40 for 1915 is a very fine example of the latter-day car. You should see it at once—all you men who watch advances in car building.

It marks the fruition of countless hopes, shared by owners and designers. And last year's model proved this type to be the coming car. Its popularity compels us this year to build three times as many.

No More Over-Tax

Men have come to rebel at excesses in cars. Not in price alone, but in upkeep, in operative cost, in weight. This new Hudson Six-40, in all ways, offers ideal relief.

First, in modest size. The wheelbase is 123 inches, yet no one is crowded. Not even when the car is carrying seven with the extra tonneau seats. What need is there for a larger car, unless it better meets your idea of impressiveness?

Next, in modest power. This motor shows 47 horsepower. That's ample, unless a car has excess weight or size.

Next, in lightness. This new HUDSON Six-40 weighs 2,890 pounds. That's 1,000 pounds less than former averages for cars of this capacity. Yet last year proved this lightweight Six one of the sturdiest cars on the road. Skillful designing and better materials account for this record lightness.

Next, in operative cost. This new-type motor—a small-bore Six en bloc—reduces fuel cost immensely. The lightness saves on tire cost. In these two items we save you fully 30 per cent.

New-Day Comforts

Here are also attractions which make old-time cars seem crude and inartistic. The body is a perfect streamline. The finish is superb. The seats are high-backed, wide, luxurious.

Here is new weight distribution. No extra tires, no gasoline tank to overload rear wheels. Here are many new ideas in equipment.

During all last year the 48 HUDSON engineers worked on nothing but refinements. Every part and detail now shows their final touch. You will revel in the beauties of this car.

The New-Day Price

This exquisite car—the finest model that we ever built—sells for $1,550 this year, f. o. b. Detroit. Last season's price was $1,750, and that was the year's sensation. We are saving $200 now by building three times as many.

In your old ideas, $1,550 meant a low-grade car. Not a six on the market three years ago cost less than twice that price. Not a quality car of any type sold anywhere near so low.

Now that price buys the finest HUDSON model. It buys the latest production of Howard E. Coffin and his famous corps of engineers.

It buys a car whose very lightness denotes the costliest materials and the ablest designing.

The car shows its quality. Every detail proves it. You will see no chance to better any feature in it. The price simply shows how HUDSON efficiency has brought down high-grade costs.

Our Lucky Car

We are frank to say that this car's excellence is partly due to luck. The perfect balance, for instance—the hardest thing to attain. Mr. Coffin's great skill has been helped by good fortune.

But the result is a car which we regard as the top-notch car of the times, and you'll agree with us, we think.

We don't argue Sixes these days. They have proved themselves, and won. Continuous power is a matter of course in practically every quality car.

But note what a revolution we have wrought with a Hudson Six, with seats for seven passengers. You never expected that price, even in a high-grade Four.

Hudson dealers are everywhere. So see this model car. Catalog on request.

THE WAR IN EUROPE

THE news summary last week closed with August 3. For the succeeding week, ending August 10, events were largely of a preparatory character. At the opening of the week the situation, briefly stated, was as follows: Austria-Hungary had declared and begun war upon Servia, ad taken Belgrade, reports said, and then had suspended activities pending evelopments between Germany and Russia. Russia was mobiliz- ng her armies on the Austrian and German frontiers in behalf of ervia, ostensibly, and Germany, as Austria's ally, was mobilizing o resist Russia on the one hand and attack (or resist) France on he other. France was preparing to resist German invasion, and ngland, the ally of Russia and France in the Triple Entente, was waiting the result of her warnings to Germany that that country nust not violate the neutrality of Belgium (in order to get at rance). Italy, ally of Germany and Austria in the Triple Alli- nce, had maintained neutrality. In business and diplomatic cir- les war conditions controlled; stock exchanges were universally losed, steamship traffic was practically at a standstill, thousands f tourists were penned up in Europe. The plunge into a general war among the great Powers seemed to wait only upon positive ction by England.

At the close of the week ending Monday, August 10, the situation as given by news received from reliable sources is as follows: Austria, who struck the first blow, apparently has diverted her orces from Servia to protect her Russian frontier, and assist ermany. Russia is engaging the German troops on Prussian soil. erman armies have been checked at Liège, Belgium, in their march to the rench frontier, the Belgians unexpectedly maintaining a successful resistance to the German advance, the latter sustaining losses variously estimated at from five to twenty-five thousand. (All news concerning the battles about Liège are strictly censored.) A strong force of French soldiers has united with the Belgians, and French soldiers also occupy parts of Alsace. England and Germany have declared war, and a body of 20,000 British troops was reported as having landed in France, preparatory to forming a union with the Belgian and French armies at Liège. Italy is maintaining neutrality despite the menacing attitude of Austria and Germany, who are said to threaten war on Italy if that country persists in refusing support. Reports of severe battles have not been confirmed. Outside actual war maneuvers conditions are not materially changed; the stock exchanges remain closed, business wholly unsettled, ocean traffic demoralized, and all the countries of the world in a state of agitation. Food prices in America have begun to rise, and business generally is trying to readjust itself to new conditions. President Wilson has tendered his mediatory services to the warring Powers. In a word, Europe has drawn closer to the verge of a general war, and the whole world is in a state of anxious suspense.

VON TIRPITZ
German Admiral

The public, especially on this side of the Atlantic, is at great disadvantage in learning just what is happening in Europe at this time. Direct cable communication with Germany was cut off by English naval vessels August 5, since when all news from that country has come by way of England or France, where, as in the case of all other news, it has been closely censored by the military authorities. Human nature in war times cannot resist the temptation to magnify one's own successes and the reverses of the enemy. Furthermore, at this stage of so grave a break among neighbor nations, frankness with the public cannot be expected. For these and other reasons the news of the war must for a while be classified as either probably true or unconfirmed. Very little can be set down as settled facts. A noteworthy example of this is the news respecting Austria's invasion of Servia. Although Belgrade was reported as having been taken with little resistance, and again as taken only after the most desperate fighting, it is not now certain that the capital of Servia has been taken at all.

To resume: Austria menacing Servia; Russia's forces advancing into Germany; German soldiers into Russia; German and French armies moving to face each other at the Belgian frontier of France; Italy arming; casual engagements occurring on land, at sea, in the air, between small units of the warring nations; Belgium's king appealing to England to aid her against the threatened advance of German troops across her territory; England warning Germany, and mobilizing. Thus, at the close of August 2.

On August 3, Sir Edward Grey, British foreign minister, announced in the House of Commons that if the German fleet attacked the French coast, England would go to the aid of her ally. Immense enthusiasm greeted the statement. John Burns, Labor leader, in protest against war by England, resigned from the cabinet. On the same date German troops captured three Russian-Poland cities, and her fleet in the Baltic forced Russian warships to seek refuge. North German Lloyd liner Kronprinz Wilhelm unexpectedly left her Hoboken berth at night, under orders from the Kaiser, it was said, and headed south, burning only legal lights. The Russian ambassador was dismissed from Berlin. President Wilson called upon nation to preserve calm. House passed a bill designed to admit foreign-built ships over five years old to American registry. German liner Kronprinzessin Cecilie, carrying over $10,000,000 in gold, reported as seeking to reach a German port by a secret route, to avoid capture. Americans abroad becoming panic-stricken. Various reports, wholly unconfirmed, of aerial battles and sea engagements.

At seven o'clock P.M. August 4, Germany declared war on Great Britain, and at eleven P.M. Great Britain declared war on Germany. More than a half million men were reported as under arms in England; the House of Commons voted $525,000,000 for emergencies. A state of war was formally declared between France and Germany. The Cecilie arrived at Bar Harbor, Me., seeking protection of American waters; told of chase by British cruisers. German battleship Goeben reported captured in the Mediterranean, but later the report turned out untrue. Congress considered ways and means for helping Americans stranded abroad. President Wilson issued a proclamation of neutrality. Rumors persisted of a great naval battle in the North Sea between British and German fleets.

On August 5, following a long cabinet meeting, President Wilson offered his services as mediator to the Emperor of Austria-Hungary, the Emperor of Germany, the King of Great Britain, the Emperor of Russia, and the President of France in the following cablegram sent through our ambassadors: "As official head of one of the Powers signatory to the Hague Convention, I feel it to be my privilege and my duty, under Article 3 of that convention, to say to you in a spirit of most earnest friendship that I should welcome an opportunity to act in the interest of European peace, either now or at any other time that might be thought more suitable, as an occasion to serve you and all concerned in a way that would afford me lasting cause for gratitude and happiness. (Signed) Woodrow Wilson." On the same day Congress voted $2,500,000 for the relief of Americans abroad and the President signed the bill, the money to be in the nature of an advance to be repaid by citizens thus aided. In Paris and in London the thousands of Americans who have been caught by the shutting off of transportation facilities formed temporary organizations for mutual advice and help, and were able to lessen the hardship of their unique position.

The press of August 6 and 7 flamed with accounts of a great naval engagement in the North Sea, the British flotilla driving the German fleet toward the Dutch coast, and clearing the North Sea of the enemy. British shore stations were advised by wireless to prepare to receive wounded and prisoners. One British vessel was reported sunk in the engagement. The press of August 8 reduced the story to the sinking of the British cruiser Amphion by contact with a mine, after sinking the German vessel Koenigin Luise, which laid the mines. Lord Kitchener, regarded in England as the one man for the position, was appointed Secretary of State for War August 5. Food prices continued advancing in England, and the treasury provided for the issue of gold notes of small denominations.

The censored reports of the assault upon Liege gave the victory to the Belgians and alleged heavy losses among the Germans. On August 5 the German Crown Prince was expected to arrive any hour at the head of 30,000 troops. Censored reports from Berlin, by way of London, gave the honors of war to the German forces. In France, amid great enthusiasm, war bills were passed by the Deputies. The prospect of meeting Germany on the field of battle was the one theme with the public. The recovery of Alsace-Lorraine became the paramount issue of the war in Fra

The strictest kind of censorship was imposed on all information. Italy,

On August 7 leaders of Congress in Washington discussed the probability a war tax in this country to provide for an estimated deficit of $100,000,0

GERMAN SAILORS RETURNING TO THEIR SHIPS

The war news of August 9-included the invasion of Alsace in force by the French, and their capture three or four small villages. This initial success caused intense emoti

OFFICERS OF FAMOUS RUSSIAN COSSACKS HAVING LIGHT REFRESHMENTS

WITH OUR MARINES ON OUTPOST

MY FIRST acquaintance with the United States marines came at night, when a subaltern officer took me for a ride around the picket lines at El Tejar. It was on e extreme outpost where the vigilant guard was ounted. Beyond them a lonely sentry stood out ainst the white of the roadway, his bayonet glisning in the moonlight. As my guide told me of e Mexicans encamped along that roadway in the rkness, I realized that this lonely sentry was deed the last outpost of "watchful waiting." He as the nation's farthest ward. At this thought, s glistening bayonet came a real and rilling thing, and in hat bold and solitary an-at-arms I saw merica on guard.

The United States arine Corps is rearded by many as the ost efficient fighting rce in the American ervice. The wonderul thing about this rps is its versatility. he marines are "solers and sailors too," qually at home on land sea. On the outosts at El Tejar I ound them performing he duties of infantry, avalry, artillery and ngineers. The peronnel of the marines alone worthy of a pecial article. The ank and file of enisted men represent he best of America's young manhood. Most of em have had a high school education and some old university degrees.

Sergeant Major Quick is a type of the finest of e corps. During the war in Cuba, the marines, hrough a blunder, were subjected to a deadly fire om their own ships. John Quick stood up in the enches, exposing himself to the guns of his own ips and those of the enemy, and calmly spelled out the American fleet the signal "Cease firing." For his act of valor he was awarded a medal of honor. his brave, mild sergeant major is a great force or righteousness among his men. He never told me imself that he was a Christian.

I cannot refrain from mentioning a young chap ho fights in the non-combatant arm of the service; nd he does fight, even though my phrase may sound nomalous. His name is W. W. Elder, secretary at e marine barracks in Brooklyn. He was assigned his post by the Army and Navy Department of e Young Men's Christian Association when the arines were called out, and he has been in many arts of the world with the corps. Sergeant Major uick said of this young sky-pilot:

"You can't see any difference between him and the est of the boys. He wears the same uniform, and is just as brown and soldier-looking. He accompanies us on the march, eats at our mess, and plays on the regimental baseball team. That's how he gets such a grip on the fellows."

In spite of the sergeant's description, I was somewhat surprised when I first met Elder, a swarthy, thick-set young chap with the jaw and eye of a boxer. His appearance clearly demonstrated to me that he was far removed from what Kipling would call a "plaster saint." I found myself congratulating the Young Men's Christian Association on obtaining such a concrete example of a man's religion. Down here in the feverish heat of Vera Cruz, the soldiers and journalists alike have reached the exasperation point; but this young Y. M. C. A. representative still wears a smile that is contagious. I hope that many another sky-pilot of his type may be drafted into the service of the forces.

Vera Cruz, July 4, 1914. ARTHUR HUNT CHUTE.

MOVING PICTURES BEING SHOWN BY Y. M. C. A. WORKERS TO 2,500 UNITED STATES SOLDIERS

EVER since the Spanish-American War a strong, sane, constructive Christian work has been conducted for the men of the United States army and navy by the Young Men's Christian Association in its Army and Navy Department, as it has come to be known. Trained secretaries are sent by land and sea to do their work and live their lives with soldiers, sailors and marines. So it was that when our forces were ordered to move on Vera Cruz, W. W. Elder, who for months had been following the fortunes of the marines from Pensacola to Culebra, then back to Pensacola again, wired in to headquarters: "Marines ordered to Vera Cruz. I am ready to go. Waiting orders." He went. So helpful had the work of the association been at one great maneuver camp that Colonel Berry, commanding the Fourth Field Artillery, sent a most urgent appeal asking that association workers might go to Vera Cruz with the army. So along with the artillerymen and their death-dealing guns went H. W. Chaffee equipped to fight the great battle for men's souls. Along with the cases of shell and shrapnel that were loaded on the transport, there went a 60x90 tent, a portable electric light plant for illumination and the projection of motion pictures, scores of sets of chess, checkers, dominoes and other games. There were hundreds of pounds of magazines and thousands of sheets of stationery, and there were Bibles too—all to be furnished free to the men. But best of all there was the man himself, leaving his home and family and country to go down and live beside the men of his regiments and be a friend to them.

Association headquarters is the brightest spot in camp; so much sought after, the regimental commanders ordered that each night the companies be formed, roll called and the men marched to the tent to enjoy the evening, then they form again, answer to roll-call and march back to their tents. Elder found quarters for a time in a box-car which was shunted from place to place as the brigade was shifted.

Colonel John Lejeune took possession of a railway roundhouse and turned it over to Elder as a place for his motion-picture shows. Likewise a machine shop was designated as a reading, writing and recreation room, and with these as a base Elder was as happy as a king until his tent arrived.

But the work of these secretaries does not end with running motion-picture shows, issuing free stationery and reading matter, dispensing good cheer, visiting the sick and wounded and prisoners, conducting a savings bank and acting as interpreters; for on Sunday the bugles sound the church call, and the secretaries speak the messages to throngs of armed men. After the "day's work," the secretaries, weary in body and soul, heartsick and homesick, get together for a "quiet hour" and lift their petition for strength from Him.

And this is why throughout the army and navy there are over 12,000 men who belong to the Enlisted Men's Bible and Prayer League, pledged to daily Bible study and prayer, and such work as this is the reason for an attendance of over 40,000 enlisted men at Bible classes, and through the influence of the lives of many army and navy secretaries there are men to-day who formerly were of the service, honoring the professions or other walks of life into which they have entered.

SARAH PERKINS AND THE MONEY TRUST

BY LEAVITT ASHLEY KNIGHT

The Session at the Hague

LORD RIGGLESTON frowned over his yellow glasses. Lord Riggleston was angry at his audience. The fourteen distinguished representatives of the most powerful nations of the world, sitting in the semi-circle of deep oaken armchairs before him, were not listening with that degree of attention and respect which are due the most brilliant diplomatic mind of the British Republic in the very moment when this mind is uttering itself upon the most solemn and far-reaching international question of the twenty-third century.

Here they were, summoned from three continents to this extraordinary session at The Hague, to decide what the world should do about the sinister outcome of the Eighth Balkan War. At last the Cossacks had crossed the Danube, under the guise of restoring peace where war had reigned spasmodically for two hundred years. At last the moody moujiks from the steppes of Kirghiz were grinning from their new garrisons over the Adriatic. The ancient balance of power in Europe had been upset. Austria and Italy were in wild panic. Sober Englishmen were saying, in the privacy of their hawthorned country houses, that Asia Minor would fall into the grip of the gluttonous Romanoffs next—"and after that, Suez!"

Five days through, five nights through, the British foreign office kept its officials at their desks, kept the wireless operators racing in relays at their keys, kept the potentates of the world awake thinking, opining, promising, conjecturing over the threatened peace of the nations. And, at last, Lord Riggleston, first secretary of the foreign office, had wheedled, bullied, and inspired the six most powerful countries to join Great Britain in a special conference under the auspices of the Hague Tribunal.

Each country sent two representatives. From England the mighty Riggleston himself and the Speaker of the House of Commons. From France, that marvelous thinking machine, Senator Rocassin and Murquet, the sparkling leader of the Deputies. From Germany, President Scheer's right-hand man, Hermann Fuchs, secretary of the treasury, who had devised the scheme for blocking the war which the South American Empire of Bismarckia had begun against the Fatherland. From the United States, Senator Harms of New Mexico and—

Lord Riggleston glared at Senator Harms, and for a minute the friendship of the two mighty English-speaking nations hung perilously in the balance. Lord Riggleston paused in the midst of a soaring paragraph, paused most unrhetorically, thrust his papers aside, removed his yellow glasses, and said with exquisite sarcasm: "I fear that my dull remarks have bored our American friends. Russia does not interest them. They lie safe between two oceans, far beyond the hungry reach of the Romanoffs. But I think the rest of us ought to take the problem before us pretty seriously."

Delegate Fuchs politely nudged Senator Harms. The senator was whispering into the ear of his American colleague, quite loudly and continuously in fact. And the colleague had been whispering back. The senator looked up at Lord Riggleston, reddened, and mumbled: "I beg pardon. Miss Perkins made a comment on that last point you argued. A most acute comment, sir! I believe she's right about it, and you're wrong. But pray go on! I'll not offend again—"

"I think," Lord Riggleston choked slightly, "that perhaps I had better yield the floor to the junior American delegate. She has doubtless given more earnest attention to the Russian question than I have—"

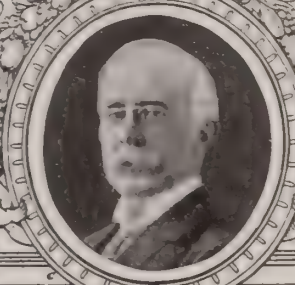
LIKE EAGLES

"So that thy youth is renewed like the eagle's." Ps. 103: 5



A SERMON

BY

REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

I AM told that this psalm used to be read once every day in the family worship of John Angell James. At morning or at evening it provided expressions for their praise. When his wife died, he was asked on the following morning if the psalm should be read as the appointed lesson. "Yes," he replied, "it is as full of comfort as of thanksgiving." And so it is. It seems to me as though in its wide outlook it comprehends all the varied needs of men. If I want a vehicle for my praise I find it here. If I want heartening in my distresses I find it here. If I am imprisoned in immediate circumstances, and am in need of elevation, I find the inspiration here. And I have chosen for our meditation to-night one of the small parts of the gracious evangel which fills the psalm from end to end. "So that thy youth is renewed like the eagle's."

"Like the eagle." I think it is helpful to contrast this figure with the figures used in the previous psalm. There we have a psalmist upon whom the renewing ministry has not yet been wrought, and he lies prone in the grip of a deep depression. "I am like a pelican of the wilderness"; this is the very figure of gloom and desolation. "I am like an owl of the desert"; he finds a fitting symbol in the bird which dwells among the ruins, and which finds no comfort in the light of day.

> Save that from yonder ivy-mantled tower
> The moping owl doth to the moon complain.

And yet a third figure is used by this melancholy singer: "I am like a sparrow alone on the housetop." In his loneliness he finds a suitable emblem in the bird which has lost its mate or its young, and which abides on the housetop silent, lonely, and desolate. Now, turn away from these dark and dismal figures to the one of my text. The man who had felt himself like a pelican, and like an owl, and like the bereaved sparrow, now feels like an eagle! And, as an old Puritan commentator quaintly says: "To grow from a sparrow to an eagle, to leave the wilderness of the pelican to mount among the stars, is enough to make any man cry 'Bless the Lord, O my soul!'"

The Majestic Life

Now, my text makes the inspiring declaration that the eagle type of life is the divinely purposed possession of every man. Men and women who are in covenant with the Almighty will not appear to the world to be kinsmen of the owl and the pelican. They will rather be significant of the eagle. The eagle is, perhaps, our most majestic bird; even to see it in captivity is to behold a creature of splendid and royal build. This is the bird which is to typify the life that is in communion with God. Our life is to be magnificent; we are to "bring unto the Lord glory and strength." Let me mention one or two characteristics which will mark the life that finds its symbol in this splendid bird.

First of all, the life will be eagle-winged. There is nothing more striking about the eagle than its mighty power of wing. The bird can soar away into uplifted mountain vastnesses, and far beyond the highest summit it can mount into the glorious blue. "They shall mount up with wings as eagles!" And our life is never completed, and we have never really come to our own, until we are in possession of these wings. In Tennyson's description of the sculpture which adorned the walls of Merlin's Hall, he tells us there were four zones, and each zone represented a particular stage of human growth. On the lowest "beasts were slaying men," on the second zone "men were slaying beasts," on the third zone were "warriors, perfect men," on the highest zone were "men with growing wings." It is that wing power which marks the maturity of our life, and by which we enter into our splendid destiny.

Rising to "Heavenly Places"

Now, this wing power is just the ability to rise above our circumstances, and to soar into the "heavenly places" in Christ. We are all familiar with men and women who never get above their immediate surroundings. Such experiences have been the lot of all of us. Our immediate surroundings become our prisons, and we sit down and mope in the midst of our captivity. Life with God is life with the eagle wing; in the strength of that wing we can rise above our prison house into the purer, larger air of the Spirit. I can rise above my temptations. When snares are crowding round me, and when the enemy comes quite near, it is purposed that I should just "take wings" and find myself far above them. "Flee as a bird to your mountain!" We make a great mistake when we confront every temptation in the attitude of fight. Most of our temptations could be conquered by quietly rising into a higher sphere.

Rising Above Care and Sorrow

And we can rise above our sorrows. It is not the Lord's will that we should sit among them like moping owls, and fill the night with our hootings. It is the Lord's will that we should get above our grief, and such elevation requires the ministry of wings. And so it is with our worries and cares. Too many of us just creep and crawl, or we sit among them in cold complaint. Our destined inheritance is the heights. We sometimes counsel our brother, when he has told us some tale of difficulty or woe, to "rise above it." But what if he is only endowed with feet, and has not yet put in a claim for the gift of wings? It is the eagle's wings we want. And therefore we were not altogether wrong in our childhood in singing that we wanted to be angels, if by the prayer we meant to obtain the gift of soaring in the altitudes with God. "With twain they did fly." These wings are the gracious gift of the Lord, and they are the purposed possession of every man. "Give me the wings of faith to rise!"

And life in God will not only be eagle-winged but eagle-eyed. What a piercing, wide-casting eye is the dowry of the eagle! When we want a suitable figure to express our conception of Gladstone's eye, or a Kingsley's eye, or an Emerson's eye, we go to the eagle for it. And this eagle vision is to be the gift of every soul which is in sacred covenant with God. But how this book bemoans our feeble ey "Your eyes are dim." "Ye cannot discern." "Ey have ye but ye see not." "Ye are blind." But t book not only indicts us for our short and impe fect sight; it offers us the gift of splendid visio If we had the eagle eye two things would happe First of all, we should discern the significance the immediate. We should look at the appare trifle and see right through it; we should foreca its issues in coming years. If we hear that a mi sionary in Almora has got her first convert, o eyes will gaze right through the commonplace fa to the consequent glory of the coming days. O trifles will be linked with the Infinite. But, se ondly, we should have a sensitive discernment the remote. We should be the first to see the litt cloud on the horizon which betokens the comin rain. We should be the first to catch the fai dawning which is the herald of the coming da No one would be before us. With the eagle eye should get the first glimpses of the coming of t kingdom.

The Ministry of Renewal

Now, how are these gifts of the eagle wing an the eagle eye to be obtained? They are to becon ours by the ministry of renewal. God will so r fashion us that in our recovered strength we sha be like the eagle. The words which immediate precede my text describe to us two of the ways i which this renewal is to be effected. We are to b made young by the repair of diseased tissue. "H healeth all thy diseases." The gracious Lord wi lay hold of powers upon which decay has fastene and he will renew the dead matter and make sound again. "God by his mercies recovers h people from their decays." Decay so easily sets i Our highest powers so speedily become destroye As we grow older our sympathies are apt to shrive and love is apt to wither, and hope loses its youthf strength. Our Lord will defend us against th peril, and the deadening tissue shall be made aliv again. And, secondly, he will feed the sound tissu "He satisfieth thy mouth with good things." H will remove the disease, and he will provide suitab nutriment to sustain the powers he hath renewe And the nutriment will satisfy, and we shall hav no restless and tired cravings. Is there anythin which keeps old age young better than a satisfie spirit? It is discontent that makes the wrinkl Contentment retains the fair face of our childhoo And these renewals are to be effected daily. The is to be no chance of the disease going too far befo the healing ministry begins. "Our inner man renewed day by day."

And so in our spirits our youth can be recalle and in strength of wing and power of eye we can b like the eagle. In old age we can have daily su prises, as we make daily discoveries of "the u searchable riches of Christ." The whole secret the renewal so far as we are concerned is just here we must "wait upon the Lord." "They that wa upon the Lord shall renew their strength." It for us to do the waiting, the communion; God wi work the miracle. We may go into the Lord's pre ence like pelicans and owls, and we may emerg like eagles.

WITH THE NEW YORK EVANGELISTIC COMMITTEE

THE summer campaign of 1914 of the Evangelistic Committee of New York City will become a record breaker in the history of its ten years' existence, and the season opened with a great campaign of advertising. Free space has been given in the subway trains, the elevated and surface cars, and one hundred thousand, advertising the meetings, have been distributed to the great crowds in every hotel in the city.

Up to last May there have been held this year 997 meetings, in 121 cities, in open squares, with an aggregate attendance of 116,500 people; of these 104,000 were adults, and 12,500 were children. About 1100 people are employed, and a small army of volunteers. The nationalities represented are English, German, French, Swiss, Bohemian, Spanish, Chinese, Slovak, Hungarian and Swedish.

THERE IS AN INCREASING demand made by laymen for tents to be located in sections of the city which have been growing rapidly, with a view of bringing together the churches and the people of the communities, and co-operation of churches of all denominations throughout Manhattan and the Bronx has been even more general and cordial than any previous year.

MR. CHARLES A. BARRY, secretary of the committee, says: "We are having more conversions this season and running into greater need than ever before. There are more men out of work, and they stroll into our meetings. We have a larger work than ever in the history of our committee. We are almost running an employment bureau—trying to do practical work and not alone preaching to men's souls." Mr. Barry has written the hymn of the year "New York for Christ."

THE EVANGELISTIC COMMITTEE is sending out thousands of "follow-up" cards and has 900 inquiries. In each case a visitor is sent to locate the signer of the card, and every effort is made to better the signers' spiritual and material condition with the ultimate purpose of drawing them into the churches. Positions are obtained when possible. Miss Florence M. Thompson, who has charge of this branch, said: "We have gotten many men in recently who have been ten years out of the church. Many I meet are of the street class; dozens sign 'no home,' and I must visit them in the parks. A cocaine fiend has just been converted. We have upwards of three hundred cards of conversions."

JOHN STUART HOLDEN, the leading evangelistic preacher the established church of England, is on this summer's progra He preaches Sunday mornings in St. Bartholomew Churc and Sunday evening at Carnegie Hall, under the auspices the Northfield Bible Conference and Evangelistic Committe It is free to the public; no collections are taken up at any the meetings.

A NEW FEATURE OF THE summer campaign is called t Junior Auxiliary of the Evangelistic Committee, conducted Miss Ruth G. Winants, an attractive young society girl who in touch with the wealthy families of New York. "We belie the way to reach the child is through the child," said Mi Winants. "We desire to reach what we call 'Children of A vantage.' These boys and girls are asked not only to suppo children's work and become members, but to help in the wo and send flowers. On Washington Heights recently one litt girl sent a huge box of two hundred rambler roses. There we four hundred children, so tiny flags were purchased and giv

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, August 23. Matthew 10: 21, 22. "And the brother shall deliver up the brother to death, and the father the child. . . . And ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake: but he that endureth to the end shall be saved." Dissensions on religious questions cannot be kept out of our domestic relations. Cruel as this fact may appear, our believing hearts will accept even this distress as a divine dispensation meant for our good. It is always painful to suffer for no cause except for one's love of truth and right, but it is doubly painful when such suffering is inflicted by those whom we cherish as our dearest friends on earth. This great sorrow will not be spared the consistent believer. Conditions will arise where he cannot help offending parents or brothers and sisters, if he wishes to remain true to Christ. His faith, his whole life, will become a standing provocation to his family. He will become an object of hatred to all men, and hatred may put out the feeble flame of natural affection in the hearts of his relatives. They may desire his destruction and help bring it about. Did not this very thing happen often enough in the history of God's children? But let the Christian who comes into such an unfortunate situation not become dismayed. The Lord urges perseverance and promises a glorious issue out of all these heart-breaking troubles. The peace of the heavenly home will taste all the sweeter to the Christian who was not allowed any peace in his earthly home. When father and mother forsake us, then the Lord will take us up.

MONDAY, August 24. Matthew 10: 23. "But when they persecute you in this city, flee ye into another: for verily I say unto you, Ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel, till the Son of man be come." The work of evangelizing is to go on in spite of persecutions. While our Lord has declared the disciples' martyrdom a thing surely to be expected and not to be avoided when it is forced upon them, he does not want them to sacrifice themselves needlessly and prematurely. They must not go in quest of the martyr's crown. He has much work for them to do. There are other places in need of the Gospel. And they may, without prejudice to the genuineness of their faith, seek to escape danger to their lives in one place, in order to carry on the Lord's work in another. Even the scourge of persecution must serve the ends of the Gospel: the enemies of Christ unwittingly whip the servants of Christ on to new tasks. They may disperse a community of Christians, and thereby scatter the seeds of life in all directions. The saving Gospel would not have been carried so speedily from country to country had there not been pursuers on the heels of the evangelists. Until the Lord's return this work will go on. There will still be cities of Israel to which the word of the Messiah is to be brought when he comes.

TUESDAY, August 25. Matthew 10: 24, 25. "The disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his lord. . . . If they have called the master of the house Beelzebub, how much more shall they call them of his household?" One comforting thought to an innocent sufferer is the observation that he has companions in misery more righteous, nobler, and better than himself. The humble private who is fleeing with the general of his army, and who spends days and weeks of privation in a cave in the forest, regards himself highly honored and counts himself happy for being permitted to share the misfortunes of his leader. The faithful valet rejoices to go into exile with his dethroned king. The presence of his Lord in his affliction is to him a constant reminder of the comforting fact that he is suffering, not for personal wrong-doing, but for a righteous cause. For him, a humble follower of that cause, to be in better circumstances than the Leader, would seem not only a strange contradiction but a disgraceful unfairness. He would blush for shame if the men who had pressed on the brow of his Master a cruel crown of thorns should deck him, the servant, with a garland of roses; if the same people who had reprobated his Lord should hail his humble follower as an angel of God.

WEDNESDAY, August 26. Matthew 10: 28. "And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both body and soul in hell." It is as if the Lord were preparing his beloved disciples for their final homegoing. Death may meet them while they are engaged in the discharge of their ministry, and it may come to them as an alternative for denial of their Lord. Their trials for having preached the Gospel of Christ may end in a sentence of death, if they will not abjure their faith. Now, the Lord tells them that they should choose to pass through the brief moment of death in order that they may live forever, rather than prolong their lives a few years in order to die eternally. Natural death indeed has terrors to the Christian, as far as he is still in the flesh; but these terrors are ended and are overcome by faith in the life everlasting. Tyrants can only destroy the physical life. By the brief spasm and pain of the final agony, believers pass into the joy that has no end and the glory incorruptible. But the few years which a renegade buys at the price of a guilty conscience are a miserable existence here, and lead to endless perdition hereafter.

THURSDAY, August 27. Matthew 10: 29-31. "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father. But the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear ye not therefore, ye are of more value than many sparrows." "This is all very well," a disciple might have said in answer to the remarks of our Lord in the foregoing text, "but what assurance have I that God takes notice of my death? I am a drop in the ocean of humanity; who will miss me? My life slips away as a vapor vanishes into boundless space; who will direct its passage?" "Do not speak thus," the Lord replies. "You have seen the strings of birds that fowlers offer for sale on our markets, two for a farthing, or twice that many, with one thrown in for good measure, for two farthings. Your Father took notice of the brief gasp that stopped their little fluttering hearts. You are infinitely more precious in his sight, because he is your Father and you are his children. If you will only realize the sublime relationship into which you have entered by faith in his Son, you need never feel the fear of death. You are of more value than many sparrows. Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints."

FRIDAY, August 28. Matthew 10: 32, 33. "Whosoever therefore shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven. But whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven." This text shows the main thought that has been back of the long series of directions which our Lord has given his disciples for their work as preachers of his Word. Confessing him the Son of God incarnate and the Redeemer of the world, the sinner's Advocate with the Father—confessing him by word of mouth and by a walk worthy of the Gospel and of the Lord whom they follow—that is what he has wanted to place before them as their supreme duty. There is danger aplenty that they may omit this duty from fear of men or distrust of their own ability. They may conclude that it is best if they go hiding or shut up their convictions in their own heart. But by so doing they would make the mistake of their lives. Men may reject their testimony; God will accept it. Men may cheer them for their denial of Christ; God will denounce them for it. Christ pledges his word to his witnesses that their testimony shall not be forgotten in all eternity. Before the throne of glory he will acknowledge them to have been honest spokesmen in behalf of his cause. He will be a faithful witness to them; heaven's host shall hear his testimony in their behalf, and the new Jerusalem shall ring with applause. But he will also remember the faithless servants who have belied his name by their words and actions. They shall hear a terrible sentence out of heaven, and the entire congregation of the first-born shall seal it with their Amen.

SATURDAY, August 29. Matthew 10: 37. "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me: and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me." A beautiful spectacle is parental and filial love and devotion. God himself, who made the heart of man, has planted in us the natural affections, and governs them by his law. Wherever such love is genuine, it is exerted in accordance with the will of God. No person, however, can regard his father or mother or son or daughter as he regards his Redeemer and Lord. The deepest affection a Christian can cherish is reserved for the Lord who loved him and gave himself for him. When a Christian truly loves Christ, he becomes able to love his dear ones on earth as God wants him to love them. And such love Christ blesses; but he abominates that idolizing love which makes a father set aside the claims of Christ on his children and yield to their natural claims upon him, or which causes a son or daughter to be afraid of offending a worldly parent more than offending Christ. The persons who harbor such love are not worthy of him; they are not his children here nor his heirs hereafter.

—CHILDREN'S MEETINGS ARE HELD nightly in the tents and in some of the open-air centers. Boys and girls by the thousands assemble in the various meetings. Some pathetic little waifs of humanity drift into the tents, and incidentally into the arms and hearts of loving friends; boys who seem to have no other name than "Turkey," "Red" or "Cockroach"; girls who are running wild, some of them leaders of gangs and as dreadful in their way as their brother leaders. Older boys, youths in their teens, are being helped to respect the laws of the city as well as the laws of God. Services for adults are conducted in eleven different languages.

Europe's Furnace of Trial

War madness has seized the Old World. With appalling swiftness it has spread until, from Baltic to Mediterranean and from the Atlantic to the Ægean, the nations are now struggling in its grasp. Fleets and armies are clashing in deadly strife. Across a continent is heard the ceaseless roar of cannon. The cities, lately frenzied with patriotic fervor, are now stricken dumb with apprehension; for the strife has become a vast conflagration involving all Europe.

Greatest of all the wars, it seems likely also to prove the deadliest. Its red harvest of death is piling up on many a field; the best, the bravest, manhood's flower of the nations. We thrill with admiration at their splendid courage and reckless daring, even while we shudder at the brutal horror of their fate. It is enough to cure the world of war; yet none can refuse the need of praise due to the patriotism, however mistaken, that makes such sacrifices. The courage of those who can face death fearlessly will command the admiration of men as long as time endures.

But the saddest thing of all is to know that this horrible wholesale slaughter, which has transformed Europe into a shambles, was needless and unjustifiable. In the mad passion that took possession of men, the fact that force decides no principle was wholly forgotten. The opportunity for a peaceful solution passed, and now regrets are vain. Even the well-meant offer of mediation by our own government comes too late to be of service. The great struggle is on. To check its frightful momentum now with peaceful counsels would be like attempting to halt a tornado in full career. There may, however, be an opportunity for mediation later. For the present, it is evident that peace, unfortunately, can come only through war. With seventeen million soldiers at disposal, besides their fleets, the struggle of the titans has just begun.

Armies are but pawns in what has been called the "great game of kings," to be moved hither and thither by the hands of ambitious rulers, or swept off the board into the rubbish heap as the play goes on. The sacrifice of a few thousand lives, more or less, matters little when it is made to gratify the lust for power, territorial conquest or commercial advantage. Poor souls, they die bravely and gladly, fighting for flag and country, and the world honors their courage and loyalty. But the mercenary purpose that underlies the sacrifice is a part of the real history of almost all wars. All of the great Powers must share the responsibility for this frightful war, which has grown out of wicked greed for territorial expansion and commercial gain.

The glory of such a war is reaped in humiliation and remorse, in untold suffering, in national debts and heavy burdens, in innumerable graves, and in dust and ashes. At a thousand altars, prayers are being offered for the success of the Continental armies. Well may it be asked, "Does a just and merciful God ever bless the slaughter of men? Are bullets winged with prayer?" We cannot believe it. There must come a time when war shall yield to the principles of universal justice. And the hope and prayer of the Christian world to-day is that the Almighty, in his wisdom, may make this great conflict, which the wicked ambitions of men have kindled, a means for putting an end to war and of ushering in world-peace. Then, indeed, it will not have been without a purpose. And the humble heroes of all the nations who have fallen and may yet fall, will not have given their lives in vain. We are living in an era of great events, let us pray earnestly and with confidence that God, in his infinite mercy, may open the eyes of all nations to the folly and wickedness of war; that he may decree the end of great armaments for human slaughter and lead all nations to unite in bringing in the age of enlightened justice and peace.

A Nation's Grief

SELDOM has the heart of the nation been so touched as at the news of the death, on August 6, of President Wilson's wife, and of the events in the White House during her last hours. News of her critical condition had been, at her request, kept from the public. The President was bowed beneath many cares. His message to the stricken heads of Europe offering his aid in seeking peace was written at her bedside.

Most pathetic was the whispered hint of the dying woman that she would "go away" happier if it could be with the knowledge that a certain bill, in which she had been greatly interested, providing for the betterment of Washington slums, had been passed. News of her dying wish was informally conveyed to both Houses, and the bill was passed in sorrowful silence.

Mrs. Wilson's cheerful, beautiful life was shortened by her care for others. Interested in the poor, she labored for them beyond her strength. A simple Christian, trained in a clergyman's home, a student, artist, wife and mother, she typified all that was best in American womanhood.

In this kingless land the sorrows of the White House are the sorrows of all, and the whole nation truly mourns. The prayers of Christian America go out for the President that God will console and strengthen him in his great grief while guiding him in the grave tasks placed in his hands.

Reflecting God

THE saddest thing about the European war is that it discredits Christianity before the world. Many who disbelieve the doctrines of Christianity are utterly and bitterly opposed to war. They know that all the nations involved in the present struggle call themselves Christian nations. They read that the opposing sovereigns exhorted their armies to pray for victory, which can only mean success in slaughter. They say: "This is Christianity," and turn away in disgust.

The only answer can be that this is not Christianity. A great pagan was once asked what he thought of Christianity, and replied: "It has never been tried." So the governments of Europe to-day are not putting their Christianity into practice. Christ never taught co-operation and self-denial and helpfulness for individuals, and strife, self-assertion and oppression for nations. They have misunderstood, and are misrepresenting him.

But how about you—you with your daily tasks and daily pleasures and daily conversations and dealings? Are you representing or misrepresenting Christ? You have heard his call. You profess to follow. But are you following? Are you obeying? Are you representing him faithfully?

Paul said to the Corinthians: "Ye are our epistles, known and read of all men." They were letters, letters from God to men; letters to tell the world that God is kind and good and pure and just. Is your life telling the world that?

Visitors to the Sistine Chapel in the Vatican purchase mirrors from the guides so that through the mirrors they may gaze comfortably at the exquisite Michael Angelo paintings on the ceiling. Just so people will not raise their eyes to look at God. But they have their eyes fixed on you. You are expected to show them what Christ is like. Is the glass unclouded and steady, so that you give them a true picture of Jesus? "We all, with unveiled face," wrote Paul, "reflecting as a mirror the glory of the Lord, are transformed into the same image."

It takes patience, it takes firmness, it takes self-denial, it takes trust, but it can be done. What would your acquaintances think of Jesus if all they knew about him were what they see in you?

The Real Trouble in Europe

IN seeking to ascertain the cause of present conditions in Europe, where the greatest war in the world's history is now raging, one must look backward over the years. The primary cause is not the disputes of nations and governments; it is not even the antagonism of races. Twenty years ago or more, the mad competition for national supremacy on land and sea began in deadly earnest. It has resulted in the creation of military and naval armaments on a scale so gigantic that all that preceded them are dwarfed to insignificance. The mere fact of the existence of such forces has been a standing menace to peace and civilization. It was inevitable that, sooner or later, the long-foreseen conflagration would break out, which would put to the test the military systems of the rival nations.

Huge armies, the flower of the country's manhood, have long been prepared for battle; ponderous navies have been eager to contest for the mastery of the sea. The united systems of Europe to-day aggregate in land forces alone, including reserves, over 17,000,000 men and in sea forces several millions more. Science, invention and every form of human skill have been dragged into the service of the system, to devise the most effective methods of destroying human life, not humanely, but brutally and by wholesale. Man's God-given creative genius has been degraded. The science of destruction has been exalted above all others.

This system, the details of which could only have been devised in the infernal regions, has shadowed the world increasingly for a decade. The volcano was gathering its pent-up forces for an outburst. It needed only the stimulus of a quarrel among the nations to set the whole series of the system's man-killing mechanism into operation. We have the result in the frightful struggle now going on at which the whole world shudders.

In peace, the system consumes the surplus of a nation and impoverishes its people by oppressive taxation and heavy burdens; in war it devours the nation's sons and sows calamity broadcast.

The present war is one that will make the whole world think. Those who mock at peace will point to this war as conclusive evidence that peace is a fanatical dream and immeasurably far off. The reverse is true, however, for the war now in progress supplies the strongest argument in favor of peace. It compels men to think of the unspeakable folly of nations which, in all of their best interests, should not be foes but friends and fellow members of a great brotherhood. Yet we find them armed to the teeth by the system, to slay each other.

Further, the war must make the world think of the onerous and needless losses that are inflicted not only on the participants, but on other nations as well, who are not even remotely involved. And all who are not blinded by interest or prejudice must recognize the self-evident truth that rivalry in armament is a constant provocation to war, loss and suffering; that the control of a huge fighting machine by an ambitious or selfish power is a constant peril to humanity, and to the whole world's peace and progress.

Thought is the mother of action. There is strong reason to hope that the cumbrous, costly and wicked system of armaments now prevailing, and which has made the present war possible, may at no distant day, in obedience to the demand of civilization, become a thing of the past. It will not be relinquished without a struggle, but it is a struggle worth making. Russia, the principal aggressor in the present conflict, will not readily give up her dream of Balkan territory and a sea front on the Mediterranean; Austria, France, Germany and England will cling to their old ideals. But world-sentiment will triumph in the end. Let the friends of peace take courage.

Fatal Sunday Automobile Accidents

THE newspapers lately made mention of the numerous fatal automobile accidents of the previous Sunday. There was the case of a man with two women companions who was cing his car with another car and ran into a oving train at a railroad crossing on Long Island, ecause his brakes did not work." It turned out at he was inexperienced and probably did not ow what to do in the emergency. He was killed stantly, one of his companions died of her in- ries and the other was mortally wounded. In a ad-on collision of automobiles at Ocean City, J., there was evidently reckless driving on one le or the other. When the driver of a touring r coming from behind tried to pass another ma- ine near Somerset, Pa., his own skidded and went er an embankment, with the result that two per- ns were killed and four injured. There was a nilar accident at Corinth, N. Y., where a woman as killed and three persons hurt. other cases reported, three cars ent over embankments, one "turned rtle" and one ran up a steep bank, rowing the occupants out; there as also a car collision with a wagon id the killing of a man on the side- alk. In all half a dozen persons ere killed within a small territory, id three times as many injured. he laws requiring caution in driv- g automobiles should be more rict and more rigidly enforced. he driver who is incompetent, who under the influence of liquor, who as the racing mania, or who pilots e "joy ride," where physical and oral cautions are thrown to the inds, should have laid on his oulder the strong hand of the law. ne reason why the crop of deaths n the highways is so great on Sun- ay is that the Lord's Day is well- igh universally given over to the utomobile. This suggests the severe rraignment of the Jewish nation by he prophet:

They had not executed my judgments, but ad despised my statutes, and had polluted y Sabbaths, and their eyes were after their ather's idols. (Ezek. 20: 24.)

Heroic Warning of Danger

N THE wreck of a freight loco- motive on the Pawling Division f the New Haven System recently, he fireman was scalded to death and he engineer and flagman were badly njured. Romeyn Whitman, the ngineer, was painfully hurt but obbled to the West Pawling Station to notify the fficials. He collapsed upon reaching the depot. Frank Bowles, the flagman, had his hip fractured, ut crawled a quarter of a mile in the opposite irection and flagged an approaching express just n time to avert an accident. The railroad man's ife is one of constant peril, and, beautiful to say, s full of bravery and heroism. It required physical nd moral courage of the highest character, urged y the warmest brotherly love and loyal devotion o duty, to act as these men did at the time of the ccident. They are a very good type of the devo- ion and modest heroism to be found in the ranks f the railroad men of the country. Our land and he world are full of brave men and women, who re hurrying to the spiritual rescue of those who re imperiled. The action of these men calls to nind this divine warning against danger:

Escape for thy life. (Gen. 19: 17.)

Offers State Game Preserve

THE president of the State Board of Game and Fish Commissioners of New Jersey has just announced that a wealthy citizen—the owner of the largest private game preserve in that State—had tendered the use of 8,000 acres of mountains, bordering on the Delaware River, to the State of New Jersey as a refuge for all wild life. Along the river road large herds of deer may be seen roaming about at all seasons of the year. This is an ancient country road known in history as the "Mine Road," built by the Dutch in the seventeenth century. Along this road the early Hollanders conveyed copper ore from the Buckwood Mountains to Esopus on the Hudson. This gift is a beautiful proposition, which it is hoped the State will cheerfully accept. The Indians are nearly gone from our land. The buffaloes are about gone, and civilization makes murderous havoc upon the wild flocks and herds that remain. Most of the States have passed laws for the prevention of this threatened annihilation of the creatures of the wild. Such a park as is proposed for these animals would not only be humane, but would be a source of education for the boys and girls and grown people of the State. Deer of various kinds roam over the mountains of the Bible-land. There is this reference made to them:

Swift as the roes upon the mountains. (I Chron. 12: 8.)

Wealth Gotten by Accident

THE other day in St. Louis, Miss Juanita Rieves found in an old Bible, hidden away in a trunk, shares of stock valued at $100,000. They had belonged to her grandfather, who died forty-five years ago. The estate, which was closed in 1876, will have to be reopened and the property divided among the ten heirs. The most foolish thing people can do is to expect a fortune to come to them by accident. It is almost certain never to come; but should it come, it is very liable to make its escape. The fortunate man is the one who earns his money by labor of body, mind and soul. This truth is thus expressed by the wise man:

Wealth gotten by vanity shall be diminished; but he that gathereth by labor shall increase. (Prov. 13: 11.)

BAKERY IN GERMAN ARMY

OUT of a clear sky the bolt of war fell upon Europe, firing most of its nations with hate and bloody contests. The crime of the ages is that the Christian heads of governments and peoples should forget their vows and turn from pursuits of peace. The declaration of war means devoting of billions of war funds and preparation of clothes, foods and military equipments. The commissary department of the army is the basal one. Men have to eat to live, much more to fight. The greatest improvements have been made in baking bread for the soldiers. The veterans of the Civil War in this country tell of their hardtack and pork sides. Since then portable bakeries of the most perfect equipment have been installed. The bakeries of the German army are complete and can supply great quantities of bread daily. It is a pity that this bread should be baked to give men strength to slay their fellows against whom they have no personal grudge, or to furnish blood and life to be taken by the enemy. It is to be hoped that God in his mercy and providence will make the war short and sanctify it to the permanent peace which Christ taught and for which he gave his life. Everything that lives feeds. The plant on the moisture of the earth, the raindrop and the dew, the lower tribes on grain and flesh, the body on material food, the mind on truth in its various realms, and souls on God. Christ is the bread that furnished life for love to fellow man and to God. The truth is thus expressed: "I am that bread of life." (John 6: 48.)

Tunnel Built Without Fatality

THE Snoqualmie tunnel through the Cascades, in the State of Washington, has just been completed. It will greatly facilitate railroad operations through that region, especially reducing the delay and expense due to the heavy snow blockades in the mountains. When the two construction crews working from opposite directions through the 12,000 feet of granite and slate met in the center, they were able to shake hands and congratulate one another upon the fact that no lives had been lost in the work. During the building of the St. Gothard tunnel in Switzerland, which was completed in 1880, eight hundred men lost their lives. The Simplon tunnel between Switzerland and Italy was completed in 1905. In this work, owing to improved methods of protection, only sixty men were killed. The multiplication of inventions has demanded a heavy toll of human life. Fortunately, science and philanthropy have united to discover methods for the greater safety of the individual. The fearful wreckage of moral and spiritual life calls for renewed diligence upon the part of the church to save for the individual and society the precious immortal soul. Christ came to bring that spiritual life.

I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly. (John 10: 10.)

Prefers Sight to Fortune

MRS. ISABEL LARA, said to be the richest woman in Central America, started for Europe the other day to consult specialists there about her eyes. She is almost blind, but, despite her seventy-six years, she hopes that these specialists may be able to restore her sight. Mrs. Lara owns large properties in Costa Rica and is reputed to have an income of $10,000 a day; but in discussing her present trip, she said, "I would rather have my sight back than all the money I have." In the appreciation of her sight she only expressed the deepest feeling of every man and woman. A Broadway merchant once publicly offered a million dollars to any one who would restore him his sight. And yet how few persons who have good eyes ever stop to thank Providence for these organs, so necessary to happiness and usefulness! A gentleman in a hospital recently, who had had a cataract removed from his eye, which had totally obscured its sight, said: "I have carried these eyes about with me for nearly seventy years. They have revealed every variety of color, scene and feature. They have filled my soul with inexpressible delight. They have guided me in the paths of duty and usefulness; and yet I never once paused to thank God specifically for those organs until the curtain of blindness was pulled down over one of them, reminding me of the blessing I had overlooked." Lamentable as physical blindness is, spiritual blindness is infinitely more so. The rich woman seeking sight reminds us of the man of olden times who was blind and went to the source of spiritual sight for his cure:

The blind man said unto him, Lord, that I might receive my sight. (Mark 10: 51.)

Washerwoman Fifty Years

MRS. T. H. BAILEY, of Atchison, Kan., has just completed fifty years of service as washerwoman for one family. Washing and ironing are just as necessary in the domestic economy as cooking, sewing or furnishing the money for the living. This veteran worker is to be congratulated upon the fact of her physical health, her indomitable industry and her constancy of service. The constancy of this humble woman's service in an important part of housekeeping suggests the lesson of constancy in the divine life, and in the service of the church. It is not an easy thing to keep one's temper sweet, day after day, through so many years, at a kind of labor that is apt to be monotonous; and the fact that this faithful woman bore up so bravely under it suggests that she must have had in her heart and by her side that Friend to whom "Ironquill" the poet refers in his well-known poem on "The Washerwoman":

I would not wish to stop
From that washerwoman's lip
Any song that she can sing,
Any hope that she can bring;
For the woman has a Friend,
Who will keep her to the end.

Christ in the heart makes every task light; he gives strength to bear every burden and brightens all the way. The worker who has Jesus by his side has an unfailing friend. With what just reverence the fathers and mothers in Israel are held who have lived the Christ-life for a half century or more, and who sweeten and sanctify the services of the sanctuary on Sunday or through the week—many of whom are from the humbler walks of life and of small financial means. The apostle enjoins this spiritual constancy in these words:

Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord. (I Cor. 15: 58.)

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

WHILE the war has monopolized attention, it has not entirely monopolized the news. Things important and interesting have been taking place quite as usual. In matters of wide national interest, the railroad rate decision comes first. The most satisfactory feature to the companies in the long-awaited decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission appears to be the recognition of the fact that railroads need relief. The Commission was not unanimous in its report, which grants to one hundred and twelve railroads east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio and Potomac only a fraction of the freight increases asked for. The decision is a comprehensive review of the condition of the roads in the form of an argument for economical reforms. Advances allowed may produce a one-and-a-half per cent. increase of revenue; a few lines are granted a flat increase of five per cent. under certain conditions, which may prevent some roads' taking advantage thereof, but a general fixed increase to the thirty-five systems involved is denied.—Federal Reserve Board organization now seems likely in the near future, as Paul M. Warburg, yielding to President Wilson's wishes, appeared before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, August 1, for a three-hour examination, and according to reports wholly satisfied the committee. His confirmation is therefore expected. In the place of Thomas D. Jones, of Chicago, who withdrew his name, Frederic A. Delano, president of the Chicago, Indianapolis and Louisville Railway Company, was nominated by the President, August 4, and no opposition is expected.—The threatened firemens' and engineers' strike on ninety-eight Western railroads, involving nearly sixty thousand men, was averted at the eleventh hour by the consent of the managers to arbitrate at the urgent request of President Wilson, August 3, when in conference with him at the White House.

In matters affecting other countries, a new minister to Greece, Professor Garrett A. Droppers, of Williams College, was nominated by President Wilson, August 4, to succeed George Fred Williams, whose activity in the Balkan question was recently noted.—The canal opening, officially set for August 15, was in question for a few days because of the European war, but on August 5 the War Department announced that there would be no change of date.—Twenty foreign peace treaties, which stood in danger of postponement until the next session of Congress, have, however, now been advanced in the Senate, the Foreign Relations Committee having ordered favorable reports thereon, August 5.—An aggressive evangelistic campaign in Mexico is said to have been decided upon by concurrent action of the Boards of the Methodist, Congregational, Baptist, Presbyterian and Disciple denominations.

The attitude of this country toward war has been well expressed in the cartoons of the press. The average per cent. of normal for t past ten years is 80.4. Late bad weather con tions are held responsible for this year's compar tively poor showing.—That the United Stat ranks first in wealth appears from a circumsta tial review by the Statist of London, reprint and distributed by the Department of Commer at Washington. Accumulated riches of this cou try are placed at $150,000,000,000, as again $85,000,000,000 for Great Britain, $80,000,000,0 for Germany, and $50,000,000,000 for Franc The rate of increase in the last hundred yea for all these countries is remarkable. The repo says: "In the early part of last century, t United States depended on Europe, and especial on Great Britain, for most of the new capit needed for its development. To-day the accum lations of the American people are greater tha those of any other nation."

THE NEED OF A REVISED HYMNOLOGY

THIS week we continue the presentation of the views of pastors, hymn-writers and others on the much discussed question of the merits and demerits of popular hymnology. Any interested reader of this journal is invited to express an opinion on the subject:

How a Great Composer Passed Summary Judgment on Unmeritorious "Sacred" Music

I HEARTILY concur in the statement attributed to the Rev. John Thompson. In an address at a convention some years ago, I recall saying: "Many of the hymns now in use are little better than mere twaddle, and were a clergyman to preach the doctrines they contain, it would not be long before he would be brought to trial on a charge of heresy."

Some time ago, one of our denominations undertook to produce an ideal hymnal. Several thousand hymns were sent by them to a famous composer, with the request that he would select such hymns as, in his judgment, were worthy of consideration. He returned less than six, saying the balance were fit only for the waste basket, or words to that effect. We do need, and that most sadly, a commission of competent men, to revise, and in some instances to re-write, our hymns.

HENRY P. LYMAN-WHEATON.

Ridgefield, N. J.

A Mercenary Spirit the Cause of the Decline in our Hymnology, Writes Dr. Simpson

REPLYING to your circular letter of July 21, I beg to say that I quite agree that your criticisms of popular religious hymns are entirely just, but I see little or no prospect of improving things so long as the publication of hymns is carried on by so many persons as a purely mercenary matter of business.

New York City. A. B. SIMPSON.

A Wise Revision Would Be a Good Thing, Writes Mrs. Wingate, Hymn-writer

WHILE writing hymns and sacred songs for the various composers, I received much helpful criticism. Mr. Sankey asked for such words as Moody would give out from the platform—simple, direct and forceful. He did not care for hymns that called his fellow men "sinners." Mr. Gremahan liked Scriptural words as far as possible. The meaning of hymns should be very clear; there should be no involved sentences. Those that have stood the test of time and which voice some human longing or aspiration are very helpful. Yet many of the modern hymns express much of Christian experience and are often instrumental in winning souls into the kingdom. While I would not hold to the old, because it is old, nor reject the new because it is new, I think a wise revision would be a good thing.

Pittsfield, Me. MRS. MARY B. WINGATE.

Hymn Revision a Question Difficult to Solve, Writes Bishop Quayle

THE question of the tawdriness of so many of the Sunday school ditties is old and has often been discussed in my lifetime, but probably will never get anywhere. I was one of the Joint Hymnal Commission which made the present Methodist Hymnal used officially by the Methodist Episcopal Church and Methodist Episcopal Church, South. It measures up in a fair way to what I think a hymnal should be. Wherever our churches have used the churc hymnal in their Sunday school, it has worke admirably. I am therefore of opinion that i lies in our power to make Sunday scho music and hymns unridiculous and worthy. I is worth trying for, because so should we edu cate our Sunday school children to sing th songs which they should use when they cam to the church services, thus ministering to tha greatly-to-be-desired event, the magnifying o congregational singing.

St. Paul, Minn. WILLIAM A. QUAYLE.

A Woman Hymn-writer's Idea of Practical Revisio

IT IS TRUE that we have many songs, bot new and old, that deserve severe criticism Some could easily be rewritten and vastly im proved, and many more could wisely b eliminated. Of course, no revision would sui everybody—people will always differ. Mr Moody and other Christian workers have tes tified to the usefulness of some songs tha trouble the critics, and they claim that useful ness is the true test of any hymn. However it is well that writers and composers hol themselves to high standards, seeking to pro duce worthily rather than numerously, and believe there is among them an honest effor to elevate the standard of work.

If committees in a hundred representativ churches were asked to submit lists of hymn which they believed should be revised, migh not a hundred or more hymn-writers be en listed in a contest to revise them? Each write might be furnished with copies of, say, te hymns, with request to rewrite them. The let some authorized board of judges examin them and accept the revision of each hym which best pleased the majority.

THE WHITE HOUSE IN MOURNING

MRS. WOODROW WILSON, wife of the President, died in the White House at five P.M., August 6, after an illness of several weeks, due to a nervous breakdown d a constitution weakened by Bright's disease. e President with his three daughters, Miss Marret Wilson, Mrs. Frances B. Sayre and Mrs. illiam Gibbs McAdoo, were at the bedside. Mrs. ilson was unconscious at the end, and until the rning hope had been entertained that she might fely pass through this crisis.

Although it was known in Washington that the esident's wife was confined to her room and that e President, in the midst of the unusually heavy res of state, spent much of his time at her side, e public was not aware that any such great grief reatened the head of the nation. As soon as Mrs. ilson's alarming condition became known a wave sympathy spread over the land, and was reflected the press of August 6.

Mrs. Wilson, who was Miss Ellen Louise Axson, s born in Savannah, Ga., and was educated in at State, but came to New York to study at the t Students' League after finishing college, and in at city met Mr. Wilson. The wedding ceremony s performed by her grandfather in Savannah in r girlhood home, and the homestead was visited Mr. and Mrs. Wilson in their Southern tour in 12. Samuel Edward Axson, Mrs. Wilson's father, s a Presbyterian minister.

From her youth Mrs. Wilson had been a lover of t, and in later years she became deeply interested in welfare work. But first and always Mrs. Wilson was a wife and mother, the loved and honored mistress of her home. She ministered unremittingly to her husband's welfare and the education and training of her daughters. She has stated that she considered home influence paramount in the forming of character. She was before all others in inspiring the President with courage for his grave duties in the past trying period.

Copyright, Edmonston, Washington, D. C.

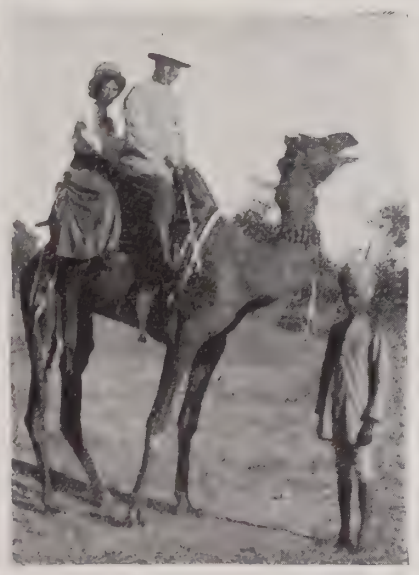
MRS. WOODROW WILSON

Mrs. Wilson's friendly visits to governmental departments led to many benefits for employees, notably in improvement of sanitary conditions under which some had to work. Her welfare activities also took her to the poorer sections of Washington, and one of the most touching incidents of her last hours, according to the press, was her assertion to the President that she would pass away more contentedly if she could know that a Congressional bill providing for better housing conditions in Washington's slum district had passed. Upon an intimation to that effect from the President the Senate promptly passed the measure and the House upon receipt of the bill prepared to do likewise.

Mrs. Wilson has always been regarded as a Southern woman. She was a beautiful example of Christian womanhood. No one thing more strikingly reflects her character and reveals the currents of her life than the last words she is said to have spoken. Beckoning to her side Surgeon Cary T. Grayson, U.S.N., the attending physician, she whispered to him: "Doctor, if I go away, promise me that you will take good care of my husband."

CHRISTIAN HEROISM IN INDIA

FIFTEEN SUCH WELLS HAVE BEEN PROVIDED



MR. AND MRS. POSNETT EN ROUTE

FORMERLY ONLY POLLUTED WATER WAS OBTAINABLE

MISSIONARY CHARLES W. POSNETT, of Medak, in the province known as the Nizam's Dominions, India, has written to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD giving a graphic ough brief account of the suffering in that section and of the very efficient and enthusiastic rvice rendered by the young native Christian angelists at this time. There are, unfortunately, any parts of India where want is a familiar sitor and in which the poorer class of natives are ntinually engaged in a hand-to-hand struggle r existence. This year, through a variety of uses, the struggle has been harder than usual, and to the prevalent poverty there has been added a visitation of disease to which Rev. Mr. Posnett refers in his letter. He writes:

"For the last six months the people in our villages have been suffering, and I have been continually going round from village to village trying to relieve the suffering, for the most part by giving the people work. It has been my desire to keep them employed, and thus to avoid pauperizing them. In the midst of it all, there came the outbreak of smallpox, which made the task infinitely worse. Our evangelists have been up night and day, nursing the sick and dying. I think the most cheering thing about the whole experience has been the splendid way in which our Indian evangelists have shone out. Though many have lost their own children during these months of trial, they have never flinched and never run away from the hardest tasks. By day they have been supervising the work which I have tried to give in almost every village, and by night they have been sitting up with the sufferers. In many houses the whole family was down at the same time. I found that our evangelists have been ceaselessly helping to nurse them and risking their own lives with the greatest courage. Furthermore, they had given their own little store of clothing to the sick. I have been more rejoiced than I can tell you by the splendid behavior of these young men and their wives.

"And I want specially to say this to you and to all the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, because many of these evangelists and Bible women are the very boys and girls whom you were so instrumental in saving fourteen years ago, during the great famine of 1900. You saved them then, and now you will rejoice to hear that they have given their strength and life without stint, and with the greatest zeal and love, to their fellow sufferers."

A DAY OF QUESTIONS

*SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR AUGUST 30

CHURCH AND STATE

By Rev. Edwin Whittier Caswell

CHRIST showed his measureless wisdom in his answers to difficult questions. When asked about the family relationships of heaven, he replied: "They are as the angels of God in heaven." "Are there few that be saved?" "Strive to enter in." "When shall these things be?" "Be ye also ready." "What shall this man do?" "Follow thou me." "Who is my neighbor?" The Good Samaritan parable was the answer.

He who is the Truth did not need to reason or investigate to find it.

On this last day of Jesus' public ministry, the Pharisees and Herodians were plotting together to get a case against Christ. They sent young disciples with flattering words in their mouths, saying: "Master, we know thou art true. Tell us, is it lawful to give tribute unto Cæsar?" If Christ took the affirmative, then his influence with the masses of the people would be gone; if the negative, then they could bring him before Pilate as rebelling against the Roman Government. Jesus exclaimed, "Why tempt ye me, ye hypocrites? Show me a penny." Looking at the face of the Emperor Tiberius on the coin, he asked: "Whose image is this?" They replied: "Cæsar's." Then came the words that have been engraved upon history and humanity: "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's."

It was an acknowledged rule that to accept the coinage of any king was to own his supremacy. It was therefore lawful for the Jew to pay the poll tax to the Roman Government. These evil emissaries were so confounded, they durst not ask him any more questions, "for never man spake like this Man." Christ added the grander lesson, "Render unto God the things that are God's"; give yourselves in holy obedience to his kingdom. Let not your loyalty to Cæsar interfere with your allegiance to God.

But what are the things that are Cæsar's? Where do we draw the line between human and divine governments? The great Teacher enunciated general, vital principles of obedience and obligation, but left to the individual their application. When the human conscience is invaded by the State, we must obey God rather than man.

Christ did not endorse the union of church and state. The church has a higher realm in which to rule. She should not become a usurper over the state. When the church has sought to rule in both realms, she has become a terrible a tyrant as the most despotic monarch. The sacred domain of the individual liberty of body and soul has been sacked and tortured on the rack and flame, and the church has been corrupted by the power, wealth and worldliness which it has acquired. Christ's kingdom is not of this world but covers infinity and immortality. How small seem the little affairs of civil, social and temporal life in this momentary existence, compared with the unending future! Therefore, it is difficult to tell where the boundary line of the state ends and that of the church begins. But there is such a line and each person must decide for himself when the state encroaches upon his religious freedom, or when the church seeks to place her golden throne above the governments of this world. Let the Golden Rule be the golden mean between the church and the state; then peace and progress will prevail.

CARPETS AND CHRISTIANITY

By Amos R. Wells

THE Pharisees, whatever we may think of their motives, were shrewd when they tried to ensnare Jesus in his talk; for most men may be caught there if anywhere. Everybody knows the famous story of Bishop Latimer, who, when on trial, heard a pen scratching behind the tapestry, and thereby knew that every word he uttered was being taken down. From that time he was very careful what he said. Talmage told of a certain family which kept a "Slander Book," in which every harsh and unkind word spoken of others was accurately recorded. At first there were many entries, but they gradually became fewer and at last ceased altogether. It is well to remember that just such records are kept in heaven. "Thou, God, seest me," means also "Thou, God, hearest me." When we think of the vast and wonderful audience which listens to our least word, we shall not be likely to be ensnared in our talk.

How hypocritical were the Pharisees when they paid Jesus that splendid compliment, "We know that thou art true"! They thought so little of truth themselves that they did not realize what a glorious tribute it was. Once an English photographer hung out a sign which read: "It is not necessary to be rich to look so in one of our photographs." This photographer had provided himself with elegant raiment of all kinds in which he decked his customers, touching up their faces, moreover, so as to make them appear far more handsome than nature had made them. This is the spirit of the world—an eagerness to seem more wealthy, more learned, and more beautiful than one is. But the Christian seeks above all things to be his exact self. He hates a lie as bitterly as Christ hated it; and this love of truth goes far to prevent his being ensnared in his talk.

But the Pharisees made one great mistake in their characterization of Jesus when they said: "Thou carest not for any man." They meant to imply Christ's entire independence of speech and bearing, and in that they were correct; but they were not correct in their implication, born of their hope, that this independence would make Jesus heedless of what he said regarding any man. Jesus cared no more for the Roman Emperor than for blind Bartimeus, and would no more speak servilely of one than of the other; but he did care tenderly and wisely for each, and would therefore speak gently and justly of each. You remember the old story of the Miller of Dee, whose refrain was, "I care for nobody, no, not I, and nobody cares for me." That is the sure result of surly separation from other men. Christ's supreme care of everybody is one reason why all men that really know him care supremely for him.

It is easy to see the point of the Pharisees' perplexing question, "Is it lawful to give tribute to Cæsar?" The Roman Government meant to them "taxation without representation," taxation of the heaviest and most unjust kind, an irresponsible tyranny compared with which the oppression of the American colonists by George IV was fatherly kindness. The question meant about what "Is it lawful to pay the stamp tax?" would have meant to the men of Boston just before the famous Tea Party.

"Tribute to Cæsar" signifies any weak and undue compliance with worldly pretensions and worldly customs. For example, figures were given last year at the convention of the Chicago Dressmakers' Club showing that several society leaders of that city spend $75,000 a year each on dress, while a hundred women of that city lavish on their personal adornment $50,000 a year apiece. Add the figures for New York, Paris, Vienna, London, Berlin, and you will have only the beginning of a conception of this one "tribute to Cæsar." Of course the men pay a tribute quite as heavy, only in other, and more harmful, ways.

It is no wonder, in view of the appalling evils of worldliness, that many earnest Christians withdraw from all connection with Cæsar. I have a friend who was formerly a successful merchant on a large scale. He was strongly influenced, on a business trip to China, by that great missionary, J. Hudson Taylor, and during all the years since then has given up worldly pursuits altogether, and devoted himself entirely to the betterment of the world. "Money!" he passionately exclaims; "I want no more money! I don't want anything more to do with it!" That is the extreme attitude toward Cæsar, a noble attitude, but the easiest for a sincere Christian to take. It was the attitude of John the Baptist.

I had another friend, Dr. Samuel B. Capen, who during his long life was counted the most useful citizen of Boston. He was eminent in civic service, locally and nationally, and was a splendid promoter of world-wide missions. Intending to become a minister of the Gospel, he was prevented by poor health, and determined to make money for Christ. He became one of the best examples the world has seen of a Christian business man, who rendered to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's and to God the things that are God's. He made the carpets that he sold prepare the way for the King of kings on his triumphal march through the nations. He took Christ's attitude toward wealth.

THE STATE—THE PEOPLE

By Arthur H. Howland

IN STUDYING Christ's words it is necessary to remember that he was almost constantly speaking from two points of view. He was speaking for the present and for the future. He spoke of the institutions and laws and customs of the day in which he lived; and he laid down great principles which were to "turn the world upside down," carrying to ruin many of the things which he spoke of freely and seemed to sanction. For instance, he made use of the temple for worship, sanctioned its ceremonies and strove to keep it pure from greedy profaners. But his own sacrifice was to put an end to the temple ceremonies, and he declared of the sacred building itself: "There shall not be left here one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down." Just so he spoke freely of slaves and masters, while bringing to earth the principle and the power that would ultimately put an utter end to the whole institution of slavery.

And his exhortation to "render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's" must not be taken as a ratification of the theory of "the divine right of kings," nor of the Roman theories of taxation and currency.

Christ, though obedient to Rome's imperialism, was the first great democrat. He believed in the people. He lived for them. He died for them. It is his spirit which, through all the centuries, has been setting them free.

So Cæsar means the state. And we know, now, after two thousand years of reflection upon the life and teachings of Jesus, that the state means, not the king, but the people.

We may link this lesson, then, up to the two great points of Christ's whole message: love for God and love for one's neighbor. We shall study these more minutely next week, but we take this glimpse of them here. Christ believed in law, but he taught that the highest law is love. Render unto God what should be his—the deepest, strongest love of our souls. Render unto the state (that is, the people, our neighbors) that which is theirs—that is, the utmost of our helpful, kindly service.

SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS' ROUND TABLE

Conducted by FRANK L. BROWN, General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

"I WOULD like to have your advice in regard to holding up our senior class of young men and young women of which I am president. Our class has had so many meetings, but there are only about [illegible] at present, and only a few [illegible] active part. We have a splendid teacher and pastor, but I long to help him up the class spiritually, but there are so many other activities that interest the members more than the Sunday school. Our class consists of members who live in the country as well as those who are in town and our Sunday school and classes are largely kept up by them and their families. What are the duties of a class president, and can you refer me to any publication that would be of help to me in my work?"

The case is not hopeless. The class is apparently well taught. It need organization and objectives to promote class spirit and growth. You should secure several good books on adult class work, such as Lesson Talks for Men (Dr. Joseph Clark), The Adult Worker and His Work (by Wade Crawford Barclay), or the excellent book on adult class work by W. C. Pearce. The Adult Class Monthly, issued by the leading denominations, is full of practical plans for such classes. Write to your denominational headquarters for their literature on adult work.

Organize the class into three committees—Membership, Social, and Spiritual and Service. The Membership Committee is to visit absent members, and make a list of non-attendants in the community for visitation. The Social Committee is to plan for an occasional social, plan a class pennant, a class pin, a class cry and a class song and introduce new members. The Spiritual and Service Committee is to plan a "win one" campaign, meet regularly for prayer for the unconverted members of the class, and conduct or arrange for the devotional meetings of the class in co-operation with the president. The service work of this committee is to plan for ways in which the class can help the church, the community and the world, by doing something definite in the church, "big brothering" some younger boys, conduct a temperance campaign in the community, visit some shut-ins or sick with flowers or song or prayer, send flowers to the nearest city hospital, and be interested in the support of some student in Korea, or China, or India, or the Philippines, at a cost of $20 to $40 a year, to represent that class upon the foreign field. A letter from this student, and his picture hung up in the class-room, will do a whole lot in making missions real to the class. This committee should secure from your State Sunday school headquarters the International Sunday school Association leaflet, Fifty-eight Varieties—One Better, giving lines of service. The class president is to see that the class is organized under the State Sunday School Association plan, secure a certificate of such organization and enough red and white buttons for each member of the class, obtain the Adult Class leaflet literature (from the State Sunday School Association headquarters), appoint committees and confer with each committee as to plans of work, and to keep things moving. Plan a 100 per cent. attendance Sunday, or set a goal for class membership, and divide the class into teams for the purpose of building up the organization.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

An End to War*

MUCH of our bringing up has had a tendency to give us an altogether wrong feeling about war. While we were taught that war is a cruel and horrible and usually wicked thing, we were also taught that after all there is a good deal of splendor and glory about it. Much of the good advice we have gotten has been couched in terms of war and illustrated with the facts of war. The histories we have studied glorified war and the heroes of war. Our literature, prose and verse alike, has been filled with the war spirit. So in all these ways, along with our dread of war there has lurked a secret admiration for it.

Now the only real way to stop war is to train up a race of human beings to whom everything that suggests war will be loathsome, sickening, disgusting, utterly revolting. And this is a process which is already splendidly under way.

Human flesh was not made to be torn and gashed by bullets and bayonets. Human bones were not made to be shattered by projectiles and bombs. Human eyes were not made to be shot to bits. Human limbs were not made to be wrenched or cut away by sword and shrapnel. Human blood was not made to be smeared on the dust of battlefield.

The leader of the meeting should secure copies of two books recently written about war from this point of view: Lamszus' The Human Slaughter House, which was reviewed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on July 30, 1913, and Alfred Noyes' great poem The Wine Press, which we shall try to review in a later issue. Both of these books are issued by the Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. Lamszus makes his hero say, after describing a modern battle: "In such wholesale, callous, purposeful fashion, vermin only are exterminated. We count for nothing more than vermin in this war."

It is an amazing coincidence that this lesson is studied just when the great struggle in Europe is impending, and twenty million men are waiting to rush at one another's throats, in struggles like those described in these terrible books.

But almost worse, even, than the ghastly griefs of war is the horrible unfairness of it. The men who do the fighting and the suffering are the very men who get no rewards from whatever victories are won. They move about blindly, impelled by cruel, selfish, greedy, soulless interests which care chiefly, and in most cases only, for gains of gold, gains not for the myriad families of their lands, but for the needless use of those who are already glutted with undeserved abundance.

Often the men who fight have no animosity against one another. They are commanded to kill men whom they would, if their natural affections were not tampered with, love as fellow human beings. The whole thing is infinitely unreasonable, unfair and woeful.

And all this—even if we did not believe in Jesus, and profess to follow him. But since we do, how much more passionately must we hate the whole business and thought of war and strive to bring it to an end.

Charles Wesley's Hymns*

WHAT would Methodism be, what would it have been, without song? And what would the songs of Methodism have been without Charles Wesley?

It would make a good program for this meeting to ask a half dozen or a dozen members, a week or so before the lesson Sunday, to run through their hymnals and pick out their six favorite Charles Wesley hymns. It will be a great blessing to the young people who make the study, and their reports to the meeting will be full of interest and helpfulness. Then have a number of these hymns read and others sung.

Doubtless the best loved Charles Wesley hymn is the simple, powerful spiritual classic: "Jesus, Lover of My Soul." Some others almost equally well known are: "Oh for a Thousand Tongues to Sing," "Come, Thou Almighty King," "Hark, the Herald Angels Sing," "Christ the Lord is Risen To-day," "Love Divine, All Love Excelling," "A Charge to Keep I Have," "Jesus, the Name High Over All," "Who Are These Arrayed in White?"

Do not fail to have the great hymn read or sung:

> And can it be that I should gain
> An interest in my Saviour's blood?

The church is missing untold blessing by allowing this hymn to pass into disuse. It is full of fundamental Christian doctrine, put into terms of rapturous experience, and the old tune "Filmore" is better than some of the critics seem to think. It has not been improved by the change of arrangement in the new hymnal. While the mechanics of the music may be better the new way, the old brought out far better the spirit of the words, and should not have been disturbed.

Charles Wesley was at his best in the hymns expressing aspirations for the higher Christian life. Only heaven's records will show how many souls have been led to cleansing and power by such hymns as: "Jesus, Thine All Victorious Love, Shed in My Heart Abroad," "Oh that My Load of Sin Were Gone!" "Oh Come and Dwell in Me, Spirit of Power Within," "Lord, I Believe a Rest Remains," and "Oh for a Heart to Praise my God, a Heart from Sin Set Free."

It will be hard to find in all hymnology a more beautiful, comforting and trust-inspiring hymn than "Forever here my rest shall be, close to thy bleeding side."

Charles Wesley believed in work. "Soldiers of Christ, Arise," and "Son of the Carpenter, Receive This Humble Work of Mine," indicate his zeal. A little-known hymn, which is one of his very best so far as literary technique goes, deserving almost to rank with some of the best of Tennyson's "In Memoriam," is "If Death My Friend and Me Divide."

* "AN EVENING WITH CHARLES WESLEY AND HIS HYMNS." Ps. 126. Epworth League Topic for Sunday, August 30, 1914.

Women in New China*

WITH the new republic the women of China are coming to a life of freedom and opportunity. Schools for girls are being opened and these schools are receiving the sanction of government officials. Mrs. William James Sly, writing in the August number of Service on the subject of to-day's lesson, states: "At first there was difficulty in getting girls to attend the schools our missionaries opened. Absurd rumors were circulated that the foreign teachers would murder the girls and make medicine of them." But the natives now understand that nothing but good comes to the girls in these schools.

So far there has been practically no social life for the women of China. But now they are forming clubs of all sorts. They are learning to think and to speak and to take the lead in many reforms. The hideous and cruel habit of foot binding is gradually dying out, although it has been stated that as late as 1911 there were still 70,000,000 girls and women in China whose feet were deformed and held in torture by this ancient custom.

Brave work has been done by some native women physicians who secured their education in America. Among these are Dr. Hu King Eng, Dr. Mary Stone, whose Chinese name is Shi Ma Li A, and Dr. Li Bi Cu. Dr. Shi in one year treated 15,941 patients, besides directing a large training school for women and superintending primary and secondary schools in her district. There is a strong woman suffrage movement in China, and last year the National Assembly was formally petitioned to grant the vote to women. There is an opportunity whose importance cannot be measured or described for the Christian Church to aid in guiding the awakening woman life of new China, bringing their thoughts and hearts and wills to the knowledge and love of Christ and their lives up to the high ideals of Christian womanhood.

THE FAIRY QUEEN

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

WHEN I was a little girl, I always thought of her as the Fairy Queen. And though I have outgrown many of my primary school ideas, I still look back at her with the same thought in my heart.

A fairy queen in the romantic days of the third reader was always associated in my mind with filmy silk dresses and cobweb wings and golden palaces and diamond chariots. She went around, after dark, with her golden hair flying and her silver voice singing, doing good to poor orphans, who believed in Titania, and Oberon, and Puck; solving mysteries and visiting the moon man. She was too tiny to see, and yet I realized that to a fairy, she would seem tall and gracious and perhaps a trifle awe-inspiring.

And now, looking back on my imaginings, I often wonder why I had the intuition to name my friend so well; for she was little, and her dark hair was heavily powdered with gray, and her eyes were covered with thick spectacles. She never went robed in silk, for she was usually engaged in the home occupation of cutting cookies, or feeding the hungry, or binding up some child's cut fingers. No one would ever suspect her of paying visits to the moon man; she was entirely a creature of the earth. Yet, instinctively, I called her the Fairy Queen.

Our friendship began in a very commonplace way—as a great many beautiful things begin—for I was coming home from school with my big geography hugged under my arm when I first met her. She was bending over a forlorn little kitten, with prominent starved little shoulder-blades and sore eyes.

"Is it your kitty?" I asked, being an inquisitive child.

"No," the lady answered, and I noticed that her voice had a peculiar, soothing mother-note in it. "It isn't exactly my kitty, though I expect that I shall adopt it if we can't find the owner. Do you like kitties?"

I liked them very much, and our friendship began in the telling of it, for my shy chatter seemed to interest the lady. I later learned that her interest was not for me alone, but for everything. She was interested in the ashman's sore arm, and in the washerwoman's baby.

It was not her interest in things, however, that decided me in the pet-name I lovingly gave her. It was her absolute trust in one—her absolute faith in the truth. Even the worst little street boy who played on her front sidewalk confided his troubles and his day-dreams to her. "For," he told a friend, years later, "she always knew that I told the truth."

I know a woman who is in every way a conscientious person. She has a remarkably clear mind, and a not unpleasing personality; yet she somehow convinces you that she does not trust you. I often hear her ask a girl a question in a voice so filled with doubt and distrust that the girl, although quite innocent of any kind of duplicity, blushes and stammers until she seems to be telling a fib.

"You know," a young woman told me once, after one of these very unsatisfactory interviews, "she doesn't believe me now, although I told her the entire truth. It really isn't worth while to do right, because even if I do, everything goes wrong!"

Unfortunately, the fairy queens of this world are few and far between, while the earth is crowded brimful with skeptical folk.

Some men are much more willing to believe that small boys break windows through sheer badness, than to think that baseballs slip and do damage never dreamed of. Some women find it easier to believe that an acquaintance copies their best dresses than to think that there were two of them made in the same store.

My fairy queen lived by herself in a house that was small and exceedingly humble. And yet in her home I have made many friends who could never have been induced to come into some of the rich mansions along Fifth Avenue. Her charm is the reason for her popularity. A man of letters, one of her friends, once summed her up in this way:

"The heart of a child and the mind of a lady of the old régime," he soliloquized. "Absolute truth and absolute trust. Perfect sweetness, without a touch of antagonism in her nature, God bless her!"

Friends of mine, it is antagonism and distrust that spoil so many women who might have been fairy queens. A great many people wander away from right doing and the truth simply because they are not believed; while a tiny, helpful word, a happy smile, a trustful glance would make them go on with renewed vigor, knowing that the soul of a fairy queen grows in the body of a mortal: that the spirit of romance—of fairyland—lives in our everyday world.

> Love-filled eyes and smiling faces,
> On this world of work and woe—
> Oh, if they could only greet us
> On the road where'er we go!
> Hearts that sympathize and trust us,
> Minds that grasp the things we mean—
> Ah! they show us that a mortal
> May excel a fairy queen.

SARAH PERKINS AND THE MONEY TRUST

The delegates gasped. That verged upon insult. And yet—hadn't they all been saying among themselves that the United States had insulted Lord Riggleston by sending Sarah Perkins to this all-important conference? The shrewdest statesmen had come from other lands; but from America the amiable, lazy, but very wealthy ranchman, Senator Harms, and—a very pretty, satin-throated young lady of perhaps twenty-seven years, a teacher of economics in the Galesburg Girls' Academy!

Of course, the horrible faux pas was the inevitable result of the absurd practice of woman suffrage which had been the law in the United States for more than a generation. It happened that the governor of Illinois, Mrs. Selfridge, was the young lady's aunt; and old Hiram Selfridge, senior senator from Illinois, had the misfortune to be the husband of the imperious Governor Selfridge. And, finally, the President of the United States wasn't deeply interested in the Russian question, seeing that it did not materially affect the fortunes of his country. Mrs. Selfridge was coaching Miss Sarah to run for the State Legislature. The old lady was a wily schemer—and you can guess the rest.

Or rather, you can guess the rest of the happenings on the American side. But you can't imagine how Monsieur Rocassin's heels interfered, or how Herr Fuchs slobbered some utterly incoherent remarks about the weather, or how the astute and ever-contained Lord Riggleston reddened all the way up to the edge of his frontal bald spot, when Senator Harms ambled into the noble vestibule of the Hague Palace of Peace and, with a magnificent sweep of his Southwestern arm, roared: "Gentlemen, allow me to introduce you to the junior American delegate, Miss Sarah Perkins! Sarah's a mighty bright girl—"

It was simply awful!

The British foreign office had straightway begged the American ambassador in London to urge upon the President the dire necessity of recalling Miss Sarah and putting in, say, the Hon. Jeremiah Snoogs, former secretary of the interior, who was then in Europe. But the ambassador threw up his hands and croaked lugubriously: "What? Drag a lady out of her new job? Well, I guess not. If I proposed it, the Women's National Democratic Committee would march up Pennsylvania Avenue to the White House, behind five brass bands, and demand my immediate retirement."

So Miss Sarah Perkins stayed—and chatted in honeyed whispers with her senior colleague through the sessions. And between sessions she motored over to Amsterdam and spent all her spare change in the seductive store of the Delft Pottery.

"What you English say? A bull in a china shop?" queried the innocent Monsieur Murquet.

. . . .

"Really, Lord Riggleston." Sarah Perkins opened her big gray eyes in the most deliciously naive surprise. "I don't know a thing about the Russians. I'm awfully interested in what you're telling us about them, and I hope you'll go on. But after you've finished, I should like to take the floor for a few minutes—"

So Lord Riggleston, still more ruffled by this strangely sweet retort, readjusted his yellow glasses and resumed. He had broken off his discourse at ...ib-head II, in the Seventh Balkan War. And perhaps we ought to follow him from that point onward.

"Like the Sixth War," declared his lordship, "the Seventh was purely one of revenge. Roumania, jealous of Bulgaria's waxing power and infuriated at the trick whereby Bulgaria had taken to herself the precious city of Constantinople, formed a secret alliance with Bosnia and Herzegovina. After these latter countries had recuperated from their savage and costly war of independence, the three allies flung their armies into Bulgaria, without any formal declaration of war, on August 23, 2077.

"It does not here concern us to review the brilliant but atrocious campaign of General Mirzivir, with its swift, decisive finish of Sofia, three months later. We are interested only in the part played by Russia in the war. It was a band of Russian agitators who bought eight newspapers in Roumania and Herzegovina four years before the outbreak of the war. It was this same band which published inflammatory false reports about Bulgaria and heated editorials against Bulgarian business men and politicians, without cease, up to the very day of the war. It was another clique of Moscow hirelings who went to Paris, as secret agents of the Czar, and persuaded the French bankers to lend Roumania fifty million roubles. It was called a loan for 'internal public improvements;' but neither the bankers nor the borrowers deceived anybody in the European diplomatic services. After all these moves had been made beneath the surface of affairs, the Czar did what his ancestors had done repeatedly in the barbaric nineteenth century; he presented to 'his little brothers,' the Bosnians and Herzegovinians, 450,000 electric rifles of the latest model, 85 war aeroplanes, and 3,000,000 rounds of ammunition. You see, gentlemen"—Lord Riggleston caught himself quickly—"ladies and gentlemen! Russia was repeating her old, old trick of urging petty peoples against one another, aiding them to slay one another, and then, after they have spent themselves and lie helpless, stepping in and taking over their lands.

"One more fact! The French loan to Roumania was secured by a first lien upon the Roumanian National Railway. Now, please notice how this fitted in wonderfully with the Russian policy; so wonderfully that any reasonable man must infer that the particular mortgage was suggested by the Czar himself. In the last week of the war, three Bulgarian dirigibles managed to slip past the aeroplane control that the Roumanians maintained over the Danube. Straight for Bucharest they headed, dropped gasoline bombs—and in three hours not a building remained of that once proud town. As all fire insurance had been automatically annulled during the war, the Roumanians lost outright, in this appalling conflagration, two hundred million roubles.

"It was this loss which made it impossible for the people to pay either the interest or the principal of their French war loan. And so the French creditors took over the management of the National Railway 'until such time as interest and principal shall have been paid.' But this meant that the creditors' board would retain the railway forever, because it was running at a slight loss after the war and promised to pay a mere trifle even after the country had recovered!

"But the shrewd Frenchmen did not propose to manage a remote road at a loss; nor had they entered into the bargain with the fear that they might be forced to that hard course. They knew well enough that they could do what they finally did. They sold their first lien and transferred the management to a so-called syndicate of Odessa capitalists at a huge profit. I estimate that the Paris investors cleared not less than 35 per cent. within four years, over and above the 6 per cent. interest on their bonds.

"Now, who were those Odessa capitalists? They were the crafty old Russian Government in disguise! But the time was not yet ripe for the Romanoffs to come out into the open and reveal themselves as masters of Roumania. That would have precipitated the very event which Russia most dreaded, namely, the earnest, one-minded coalition of the other Balkan States against her. First, Bulgaria and Servia must be trapped as quietly as Roumania was being trapped. And the bait was already on the hook; the jaws of the trap were set.

"Bulgaria needed sixty million roubles for the war. She secured them from the usual source, Paris. She spent them in the first month. Then she again drew on inexhaustible Paris for eighty millions. The last bar of gold in this treasure was spent a week before Roumania definitively vanquished Bulgaria in the terrible battle of Burgas. Infuriated but helpless, the Bulgars sullenly settled down to pay off this crushing debt, precisely as Japan did after her empty victory over Russia in the early twentieth century. But the burden was too heavy for the shoulders of peasants and petty manufacturers already despoiled by brigandage and looting and incendiarism. Taxes were levied, but immediately the people rebelled; and the streets of the mountain villages shrieked with protests and threats against the government. There remained but one course open; Bulgaria sold concessions right and left, gave over her railways to French creditors' committees, and auctioned off mountain timber lands in the Rue Rivoli. The extensive coal mines at Pernik went to a Marseilles syndicate. And the precious copper deposits near Zaparevo fell into the hands of three directors of the Credit Lyonnais.

"Then, as slowly and as still as the geological epochs melt away, French bankers bought out the smaller investors, massed the bonds and stocks of the many industries into gigantic blocks,—and, in that memorable February, thirty-two years after the battle of Burgas, in that bitter winter when the wolves came snarling down in ravenous packs from the mountains around Sofia and devoured children,—four hundred million roubles' worth of Bulgarian properties were privately sold to ten gentlemen of Moscow who called themselves the Russian Industrial Syndicate, but were, in God's truth, ten cousins of the Czar.

"One-half the purchase price was in cash, the balance in the usual form of a first lien against the properties sold. Our distinguished colleague, Monsieur Murquet, informs me that the French profits exceeded 45 per cent.

"During these thirty-two years, under canny French management, Bulgaria had prospered wonderfully. Even the radical Pan-Slavonic party reluctantly admitted that . . . Then, out of a clear and happy sky, came storming an army of Montenegrins and Servians. What provoked them, no man outside of the Imperial councils of Russia knows. They gave no reason to the world. They simply rushed down into the valleys of Bulgaria. There were fifteen days of raving murder—and then into the harbor of Burgas swept the great Black Sea squadron of the Russians. Forty regiments of Cossacks tramped ashore. And 'Bulgaria was temporarily occupied by Russia in the interests of peace and for the protection of Russian investors in Bulgarian enterprises.'"

"That act, as you know, marked the opening of the Eighth Balkan War; whose ominous finish we are here summoned to consider and deal with in the name of the peace-loving governments of the world. The result is fresh in your memories, I trust." Here Lord Riggleston cast a withering glance at Sarah Perkins; but she didn't wither at all. "Russian garrisons are to-day planted thickly, from the Black Sea to the Adriatic. And sixty thousand Balkans who rebelled against annexation to Russia have been packed off in chain-gangs to the salt mines and lumber camps of Siberia.

"So much for the situation." Lord Riggleston looked up and thrust his papers into his pocket brusquely. "Now what can we do about it? One thing is sure. The wretched Balkan States cannot protect themselves against the invader as the United States did, many years ago, when it insured itself against conquest by investing enormous sums in foreign bonds and thus gaining control over the money markets of the world. That method required prodigious wealth; and, as we have seen during the past generation, only two other countries have been able to adopt it: Great Britain and France.

"Nor can the Balkans defend themselves as Germany did against Emperor Eitel of Bismarckia, when they removed all their treasures to trust companies all over the world. Such a scheme is practicable only in a land poor in natural wealth and rich in capital and labor. Nor could Italy or Austria or Asiatic Turkey or Egypt or Persia or Beloochistan, all of which lie in the danger zone of Russian conquest, invest or otherwise manipulate domestic wealth in that way.

"In fact, they and all other countries on earth beside the four great capitalistic ones, cannot use their wealth as a fortress. They cannot lend it as the United States did; for it is not free capital but material wealth—mines, forests, fisheries, water power. And they cannot hide it, as Germany did; for mines and forests and fisheries and water power have a habit of staying where they are, in plain sight. Therefore, all the world save the four capitalistic nations seems doomed to guard itself against war by the old-fashioned appeal to arms. It is a great pity, yet I see no escape.

"The only solution of the Balkan difficulty, therefore, is an international army—"

There was a great clatter in the corridor outside. A Dutch lieutenant rushed breathlessly into the conference, saluted the speaker and chairman, then marched up to the latter and passed him a despatch. In a tense silence, the chairman read:

London: British Consuls at all large towns in Bulgaria, Roumania and Servia report that at ten A. M. to-day there were uprisings of the natives. All Russian officers massacred. Russian barracks at Sofia, Bucharest, Constantza, Burgas, and nine lesser towns blown up with gasoline bombs. Fifteen Russian dirigibles blown up, apparently by Balkan members of their crews. All foreigners ordered to leave countries at once. Harrison, Second Secretary Foreign Office.

"Horrible!" Senator Harms cried. "We must rush Red Cross squads down there at once."

"Lord Riggleston is right! We must fling an army into the Peninsula, in the name of Universal Peace!" shouted Hermann Fuchs.

"Please, may I say a few words?" came in a soft, shy voice from Sarah Perkins. She was looking squarely at Lord Riggleston, and there was pleading in her eyes.

The Dutch lieutenant gave a short hysterical laugh; but stopped it very suddenly, as Senator Harms glared at him.

"Certainly! Certainly, ma'am!" Lord Riggleston blundered, for once in his life completely bewildered by this absurd anti-climax. Twenty-five million raving Slavs in bloody chaos, and a beautiful young lady asking if she might say something on the subject. Oh, those Americans!

THE PAPACY AND CIVIL AFFAIRS

Protestant Observer, London, for July

WHEN we accuse the Papacy with interference in civil affairs, we are often met with the plausible answer that the Pope claims only a jurisdiction over questions of "faith and morals." Maybe the answer satisfies the less thoughtful; but those to whom superficial view of things in general is not satisfying will look deeper.

It would be a good thing if all Protestants realized to the full the real significance of the Pope's claims to absolute and exclusive jurisdiction over "faith and morals." Remember, it does not mean "faith and morals" to Roman Catholics only: he means that he claims control over all questions relating to "faith and morals" in the state. But it is very far from easy to mention any aspect of human life and endeavor which is not bound up in the question of "faith and morals." Almost every act we perform or omit to perform may be said to be affected by questions of "faith and morals." By claiming this apparently innocent-looking jurisdiction, the Papacy really claims for herself the right to interfere with and control practically every branch of the public life. As to how it may be extended and enlarged so as to become an ecclesiastical tyranny may be seen by a perusal of a book by "Father" Henry C. Day, S.J., entitled Catholic Democracy, Individualism, and Socialism, just published in London.

The following passage by the Jesuit, quoted by the Tablet in a eulogistic review, illustrates my meaning. "Father" Day admirably delineates the authority which his church claims over civil affairs, when he declares that she "recognizes that she has clear and imperative duties to society in regard to the general moral bearing of political and economical questions. Thus she accepts the responsibility of considering the general relation of the state to the individual, of capital to labor, of masters to servants, and of making definite pronouncements on such subjects, whenever justice, or charity, or the good of society requires it. In these and in all other questions of human actions which entail an immediate moral issue, the church claims to be the ultimate authority to decide what is right and what is wrong."

"MOTHER BIRD'S" LIFE MONUMENT

AMONG the many activities of the late Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, so well known to readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, there was one to which she gave so much love and care as the Gospel Settlement of which she was the founder. In organizing and developing this work it can truthfully said that she spent the last sixteen years of her life. It was Mrs. Bird's dream to make the Settlement a large preventive work for children and young people where they might not only be taught the principles of home-making and citizenship, but where they should always find a motherly welcome, an atmosphere of protection, and an incentive to helpfulness.

There are over 1,100 members in the Settlement, 38 clubs and classes—lyric, literary, debating, kindergarten, kitchen, garden, sewing and cooking classes. The Mothers' Club of eighty members, which has just celebrated its fourteenth birthday, has many charter members. There is also a women's Bible class Sunday afternoons.

The spirit of helpfulness is shown in the American Aid Club (of boys), which for five years out of its treasury has sent bottled milk to a little tuberculous boy patient.

A girls' club self-sacrificingly emptied its treasury to get fruit for the aged during the holidays.

The Settlement is greatly in need of help. The association has closed the kindergarten for lack of funds. Its fifteen years of earnest service entitles it to the consideration of friends of this form of social mission work. Miss Harriet Irwin of 211 Clinton Street, New York, for many years the associate of Mother Bird in the Settlement, will answer all inquiries. Donations may be sent to the Settlement in care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The Horn of Plenty

In a Child's Idea Flows Puffed Grains Nowadays

When children grow up their idea of plenty may be heaps of gold. But now they only dream an abundance of what they like best. And that, with countless children, is Puffed Wheat or Rice.

Every such child should have it.

Serve What They Love

Our only plea is, Serve what children like best.

If it isn't Puffed Grains, omit them. If it is Puffed Grains—Puffed Wheat or Rice—let them have all they want.

Serve with cream and sugar. Mix the grains with fruit. Float them like crackers in bowls of milk. Let girls use them in candy making. Let boys eat them like peanuts when at play.

For these are scientific foods.

Every granule has been exploded. Every element is made available as food.

Such things can't be done by any process save Prof. Anderson's. So, as whole grains made wholly digestible, these foods are unique.

Puffed Rice, 15c
Except in Extreme West

CORN PUFFS 15¢

Every month we tell you here the delights of Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice. We picture the grains in actual size—which is eight times the size of raw grains.

We describe them as best we can—as bubble-like grains, thin, crisp and fragile, with a taste like toasted nuts.

But no words or pictures can do justice to Puffed Grains. Whatever you expect, the first taste will surprise you. You'll say we never told you how good these morsels are.

Won't you let the grains themselves tell their story to you? Get a package of each and compare them. Each has a distinct fascination.

Do this today. You've missed them long enough.

Questions and Answers

A. J. D., Illinois. I am enclosing a newspaper clipping which describes a "drama-sermon" recently acted and delivered. What is your opinion of such a service? Isn't the endowment of power from on high what the ministry needs, rather than borrowing from the world such spectacular plans?

Every man with new ideas is bound to meet with opposition. It was certainly an odd way, which Jesus commended, of getting people to come to a wedding feast, by going out into the highways and byways and compelling them to come in. The methods of the Salvation Army were bitterly criticized at the beginning, but the evident good accomplished silenced the criticism. The same is true of Billy Sunday's slang and swagger. Many people do not like it, but God is undeniably using him to make bad people good, so we must not criticize. Paul boasted that he was "all things to all men." Times change, and ministers must adapt their language and their plans of service to new conditions. They are "fishers of men," and anything that will really win men to God cannot be condemned. The service described, in which a minister acted out a short drama, consisting of conversations with imaginary visitors to his study, all dealing with church life and work and with Bible truth, could hardly be condemned in wholesale fashion, though many individual pastors, churches, or denominations would not like it. You are certainly right in saying that what is needed is an endowment of Holy Spirit power. A minister's heart and lips must be touched with Holy Ghost fire before he can, by any methods whatever, hope to win souls for Christ.

N. C. C., Eufaula, Okla. 1. Of what religion was Moses' father-in-law, the priest? Upon witnessing the glory of Israel for himself, his panegyries seem to place Moses' God above all gods. Is there any subsequent account of Jethro's having permanently allied himself with the people of his famous son-in-law? 2. Is there any account of the death of Zipporah? 3. What was the cause of the insubordination of Miriam and Aaron against their brother?

1. Jethro was a Midianite—a sheik-priest—a descendant of the fourth son of Abraham. He is described in the Jewish Midrash as "a man of good deeds, a friend of the Lord, beloved by the Lord," etc. Whatever his original belief, his household "seems in the sequel at least," as one commentator writes, "to have observed the worship of the true God in common with the Hebrews." (See Ex. 18: 10-12.) 2. The death of Zipporah is not recorded. 3. Their insubordination is clearly stated to have been the result of jealousy of the influence of Moses' Cushite wife. (See Num. 12: 1, 2.) They both claimed the gift of prophecy, and virtually declared themselves the equals of the leader in spiritual influence. The same chapter records their crime and its punishment.

Mrs. J. F., North Ferrisburg, Vt. The word "lead" in the Lord's Prayer seems to my mind to be a wrong translation. When we pray "lead us not into temptation" we plainly assume that God may and does lead us into temptation, certainly a wrong, not to say a wicked, imputation, for God tells us in the Bible that he cannot be tempted, neither tempteth he any man.

There has been much controversy over the passage in question. Some commentators hold it to be a petition against being drawn into temptation of our own will, and, inferentially, for strength to resist temptation when it does come. That this is the reasonable interpretation would appear from the next clause in the prayer: "Deliver us from evil." Our proneness to fall into temptation to which we weakly yield, gives the plea a special significance. It is as though the heart cried out "When temptation assails, give us the strength to resist. Help us to keep our covenant, and fortify us for trial."

J. H. H., Mount Morris, Ill. 1. The tablets described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD belong to the period of the Ur dynasty, estimated to be approximately 2400-2301 B.C. This is the judgement of the distinguished scholars who have studied the subject. The tablets are in Babylonian characters known as cuneiform, or wedge-shaped letters. At the time when Abraham dwelt in Ur (according to the best available scholarship on the subject) "he was surrounded by a heathen population worshiping Baal and other gods." He must have been conversant with the Babylonian language and literature, and familiar also with the cuneiform writing in which the business of that age was transacted. Although dwelling in the midst of a pagan population until he was seventy-five years of age, he believed in the one God. Josephus, the Jewish historian, in his Antiquities (book 1, chapter 7) tells how Abram, being a foreigner, came with an army out of the land of Babylon, called Chaldea. He also tells us that Abram was the first to publish abroad the belief that there was but one God, the Creator of the universe, and that the Chaldeans and other people of Mesopotamia raised a tumult against him. We mention these facts to show the character of the social and religious surroundings of Abraham. 2. The Hebrews, so-called, are not named after Abraham, but after Eber or Heber, the son of Salah (Gen. 10: 24), an ancestor of Abraham.

Anxious Inquirer, Tintah, Minn. I am still in doubt as to what conversion is. How can I pass from darkness to light, have old things become new, and have joy and peace? A pastor says that I must experience this and must know just the time it happened. He also says that God must convict me before I can be saved. I have no knowledge of God working on me in the way he describes, nor of being able to feel in such a miserable condition. He also says that we may call on God too late, as God will be tired of waiting for us, and will no longer listen to us. If this is true what can I do? How may I get the assurance that I am saved?

There is the possibility of our being mistaken, but your letter reads to us as though you were already trusting God. You know that he is just and kind, and so find it difficult to believe things which seem to you to make him unjust and unkind. The pastor you mention is right in saying that the usual process of conversion comes through conviction and a repentance and faith which bring a definite crisis of peace and joy. But there are thousands of well-authenticated cases in which there is no such crisis which can be pointed to as the time of conversion. This matter has been frequently discussed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We have stated that many theologians hold that a child need not necessarily lose his infant innocence, that innocence which led Jesus to take childlikeness as the very essence of the spirit of his kingdom. To such a person as this, who has always loved God and trusted Christ, it is very bewildering to hear about conviction and the necessity for agonizing repentance. However and whenever we arrive at it, the thing that saves us is trust in Christ. If you are trusting him now let no one disturb that trust. He is kinder than can possibly be told. He does forgive the sins of every one who trusts him and accepts his promises of forgiveness, and he will keep them, moment by moment, by his power. "Cast not away therefore your confidence," but run with patience the race that is set before you, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of your faith.

H. A., Glenville, Conn. 1. The first to assume the title of Pope was Bishop Siricius (384-398 A.D.). The title did not come into regular use, however, until after the fifth century. It was discontinued again after the seventh century, and it was not until the pontificate of Gregory VII (1073-1085 A. D.) that it became the exclusive prerogative of the Roman bishops. Peter the apostle never was a Pope, nor did he claim or exercise any powers or privileges that were not exercised by all the disciples in common. These are the facts of history. 2. Peter, at the time of his call to the discipleship (A.D. 26), was between thirty and forty years old. He died about A.D. 64, and consequently must have been about seventy or upward at that time. Ancient writers (Nicephorus and others) speak of him as an aged man.

Mrs. B. E. N., Ritter, Ore. 1. "Cleanliness is next to godliness" is not in the Bible. It is a phrase found in a translation of the Mishna (the portion known as the Beraitha) by De Sola and Raphael, who together translated eighteen treatises. 2. Sunday is a day of rest and worship. To devote it to pleasure, or sport, is a desecration. We should be careful, however, in judging others, lest we be led into error. What may seem to you to be done for pastime may prove on investigation to have been something wholly different.

Farm Loans. Information about bank loans on improved farm property can best be obtained direct from the national bank or banks nearest to your locality, or through your local bank.

Mrs. D. J., Mena, Ark. The disappearance of the Ark of the Covenant is one of the unsolved mysteries of Scripture. The Jews believe that it is among the hidden things which the Messiah will reveal. It was probably taken away or destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar at the time when the temple was plundered.

Mrs. M. E. H. 1. The question is controversial. It is among those matters concerning which each is entitled to his own conscientious opinion. 2. The passage in I Cor. 7: 14 means that "those connected with the people of God are themselves hallowed by such contact" (see I Tim. 4: 5). The believer imparts to the other some of his own character, and the influence he thus exerts may be made the means of saving a soul. This is not to be interpreted, however, as counseling tolerance of sin, but rather that the believer's pure and upright life should stand as a rebuke to the other. Further, there is a limit to Christian forbearance, and when that is reached, and the eternal welfare of the believer, or those dependent upon him or her, is at stake, there is no alternative but to end the bondage. (See I Cor. 7: 15). 3. The passage in I John 3: 9 is thus interpreted by commentators: "One who has experienced the new birth is no longer the slave of sin, and his higher nature, being born of God, revolts at sin. If his conversion and sanctification be thorough and genuine, he will not yield to sin, because the two states (being born anew of God, and being in a state of sin) are diametrically opposed and mutually exclude each other. In so far as one sins, he makes it doubtful whether he be born of God." But though sin no longer reigns in us, it is still active. "The child of God," wrote Luther, "receives wounds daily and never throws away his arms or makes peace with his deadly foe."

C. W. M., De Soto, Ill. No man, minister or layman, has a right to judge another in the way you describe. At the same time, if a man professing Christianity has a habit which is an impediment to his own spiritual growth or by which he sets a bad example to others, he should not find fault with some good brother who calls his attention to it in the proper spirit. We are all too apt to nurse our besetting sins and to be overindulgent to ourselves.

DISAPPEARED
Coffee Ails Vanish Before Postum.

It seems almost too good to be true, the way headache, nervousness, insomnia, and many other obscure troubles vanish when coffee is dismissed and Postum used as the regular table beverage.

The reason is clear. Coffee contains a poisonous drug—caffeine—which causes the trouble, but Postum contains only the food elements in choice hard wheat with a little molasses.

A Phila. man grew enthusiastic and wrote as follows:

"Until 18 months ago I used coffee regularly every day and suffered from headache, bitter taste in my mouth, and indigestion; was gloomy and irritable, had variable or absent appetite, loss of flesh, depressed in spirits, etc.

"I attribute these things to coffee, because since I quit it and have drank Postum I feel better than I had for 20 years, am less susceptible to cold, have gained 20 lbs. and the symptoms have disappeared—vanished before Postum."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water, and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

A New Hernial Appliance

This Invention Holds More Firmly, Comfortably and Surely Than Any Truss.

Sent on Trial

The new Brooks Appliance for rupture so thoroughly meets every test and requirement that it is ordered by the U. S. War Dept. and is recognized as the most reliable support ever invented. It is fitted with an Automatic Air Cushion which follows every movement of the body and always covers the ruptured spot. The cushion which comes in contact with the skin is soft, pliable gum rubber and clings closely, so that slipping is impossible, and it is cool and comfortable because of the constant circulation of air through it.

This Appliance is sold under a positive guarantee of money refunded if not satisfactory. We do not guarantee to cure any more than any doctor will guarantee to cure his patient. We do guarantee to furnish a perfect fitting Appliance, which will give the wearer solid comfort and retain the protrusion at all times. The purchaser is the sole judge and if for any reason whatever (which does not have to be furnished us) it is returned, the price paid will be refunded in full.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

ONE theme will be uppermost in the thoughts and desires of our Prayer League during these days of dreadful news from Europe. That is that the war shall speedily cease. That the rulers and statesmen shall see the wicked folly of refusing to settle their differences by reasoning rather than by the slaughter of their subjects. Prayers will be offered up, too, for those who are wounded, and for the aching hearts left behind in the thousands of homes, mostly little homes, from which loved and needed ones have gone forth to return no more.

In the face of such dreadful calamities as face our brothers and sisters in Europe, our little needs and cares here must seem slight indeed. But God is interested in us, and is not too busy to attend to our cries. We must believe, however, that he is readiest to hear when we are praying for the needs and comfort of others, or for blessing upon ourselves, in soul or store, in order that we may be of service to others.

E. R. S. asks prayer that the city of Hagerstown, Md., will be greatly changed and blessed spiritually, and that all saloons and evil resorts be closed. R. T. asks prayer for a great blessing upon a Congregational Church in Detroit, Mich.; L. A. M., for a great awakening during revival meetings in Lowndesville, S. C.; Mrs. E. A., for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit at St. Claire, Minn.; A. A. D., that a church at Diller, Neb., may be revived; Mrs. C. B., for a revival throughout the Union Church in Nova Scotia; A Reader, that great and lasting results may be gained from a revival meeting just begun; I. Y., for revival in a church at Morristown, Minn.

A happy mother writes from Minnesota: "I want to acknowledge God's goodness in answering prayer. I wrote the Prayer League some weeks ago asking their prayers for my son, who has been in a hospital for the insane for over a year. At the time I requested prayer there was no improvement. I receive a monthly report, and about two weeks from the time of receiving the report 'no improvement,' a friend called to see him and sent me word that he was better. I wrote the superintendent when the month was ended, and he replied that he had begun to improve and that they were hoping for greater improvement. I truly believe that this is in answer to prayer." Miss C. A. D. writes: "Your prayers for me were answered so quickly the doctor was very much surprised. I asked to be cured of a drug habit which I had about thirty years." Mrs. J. M. S. writes from Hopkinsville, Ky.: "An answer came to my prayer before it had been printed in the Prayer League column, and my dear daughter was wonderfully improved in health." H. J. V. writes from Picton, Ontario: "I asked the prayers of the League concerning the settling up of my brother's estate, and the Lord has brought us through better than I expected."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

A Sister in Christ, Hastings, Neb.; A. C., Asheville, N. C.; Mrs. W. L. T., Auxvasse, Mo.; Mrs. C. W. G., Avant, Okla.; Mrs. L. L. C., Arkadelphia, Ark.; Mrs. C. G. K., Akron, Ohio; M. O. I.; Mrs. J. C. K., Eureka, Kan.

Several letters have been received for Mrs. M. A. H. and for "A Friend," Brookshire, Texas. If they will send their full names and addresses these letters will be forwarded.

J. L. H. and V. G. L. request prayer that the minds of brothers may be restored; Mrs. M. M. S., her sister's mind; G. W. P., his wife's; Mrs. R. B., that her daughter's mind may be strengthened, and Mrs. S. McN., that a friend's mind may be strengthened.

A. T., Mrs. L. T. M., and Mrs. J. H. request prayer that sight may be restored; Mrs. M. D., that failing sight may be restored; Mrs. J. A. S., that her eyes may be restored to their normal condition; Mrs. J. L. K. and Mrs. C. M. D., that sight may be strengthened.

1915 Chalmers Cars

"Sixes" Exclusively

"LIGHT SIX" 5-PASSENGER—$1850

New body styles, refinements of detail, continued use of the well-tried Chalmers chassis, and a slight increase in price. These are the striking features of the Chalmers line for 1915.

The Chalmers "Light Six" is now offered in both five- and six-passenger types with new bodies of latest style and design—in every way a distinguished car. The five-passenger model is a big, roomy car in comparison with high-powered "Sixes," but not skimped in design.

The six-passenger model—at $1900—is a car of exceptional grace and roominess, with an entirely new, luxurious and distinctive body. The tonneau is fitted with Pullman disappearing seats. Doors are unusually wide. The body is a new type of exclusive Chalmers design.

This "Light Six" is the proved 1915 car. 3600 of these cars have been driven an aggregate of 3,000,000 miles and they have universally made good.

When we first announced this car we priced the five-passenger car at $1800. We have since added a few detailed improvements and made some changes which have increased the manufacturing cost approximately $50. So beginning August 1st the price of the five-passenger model became $1850. At the new price our factory profit remains the same.

"MASTER SIX" TORPEDO—$2400

The "Master Six" of Them All

The new 1915 Chalmers "Master Six"—$2400—will be produced in limited quantities for those who seek the fullest luxury of power and size in a motor car.

For 1915 the "Master Six" is offered in two body types, the four-passenger Torpedo and the seven-passenger Touring Car. Both types are unusually beautiful and distinctive. The price of either type is $2400.

The four-passenger Torpedo is a most distinctive car. It has exclusive style and dash. This beautiful new body has a single door on either side. Front seats are divided, the doors being in the center of the body.

This is a man's car of universal style and smartness, built lower than usual, giving it a foreign, racy appearance and making it distinctive among other cars.

The "Master Six" seven-passenger Touring Car is a big, roomy car, for those who drive an automobile of maximum carrying capacity. The lines of the seven-passenger body are the same as those of the Torpedo.

Chalmers Cars—Quality Cars

"Quality First" will continue to be the guiding principle of Chalmers manufacture for the coming season. It is to carry out this principle even further than in the past that we have raised the Chalmers prices.

The Chalmers Company is not competing and never has competed with other cars on a "price" basis. Our past experience has shown us that each year there are enough people to whom "quality" is first and "price" secondary, to buy more Chalmers cars than we can make.

So the Chalmers Company is one of those sure enough of its market to continue to produce cars on a "quality" basis rather than on a "price" basis. The new prices, $1850 for the Chalmers "Light Six" and $2400 for the "Master Six," mean no more profit per car to us, but they mean to you even more value in the future than in the past.

See These Cars

Arrange with your local dealer to see these Chalmers "Sixes." Take a ride in the car that appeals to you most. Place your order early. The production of Chalmers Master "Sixes" is limited and will not fill the demand.

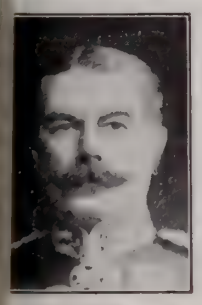
FRENCH ARMY CORPS MARCHING THROUGH PARIS TO RENDEZVOUS

Copyright, Underwood & Underwood

THE WAR IN EUROPE

GERMANY and Austria facing Russia, France, England, Belgium, Japan, Holland and possibly the Balkan States and Italy; so stands Europe to-day. In the background, the Hindus and the Mongolians begin to rouse themselves, as from a long sleep, peering across the ntinent and thinking—who knows what! Daily the first tremendous clash of nations draws nearer. Awaiting it, the Americas, dazed, ask what it all portends, and begin to take stock of their resources of peace—and war. Throughout the world industry stands afraid, stock exchanges remain closed, necessities of life rise in price. One topic alone occupies men's thoughts, the war in Europe. And while half the world is armed and in motion, the other half continues to work and to hope and to pray for peace.



LORD KITCHENER
England

SIR J. R. JELLICOE
England

ARCHDUKE FREDERICK
Austria

The news from day to day during the week closing Monday, August 17, has kept the public in a state of high-tension suspense. Successes of the French armies in Alsace and as allies of the Belgians before Liège have excited expectations of a supreme effort any day by the invading Germans. Reports of the capture of thousands of German spies in Belgium and the execution of one hundred increased the intensity of the situation. The North Sea was again declared closed to merchant ships. Significant military activities were noted in Japan. The English Government was said to have seized the gold reserves of German banks in London, amounting to $4,000,000. The St. Lawrence and other Canadian waters were mined, trans-Atlantic shipping held in port, and British war vessels on this side of the Atlantic ordered to search for German ships. Prices of foodstuffs in this country showed signs of soaring. Wednesday's news was largely a repetition with more details of Tuesday's reports of the relative positions of the Germans and the allies in Belgium, amounting almost entirely to statements of conflicting claims to victory all along the line, and predictions as to probable intentions and movements of the opposing armies. It was stated that 45,000 Japanese soldiers had embarked on transports supposedly in readiness for a possible attack upon the German colony at Kiauchau, China. Australia's battle fleet joined with the British squadron in Asiatic waters. King George of England inspected the army at Aldershot amidst wild enthusiasm; half a million men were reported as under arms in England, where a huge relief fund is being raised for the benefit of families of soldiers. Switzerland was said to have proposed becoming a gigantic hospital camp for the wounded of all nationalities. Foreign capitals believed a great battle imminent in Belgium. The plight of American tourists in France, Germany and England was still the subject of official activity. In Washington, the question of the use of the wireless by representatives of the nations at war in Europe became a State Department problem, the embargo placed by President Wilson on unneutral messages being objected to by several of the Powers. The imminence of a declaration of war between Great Britain and Austria-Hungary was the chief development noted in Thursday's news. The wireless problem at Washington reached the President in the form of an official protest from Germany against what was alleged to be a discriminating ban on cipher messages to and from the German embassy at Washington. Increasing cost of foodstuffs to the consumer throughout the country became a leading subject in Congress.

Friday's news contained the statement that the French Government was seeking to arrange a $100,000,000 war loan in this country through J. P. Morgan & Co., the money to be spent here for foodstuffs and non-military supplies. This seeming attempt to contravene the neutrality proclamation of the President, as it was apparent many would regard the loan, was, according to the press, to be referred to Washington for advice. A state of war had been declared between England and Austria as from midnight of August 12-13, diplomatic relations between the two countries being terminated. It was generally believed that two German battleships, the Goeben and Breslau, which had left Italian ports and taken refuge in the Dardanelles, had been purchased by Turkey, and further international complications were expected in consequence. Additional unconfirmed reports of fighting in Belgium stated that 17,000 men were engaged in one battle between the Germans and the Belgians, in which a large force of German cavalry was completely destroyed by heavy artillery in a desperate assault upon one of the smaller towns. Fragmentary reports of fighting in the Balkans indicated that Austrian troops were still busy there. By order of the President, Attorney-General McReynolds began a nation-wide inquiry into the rise of food prices.

By Monday, August 17, the most striking developments were the formal demand by England, France and Russia that Turkey make clear her course regarding the Goeben and Breslau, and the announcement that Japan had delivered an ultimatum to Germany, expiring Sunday, August 23, demanding that Germany remove or disarm all her warships now in Asiatic waters, and evacuate the leased territory of Kiauchau (the model German colony in China) for eventual restoration to China, and the proclamation by the Czar of early autonomy to the Poles on condition of their present loyalty.

It is impossible to construct a reliable record of the war on present information. Some of the most startling statements have been proven unfounded by the nature of later news. From the beginning, the headline announcements of battles fought, and even the accounts that followed in the news columns, have been out of all proportion to the actual occurrences as disclosed by such official reports as have come through. The effect is to create the impression of a strange unreality in it all.

GEN. JOSEPH JOFFRE
France

COUNT VON MOLTKE Germany

KING ALBERT
Belgium

It is as though a vast war game were being played by Europe. But for the grim fact of deaths by the thousand from shot and shell, the illusion of peaceful maneuvers between nations would be almost perfect. The world could suppose itself treated to a gigantic spectacle, in which each of these armed States is trying to outshine the others in brilliancy of military movements, perfection of mobilization machinery, might of war strength and skill in concealing plans of campaign. Not alone among the pleasant hills and streams with which the great stage is set, but back in the capitals of Europe, behind the scenes as it were, the illusion is carried out. There, instead of marching hosts, are alert authorities matching wits in the manipulation of news, so as to mystify the public in the enemy's country; legislative bodies passing war measures to overawe the enemy's government; leaders stirring up the populace to acts of patriotism that will confound and discourage the leaders in other lands. And the world looks on and guesses what may be revealed when the curtain goes up on the completed spectacle. And when it goes up, a committee of international militarists from "neutral" nations will pass judgment, will decide which nation or group of nations has outclassed which other and award it the "victory." Medals will be distributed, colors presented, salutes exchanged. The troops of all nations will march in grand review before their rulers assembled on one platform. A heaven-splitting hurrah will go up—and the world's first international sham war will be over.

Would that this were the case! But that one grim factor, Death, has dispelled all illusion. But if it could be otherwise! If the deaths that have occurred could be looked upon as accidental, and even now the whole tremendous affair be transformed into a spectacle and dismissed from the stage, its object attained! What an outburst of sobbing applause would break against the dome of heaven! How life would rebound from its present depression! What a tide of brotherhood would sweep over all the world! What an era of good will and prosperity would set in! Men and women everywhere clasping each other, exclaiming: "It was but a huge game; there will be no war: there is no hatred: the world is at peace!" It would be the millennium. But it is not to be.

THE CENTRAL SQUARE IN THE CITY OF LIEGE

TYPICAL WAR SCENE IN EUROPEAN CAPITALS AS TROOPS DEPART

And since the war is real, it is well to try to understand what is transpiring. To enable CHRISTIAN HERALD readers to do so, we shall give a careful analysis of the news each week. The press these days might have been printed right on the field of operations in hourly editions, and delivered miraculously at our doors, the ink still undried, so replete are the despatches. As a matter of fact, most of the definite war news has been forty-eight or more hours old when received over the wires; most of the incidental news has been based on censored (which sometimes means "doctored") reports at least twelve hours old; and practically all of the vivid accounts of army movements, battles by land and sea, mobilizing of reserves at home, have been premature. The conservative portion of the press is to be commended for its attempts to keep within bounds: only harm can follow upon the efforts of sensational papers to make the most of the situation.

Nothing like the present rigid censorship has previously been known, nor anything like the secrecy observed in regard to movements of armies and navies. If reports are to be credited, St. Petersburg is as much in the dark concerning the whereabouts of the Russian armies as is Paris. Perhaps more so. Paris is living in a state of anxious suspense, unaware, it is claimed, even of the names of the generals who will command the different French divisions which are now nobody knows where, on the frontier or across it. The German press is said to be practically silent on the war. One brief unconfirmed statement that 20,000 British troops had crossed into Belgium is the only item about England's aggressive aid of France that has appeared in the American press. There have been no battles fought; only brushes between comparatively small bodies of troops sent forward to uncover the enemy's position, or to screen the real movements of the main body. The fighting around Liège, which may turn out to have been half as severe as reported, has not yet been reported by unbiased, reliable authority.

When the actual battle in Belgium begins—as the series of terrific combats along a hundred-and-fifty-mile front will be called—censorship will crumple up like flimsy barricades before artillery. The momentum of that news will carry it past all obstruction. It will make itself heard, be the consequences what they may. It will report itself by telepathy. It will require no art in the telling, no padding of the story. It will be the biggest news of the age, fraught with weal and with woe for many peoples. And then all the clumsy efforts to make news out of rumor will be forgotten.

If that news which seems to bear the stamp of authenticity is reliable, a plan of the present movements of the armies of the warring nations can be worked out that may prove to be somewhat near the facts. The surprising thing of course, is the complete transfer from Austria to Germany of the chief place in the conflict. Austria began the trouble by declaring war upon Servia. Russia interposed an objection. Germany warned Russia off. Then, almost over night—within a period of ten days to be correct—Germany was at war with Russia, France, Belgium and England. And as instantly the principal scene of military operations shifted from the Russian frontier of Austria and Germany to the neutral country of Belgium.

This is not the first time in history that Belgium has unwillingly supplied a battlefield for other nations. Its present attraction to Germany lies in the fact that the frontier between Belgium and France is much less strongly protected by France than is the frontier between that country and Germany, the boundary of Alsace-Lorraine. So the German hosts have poured into Belgium, sending skirmishing parties in force to clear the way to the frontier. Austria has also massed troops at the southwest corner of Germany on the French frontier, gaining thereby a declaration of war from France and from England. The German advance appears to have followed the Meuse River, which was crossed on military pontoon bridges. Liège gave the invaders their first check, the Belgians according to most reports, preventing the German advance for days. Brussels, the capital of Belgium, was threatened, possibly to divide the Belgian forces. French troops have been thrown into Belgium, and are supposed to be taking up their chief position at Namur, a strongly fortified Belgian city southwest of Liège at the confluence of the Meuse and Sambre. The British land forces are understood to be on the march from the coast to join the French and Belgians at Namur, where the first clash in the great battle may take place. French troops have also penetrated into Alsace, and now occupy strategic positions there—never to be forgiven if they relinquish a foot of this soil, wrested from France only forty-four years ago.

The disposition of the main body of German troops is not known. It is likely that they are advancing in two or three divisions, chiefly along the valley of the Meuse, Liège no longer offering successful opposition, and will engage the allies at Namur, Givet, Nancy and other points simultaneously, the line of battle being from one hundred to one hundred and fifty miles long. At just what points the allies will present the strongest defense, is equally uncertain, but Namur is pitched on by most military judges as the probable key to the situation. Even as this is being written the greatest battle in history may be on. Experts, however, believe that the two huge armies cannot be gotten ready for the supreme test inside of two weeks. Skirmishes in force, feints, assaults upon small places for strategic purposes, will herald the slow but steady approach of these mighty forces to give battle. A million men on either side, it is claimed. Indications are that once begun, the battle, or series of combats all along the line, will continue for days before a decisive victory shall have been won. And each such combat, because of the numbers engaged at every point and the intensity of feeling between them, may equal the greatest battles of former wars. Never has war presented such possibilities for slaughter. The very magnitude of the struggle and of the havoc that must ensue makes other nations wonder if it is indeed a reality, this vast hostile movement of armed men who two brief weeks ago would have fraternized in the capital of any nation of Europe to celebrate some pageant of peace. The impending battlefield is, in a general sense, the famous field of Waterloo. Yet the coincidence of such a conflict's occurring between France and Germany upon that historic ground is not, however, so remarkable. If Germany and France were ever to renew their ancient struggle over Alsace-Lorraine, where else could it take place? From Waterloo to Strassburg, then, is the valley of the shadow of death. Here is to be the impact of monster armies, the thunder of artillery, the charge of cavalry, the crash of rifle fire, the shouts of multitudes seeking each other's lives, the screams of the wounded, the horrible cries of dying horses, the end of a million happy firesides, the sapping of nations, the spectacle of the Christian age. Will it be the beginning of the end of War?

EMPEROR WILLIAM OF GERMANY CONFERRING WITH STAFF OFFICERS AT MANEUVERS

THE NAVIES OF THE AIR

WILL THEY BE A DECIDING FACTOR IN THE GREAT EUROPEAN STRUGGLE?

WHILE the continental war is progressing by land and sea, in which practically all the European nations are involved, little attention seems to have been paid thus r to the probabilities of the aerial navies of the rious powers playing a commanding rôle as the uggle develops.

To understand clearly how the different governnts compare in the strength of their aerial rces, one need only glance at a table compiled by fred W. Lawson, editor of Aircraft, and pubhed in the New York World a few days ago. r. Lawson, who is regarded as a leading authority aeronautics, gives these figures:

AERIAL FORCES OF EUROPEAN POWERS

rmany	Dirigibles 30 / Aeroplanes 1,000		$100,000,000
ıstria	Dirigibles 7 / Aeroplanes 400		16,000,000
ance	Dirigibles 20 / Aeroplanes 1,100		60,000,000
ıgland	Dirigibles 7 / Aeroplanes. 400		15,000,000
ıssia	Dirigibles 18 / Aeroplanes 800		40,000,000

Belgium, Switzerland and Italy, and doubtless hers, have developed the science of military aeroautics to some extent, although in smaller degree an the great leaders.

If the balance of power in the European struggle to be decided by aerial artillery, as many farseeing experts assert, this comparison of the rength of the Powers in dirigibles alone becomes f tremendous significance. Mr. Lawson, who reently furnished the United States War Departent with these figures showing the aerial strength f every nation, writes in the New York World at while the radius of action of an aeroplane with ull war equipment is approximately 300 miles, oming and going over an enemy's country—that is, 00 miles without landing—the radius of the latest ype of Zeppelin dirigible, war-equipped, is 600 iles each way, or 1,200 miles without alighting. he up-to-date dirigible is a strong, reliable, swift attle-cruiser of the air. It has a lifting capacity f fifty tons and can maintain itself in the air ontinuously for forty-eight hours, covering 1,200 iles, with a war load. It carries a wireless outfit, as guns on all sides and on top and bottom, and orpedo tubes, and it is capable of discharging high explosives weighing from 250 to 300 pounds. Further, he asserts that the dirigible of the rigid type like the Zeppelin, with its tremendous speed of 50 to 60 miles an hour, its power of swift ascension to a height of 10,000 feet, far beyond the reach of land guns, and its ability to hover almost motionless, so that it may deliver its fire or drop its torpedoes with deadly accuracy, all combine to make it the most formidable of foes for an attack on fleet, army, fortress or city. Just how a fleet would fare if assaulted by such an aerial enemy had better be left to the imagination. It should be added that these giant dirigibles are fully equipped with searchlights which, while illuminating a wide area of sea or land surface beneath, leave the dirigibles themselves under the cover of comparative darkness.

GUN FOR USE AGAINST AIRCRAFT

IT IS THIS TYPE OF AIRCRAFT, THE ZEPPELIN DIRIGIBLE, THAT IS MOST FEARED

It has been said that the aeroplane can be utilized as the foe of the dirigible in a contest above the clouds. This may be true, but those governments that have developed dirigible navies have foreseen this possibility. One writer tells of a plan of aerial campaign by which the dirigibles proceed in squadrons, each group of four mammoth airships convoyed by a large number of aeroplanes, whose duty it would be to ward off attack by other planes and to guard the larger vessel against sudden assault.

But the dirigible, or at least the German Zeppelin of the rigid type, has protective appliances which would largely reduce the probabilities of successful attack by aeroplanes. A Zeppelin is a number of smaller balloons assembled in a framework of laminated wood and steel, so interlaced as to give a maximum strength, the whole representing a consecutive series of protective coverings from 12 to 18 in number, so arranged and reinforced that even if 10 or 12 of these were penetrated, the great vessel of the skies would remain practically uninjured and fit for duty.

Dr. Armgaard Karl Graves, in an article in Collier's for August 15, says: "Germany has the most up-to-date aerial fleet in the world. The budget of the Reichstag of 1908-1909 allowed and provided for the building and maintenance of twelve dirigibles of the Zeppelin type. It is a fact, though, that Germany has three times the number she officially acknowledges. The dirigible balloon centers in Germany are five and are situated at vitally strategic points. There are two on the French border, one on the Russian border, one on the Atlantic Coast, and a central station near Berlin. The exact places are Strassburg, Frankfort on the Main, Posen, Wilhelmshafen, and Berlin. This does not include the marvelous station at Helgoland in the North Sea, this being a strategic point in relation to Great Britain.

"The German aerial corps is called the Luftschiffer Abteilung and is composed of ten battalions, each consisting of 350 men. They are all absolutely trained for this branch of the service. Only the smartest mechanics and artificers are selected. In the higher positions the most intelligent and bravest officers hold command. Picture the havoc a dozen such vultures could create attacking a city like London or Paris. Present-day defense against these ships is totally inadequate. In attacking large places, the Zeppelins would rise to a height of from 6,000 to 8,000 feet, at which distance these huge cigar-shaped engines of death, 700 feet long, would appear the size of a football, and no bigger. I know that Zeppelins have successfully sailed aloft at an altitude of 10,000 feet. Picture them at that elevation, everybody aboard in warm, comfortable quarters, ready to drop explosives to the ground. At 8,000 feet the small target a Zeppelin affords would move at a rate of speed of from thirty-five to sixty miles an hour. The possible chances of being hit by terrestrial gunfire are infinitesimally small. This does not take into account the vast opportunities that a dirigible has for night attacks or the possibility of hiding among the clouds. The X 15, sailing over London, could drop explosives down and create terrible havoc. They don't have to aim. They simply dump overboard some of the new explosive of the German Government, this new chemical having the property of setting on fire anything that it hits, and they sail on. And remember that wherever the new German explosive strikes, conflagration begins."

Altogether, it is beyond doubt that the four great Powers, Germany, France, Russia and Austria, have looked forward to the possibility of their aerial forces playing an important, if not indeed a decisive part in the war. England, with only seven dirigibles, is hardly in this class, and evidently regards the whole question of availability of airships as too indefinite at the present stage of their development to be trusted for successful attack or defense in a great emergency.

SARAH PERKINS AND THE MONEY TRUST

BY LEAVITT ASHLEY KNIGHT

(Concluded)

Opening of Sarah's Speech

"WHEN I was a little girl," began Sarah, "a lot of the children in my neighborhood used to play in an old sand pit on the edge of the town. It was very bright yellow sand, fine and dry and clean. And the pit lay on a sunny, sheltered slope. It was the nicest place you could imagine for children to play—"

"Excuse me. But—er—I have a luncheon engagement," whispered Hermann Fuchs to the chairman, and he tiptoed from the room.

Sarah Perkins flushed ever so faintly, but kept bravely on. "Of course we all wanted to play there. But we couldn't, unless we first went to Micky Maguire's shanty, and gave Micky five cents. For Micky was a sly old fellow who tenanted the little farm of which the sand pit was a part. He had fenced in the sand pit, and he made several dollars a month selling admission to it.

"Now there were three crowds in the town, who wanted to use the sand pit. Sometimes our crowd would come rapping at Micky's back door, and find another crowd already there. Then old Micky would squint greedily and cackle: 'Well, an' which of ye'll be payin' th' most?' Of course, our crowd would pool pennies, and the other crowd would do the same; and then Micky would admit the richer bidder.

"That would usually anger the losing crowd, and they would start throwing stones and calling names. Sometimes we'd have fights to the finish and go home all covered with mud, blood, and glory. Our mothers would weep over us, but that secretly pleased us. Our fathers would beat us; but that added to our heroism. Our Sunday school teachers would tell us that we would go to perfectly horrid places after we were dead; but that didn't interest us. We only wanted to go to perfectly nice places like the sand pit, while we were alive.

"Well, we finally lapsed into a state of continuous and open warfare. Our crowd waylaid members of the other crowds on their way home from school and grocery, and cut the buttons off their clothes and pasted gobs of tar in their hair. And they returned the compliments when convenient. One day I came home howling, with my pretty hair cut off tight to my scalp and my scalp painted bright green.

"My father thereupon marched off to the neighbors, and soon he was heading a committee of ten men in the direction of Sam Billing's. Sam Billing was the town druggist, and incidentally the owner of the fatal sand pit. They laid the whole matter before Sam, and my father told him that in the interests of peace he ought to forbid Micky to rent the use of the sand pit. Micky must be content with selling sand to masons and builders.

"'And if he won't,' my father ended, 'I and my neighbors will take over the lease of the pit ourselves.'

"'All right,' Sam agreed.

"And that very day the sand pit was locked against all of us children forever."

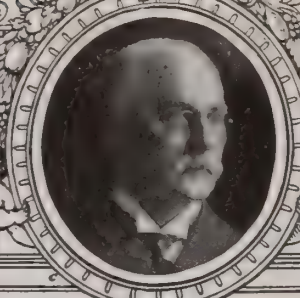
WICKEDNESS OF WAR

"A sound of battle is in the land." Jer. 50: 22



A SERMON

BY

David James Burrell, D.D., LL.D.*

ON A May morning in 1879 General Skobeleff stood on the battlefield of Shipka Pass. A year had passed since the close of the Turco-Russian War. He paused and uncovered at a wooden cross, marking the grave of a heroic standard-bearer. Then he silently surveyed the field. The snow was melting; the shallow graves had been uncovered by the sweeping winds of winter, and dogs and wolves had wrought grim havoc. Here and there were torn uniforms and human bones. He said to his aide-de-camp, "See how these skulls are grinning at us." Then, after a pause. he added:

> The drying-up a single tear has more
> Of honest fame than shedding seas of gore.

On a July evening in 1863 President Lincoln was at Gettysburg, where the greatest battle of our Civil War had just been won. He stood for a while in silence, viewing the bloody field, and then said, with tears in his voice, "Oh, this is awful, awful!—but it must go on!"

Is that true? Must it go on? General Sherman, facing the situation with rhetoric as rude as his cannon, said, "War is hell!" Why then must it go on?

The author of War is the Prince of Darkness. It came in with sin and will never cease until sin is shaken out of the earth. It began with the beginning of time. Out of the primeval shadows strode Cain with a red mark on his forehead and a bludgeon in his hand; and the embattled host fell in behind him to pursue its sanguinary march along the ages. The oldest song in existing literature is the Sword Song of Lamech, "Hear my voice and hearken unto my speech; for, behold, I have slain a man!" In the rude period of the Judges the fierce cry of Samson is heard as he returns from Philistia, "I have slain them; heaps on heaps, masses on masses, a thousand men!" On the heights of Esdraelon the daughters of Israel are shouting, "The stars in their courses fought against Sisera!" A father bereaved of his favorite son, slain in the battle of Gilboa, is staggering up the stairway to his chamber on the housetop moaning, "O Absalom, my son, my son; would God that I had died for thee!" The banners of Assyria are waving on the mountains that encircle the Holy City; and presently a long procession of captives moves eastward, and the glory of the Chosen People vanishes in the darkness of an unbroken night.

So runs the record of the first forty centuries. Then out of the darkness rises a star in the east. Shiloh comes, the Prince of Peace, and angels are singing, "Glory to God in the highest; on earth peace; good will to men!"

Forces Against War

Now, surely the sword will return to its scabbard. Was ever a sweeter birthsong than his, "Peace! Good will toward men"? Was ever a more irenic proclamation than his Golden Rule; or ever a more pronounced "peace policy" than that which he outlined for his church on the farewell night: "Put up thy sword into the sheath; for they that take the sword shall perish by it"?

But scarcely had the shadows lifted from the tragedy on Golgotha before the gates of Janus were again thrown open, and the nine historic persecutions were under way! Constantine is marching out against the enemies of Christ with a red cross banner over him bearing the legend, "In this sign, conquer!" The Huns and Vandals are abroad. The Saracens sweep westward till Martel the Hammer drives them back. The Crusaders are fighting in old Esdraelon. Centuries pass: thrones and dynasties rise and totter to their fall; and always, always to the mad music of the sword. War! War! War! When shall the end be?

What was it Lincoln said? "This is awful, awful,—but it must go on!" Is that true? Must it go on? How long, O Lord, how long? It is written, "He that believeth shall not make haste." The leaven is in the lump. There are forces at work which are destined in the fulness of time to bring in the consummation so devoutly to be wished. What are they?

The first is War itself. War is war's own suicidal draught. Every gun fired in this mad Pan-European carnival is as another nail in its coffin. All hail the more powerful explosives, the more effective weapons, the frightful airships and the dreadnoughts! These are instruments of the last violence with which Satan must needs vex the world before he cometh out of it. Thus the dragon stings himself to death.

The second of the forces at work for the ending of war is Reason. The sober second thought of men and nations is producing a wide and ever-widening conviction that war is stupid, irrational, absurd.

Think of the waste of material resource involved in it. The Great Powers in conflict have been squandering thousands of millions a year in anticipation of it, and are now impoverishing themselves to carry it on! In our own country, sixty-six per cent. of our assessments go to the supporting of a skeleton army, a needless navy and a procession of battleships sailing under full speed toward the junk-heap every year! Think of that, ye taxpayers! To be sure, this is a sordid argument; but, as an appeal to the soul of the average man, it is bound to be heard from in the long run.

Strides Toward Peace

Then think of the frightful waste of life. "See how these skulls are grinning at us!" In the Wierts Gallery at Brussels there is a picture called "The Welcome of Napoleon to Hell." As the great soldier enters the gate he is met by a multitude of his victims, some with scarred faces, others with handless arms; and haggard mothers are holding up their dead infants to greet the author of their woes. Alas for those who sound the tocsin of war!

If the sacrifice were inevitable, in the interest of justice or humanity, we must needs commend it. But most of the bloodshed in history has been without rhyme or reason. It is safe to say that of the millions enlisted in this European war, the vast majority are as ignorant of the casus belli as was Southey's veteran in the tale of Blenheim:

> "And everybody praised the duke
> Who that great fight did win."
> "But what good came of it at last?"
> Quoth little Peterkin.
> "Why, that I cannot tell," said he,
> "But 'twas a famous victory."

Must it go on? Is there no way of settling international disputes save by force of arms? Everybody knows there is.

The first conference at The Hague was called by the Czar of Russia in 1899 in the hope of placing a limit upon the increasing armaments of the nations. That was a great proposition, so far as it went. But the conference went further and authorized a Peace Court for the adjustment of such disputes as might be voluntarily submitted to it.

The second conference was called by the President of the United States in 1907 to consider the wisdom of establishing a court for the adjudication of all cases except such as involve questions of national honor. Observe the exception. There was a practical agreement among the forty-four nations represented as to the end desired; but there was also a decided difference of opinion as to the best method of attaining it.

The Root of the Matter

The third conference was held in June, 1910, when it was proposed that a Permanent Court of Arbitral Justice should be established, for the settlement of all international disputes, including questions of national honor. This was a mighty stride toward the desired end. For so long as questions of national honor are reserved for battle there can be no assurance of final peace. Why should the duello be continued among civilized nations when civilized men have abandoned it?

A fourth conference was desired, which, it was fondly hoped, would erect a permanent Court of Arbitration as broadly efficient for the adjudication of international quarrels as common courts of justice are for the settlement of disputes among men. But, alas, some of the great Powers were not ready; and while they tarried the beacons caugh fire!

But there is a third force at work which is surel destined to bring in the reign of universal peace This is the Gospel of Christ, which goes to th root of the matter by proposing to make an utte end of sin. It does not treat war with a plaster, a if it were a skin disease, or apply a few stitches a to a superficial wound. The race is afflicted wit a heart disease, of which war is the most obviou symptom; wherefore the Gospel aims at nothin less than a world-wide change of heart. And thi is being slowly but surely effected under the lumin ous shadow of the Cross, by the inculcation of th two great doctrines of Christ, namely, the Father hood of God and the consequent Brotherhood o Man.

This leaven is in the lump and is destined yet to leaven it. The movements which have been indicated are due to the calm operation of the Gospel along the ages; but the desired end will never be reached until the hearts of men and nations are so changed that the conditions which make war seem necessary shall come to an end. And the Gospel alone can accomplish that. When its spirit shall prevail universally all wrongs shall cease and we shall have the Truce of God. Then the wolf with drawn fangs and the inoffensive lamb shall lie down together and a little child—the Christ Child—shall lead them.

This Gospel is all too slowly but surely overspreading the earth; and, by the same token, sin is being rooted out of it. One of the wise sayings of Lincoln was, "Nothing is ever settled until it is settled right." The wolf cannot lie down with the lamb until its nature is transformed; and Christ alone can do that. Despite all pacts and truces and conferences men will continue to smite with the fist, and nations, however their dogs may be held in leash, will still hate and quarrel and gnash their teeth, until Shiloh comes. But, blessed be God, the outcome is sure.

The Doom of War

The world rolls around every twenty-four hours; and with every revolution it comes a little nearer to the ultimate reign of peace. And the Gospel is its keynote. If that assertion be challenged let us take a map of the world and draw a line about every spot of ground where the Gospel has been preached; then observe how we have shut out night and barbarism from that charmed circle and have shut in all the influences that make for humanity and progress, for the peace of nations and the welfare of men.

The Gospel has not been in this world of ours for nineteen hundred years in vain. The beneficent grip of Christ, making for ultimate peace, has been not only upon the hearts of his people but upon the reins of his enemies as well. He has made the very wrath of men to praise him. The roads which Cæsar built for his legions, as he supposed, proved to be highways for Christ's messengers of peace. The vast armaments of the nations are all working the same way. War is their purpose, but in the logic of God peace will be their end.

The grain of mustard seed which was planted by the Son of Man in the earth is becoming a tree whose branches spread so far that all nations may sit in the shadow of it. Wherefore let us greet one another with the old word "Maranatha!" The Lord cometh! The time draws near when every eye shall behold him, when every tongue shall confess him, when every knee shall bow before him.

> For lo, the days are hastening on,
> By prophet bards foretold,
> When with the ever circling years
> Comes round the Age of Gold;
> When peace shall over all the earth
> Its ancient splendors fling,
> And the whole world give back the song
> Which now the angels sing.

Then swords shall be beaten into plowshares and spears into pruninghooks; and every man shall dwell at peace under his own vine and fig tree. Roll swifter round, ye wheels of time, and bring the welcome day!

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, August 30. Matthew 10: 38. "And he that taketh not his cross, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me." Close students of the Gospel have pointed out that here for the first time in the discourses of our Lord occurs the ominous word "cross." Christ declares himself the leader of the cross-bearers. He carries his cross at the head of the procession. No one joins his company without finding that a cross has been appointed for him and fitted to his shoulders. The cross which the world laid upon our Lord was, on the world's part, a declaration that Jesus Christ of Nazareth was a great criminal. Though unable to prove the charges of blasphemy and high treason, they sentenced him to die the death of a dangerous man on the gallows. The cross is the stigma which the scornful world has fastened on the Saviour. This stigma passes over to those who embrace Christ. No Christian can pass through this world without experiencing some time and in some way that the world despises him for being a Christian. Discipleship begins with taking up this cross. The loyal believers brave the ridicule which the world heaps on their belief. If any one begins to wince under the scorn of worldly men and seeks ways to avert their scorn and yet remain a disciple, he makes a wrong calculation. Christ tells him: "What you shun as a disgrace is the greatest honor. But you have not the eye of faith to see the glory of the cross. You are not worthy of me."

MONDAY, August 31. Matthew 10: 39. "He that findeth his life shall lose it: and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." What a paradoxical statement of losses and gains! To grasp its meaning, a person must be a spiritual man with spiritual discernment. There are two kinds of life: one of this earth, earthy, sensuous, devilish; the other of heaven, heavenly. A person may gain or lose either, but not both. One is always obtained at the sacrifice of the other. The carnal man, when he hears the word "life," thinks of physical wants, temporal enjoyments, social rank, worldly renown, etc., and of the means that will procure these things. He sets out to find them. He is engrossed with the cares of life: food, raiment, money, possessions, fame, wealth. The life beyond does not enter into his thoughts, or if it does, he dismisses it as an unpleasant and disturbing element. He thinks he cannot give his time and energy to the pursuit of the life eternal. Well, in the same ratio as he realizes his secular ambition he gets away from his future happiness. Contrariwise, the person who learns to sacrifice his earthly interests because he aims at things beyond these transitory scenes, gains a life the fulness of which cannot be expressed at all in terms of earthly value. Ask Lazarus and Dives which of them made the better bargain.

TUESDAY, September 1. Matthew 10: 40. "He that receiveth you receiveth me, and he that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me." The Lord is about to close his great discourse to the disciples whom he is sending forth on their evangelistic mission. He assures them of his personal interest in their work and shows them the dignity of their calling. They go out as the representatives of Christ. They hold a commission directly from the Saviour of men. In them and in their preaching Jesus visits sinners. Theirs is not an inferior substitute for, but the genuine continuation of Jesus' ministry. What Jesus said and did personally and immediately during his public ministry, that he does mediately through them. Any person who receives such a minister receives a visit of Jesus and a message from the Father in heaven. Every believer can verify this statement of our Lord.

WEDNESDAY, September 2. Matthew 10: 41, 42. "He that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet shall receive a prophet's reward; and he that receiveth a righteous man in the name of a righteous man shall receive a righteous man's reward. And whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward." Together with the preceding, this text with its cheering promises is to assure the disciples that their mission will prove a godsend to the men who open their doors to them and minister to their wants. The ministers of Christ are here affectionately called the Lord's "little ones," and are placed in a direct line of succession to the ancient prophets of God and to those sincere observers of the laws of God who were an ornament to the church of the old covenant. The ministers of Christ too are prophets, though often their dignity is not recognized by worldly people, who regard and treat them as ignorant, feeble men. Like their ancient forebears, the ministers of Christ publish the grace and truth of God for the enlightenment of the sin-darkened hearts of men and for the relief of their sin-burdened consciences. The ministers of Christ too hunger and thirst after righteousness. And if any one will receive them as what they really are, if any one will acknowledge that they are bearers of tidings of great joy, he will become a sharer in the reward which God has fixed on the labors of these servants. Whoever speeds the messengers of the King of heaven on their errands aids them in their work, cheers them in their suffering and thereby becomes in Christ's view a partner in their business, even though he had done no more than offer them a refreshing cup of cold water when they were exhausted.

THURSDAY, September 3. Mark 6: 31. "Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place, and rest a while." These words were spoken after the disciples had returned from their mission and had told our Lord "all things, both what they had done, and what they had taught." They were fatigued with the work of their ministry, but they did not complain. They spoke enthusiastically of their success, and since multitudes of people were crowding about the Lord, so much so that they had not even time to eat their frugal meal, they were ready to go on with their work. But our Lord rules that they must now take a vacation. They need rest. The ministry of the Gospel means work, hard work, work like that of a soldier during a campaign, or of a galley slave. While at their work, the Lord does not spare his servants, and he does not want them to spare themselves. But he does not want them to exhaust their strength to a degree which would render them unfit for further work. Seasons of rest in the midst of labor have the Lord's sanction. The value of these seasons becomes enhanced to the servants by their having the Lord with them, and by being withdrawn from the bustle and turmoil of the noisy world. Jesus took the disciples to a secluded spot, and there, no doubt, their work and experiences were gone over in many a conversation. Thus even their rest was turned to spiritual advantage: it served the purpose of deepening impressions which they had received by reflection and meditation, and by retrospection gave them an estimate of the wonders of God's grace performed through them.

FRIDAY, September 4. John 6: 5. "Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat?" The rest of Jesus and his disciples in the desert, however, must have been brief. Soon he is sought again by the multitudes. From all directions they flock to him. Many of them are pilgrims bound for the Passover at Jerusalem. They must make a detour to meet Jesus and risk a delay in their journey. Many of them may have been ill prepared for this. Provisions were not plentiful at that time of the year, and great supply stations were probably at some distance from the place where Jesus met his callers. He began at once to teach them and heal their sick. Meanwhile it was getting late, and our Lord showed no sign of wanting to dismiss the multitudes. Philip seems to have been watching the situation. He is beginning to foresee a calamity, if these people are not fed. Suddenly he finds himself addressed by his own thought. What Jesus asks him is the very thing that had perplexed Philip. But why did Jesus ask that question? John says, "to prove" Philip. Jesus was not asking advice; his question was intended to show Philip that the mind of the Master was busy with plans for the feeding of these multitudes. Jesus had assumed the duty of host to these people. He and his disciples are to make provisions for their entertainment. What should Philip have answered to the Lord's question? "Lord, thou knowest?" Jesus wished to draw out Philip's faith, and finding his very thought anticipated, Philip should have all the more readily cast his mental burden upon the Lord. Our very troubles become occasions for the manifestation of God's omniscience and power, and teach us lessons of faith that we never learn in easy and prosperous times.

SATURDAY, September 5. Matthew 14: 16. "They need not depart; give ye them to eat." In his perplexity, Philip had begun to make a hurried calculation of the supplies necessary to meet the demand which the Lord's question had created. He was soon at his wits' end. The disciples cut the Gordian knot by suggesting to Jesus that he should send the people home and let them buy their own provisions. Did Judas perhaps originate that suggestion? The Lord dismisses it at once. He declares the suggestion out of place. And now the faith of all the disciples is put to a test by the Lord's order: "Give ye them to eat." Jesus knew how ill-prepared the disciples were to provide a meal for this multitude. His order could mean nothing else than this: "Share what you have with our guests. Make ready to serve the repast from what you have on hand. Though you are poor, you must not be stingy. Spread a beggar's banquet for our guests, and await the outcome." When God sends Elijah to the widow at Sarepta, and says: "Feed me this man!" when the Lord's hungry and naked clients, the distressed and homeless, knock at a humble cottage, where frugality is butler and parsimony cook every day of the week, and ask for food, clothing, shelter—on such occasions the Lord says to his poor saints: "Give them of what you have. Make no excuses. I could have sent them to the millionaire in the next street, but I chose to make you my steward. Give them, and see what happens to your cruse of oil and to your flour barrel!"

These Daily Meditations by Professor Dau will appear in each issue during 1914.

SUMMER NOTES OF THE WORKERS

—SEVEN DENOMINATIONS, the Baptist, Christian, Congregational, Methodist, Presbyterian, English Lutheran and the United Presbyterian, are now affiliated in the work of the Mount Hermon Federate School of Missions, which held a most successful conference at Mount Hermon in the Santa Cruz Mountains, California, this July. A veritable host of missionaries was present. The Federate School is making its influence for spiritual uplift felt in its home State.

—THE JULY SUMMER SCHOOLS at Northfield, Mass., for the study of Sunday school methods completed the eleventh year of the series with the largest attendance and greatest interest yet recorded. Immediately following these meetings came the big annual General Conference, beginning August 1, the list of speakers including several noted men from abroad as well as Northfield's favorite Americans. A special series of Bible studies was arranged to follow the general conference, Rev. John Thomas of Liverpool in charge, his addresses being on the Four Great Christian Foundations.

—"ELIM HOME," on Bell Island, South Norwalk, Conn., the interdenominational resting-place for city missionaries and Christian workers, has had more than the usual number of guests this summer. Under the leadership of Rev. William James, founder of Elim, the spiritual services have been well attended. The Home is a faith work exclusively, being supported by the gifts of friends who believe that the home or foreign missionary needs an occasional rest and an opportunity for physical recuperation.

For What?

IN EUROPE to-day seven countries are engaged in bloody warfare.—FOR WHAT?

Seventeen million men have been called from their peaceful vocations and are engaged in trying to slaughter one another.—FOR WHAT?

Of these seventeen million over thirty thousand have already been murdered.—FOR WHAT?

Wherefore it follows that over thirty thousand wives, mothers and children have been bereaved of husband, son or father.—FOR WHAT?

And every day will add to the number of the dead, to the host of the bereaved, to the lamentations of the fatherless.—FOR WHAT?

In America tens of thousands of sons, husbands, and fathers have deserted their legitimate pursuits at the call of the fatherlands, and are clamoring on the Atlantic seaboard for a chance to go home and be slaughtered.—FOR WHAT?

Millions of persons not only in Europe, but all over the world have been saddened in heart, depleted in pocket because of this war.—FOR WHAT?

The patriots of '76 went to war for a principle, the establishing of which had an immediate effect upon their pocketbooks, their pride, and an ultimate result in upbuilding the whole country. When the war in Europe is over every person who survives will be poorer, every moral sense blunted, every sense of justice dulled—the progress of civilization retarded no one knows how many years.—FOR WHAT?

Ask the potentates who sit upon the thrones. Ask the wastrels whose personal aggrandizement is being reared upon the grief of the people. Ask the spirit of militarism that hovers like a vampire over the uplift of humanity. Ask the diplomats who might have prevented it, but did not. Ask the people themselves in the name of common sense why and for what purpose a crime of such enormity should be permitted.

War's Realities

A HORSE, in deadly pain from wounds or burns, will scream. The screams of children, from fright or pain, we have all heard. Women scream in moments of utmost agony. But the scream of a man—that is a rare sound. Yet there is one place where it may be heard. On the battlefield. Bodies torn to pieces; every nerve in agony; the mind and will altogether uncontrolled because of the furious anguish—then men will scream.

It is not a pleasant sound to fancy, nor are the sights accompanying the sound easy to contemplate. But the time has come when the world should wake up to a realization of what war actually is.

Alfred Noyes has painted a picture of a modern battlefield in his war tale, The Wine Press:

> The rifles flogged their wallowing herds,
> Flogged them down to die.
> Down on their slain the slayers lay,
> And the shrapnel thrashed them into the clay,
> And tossed their limbs like tattered birds
> Through a red volcanic sky.

Yet the battle scenes, hideous and revolting as they are, are only half, or less than half, the horror. We cannot forget the tiny children throughout Europe, stretching out their hands and crying for fathers who will never come home again. We cannot forget the wailing of women or the dry-eyed, half-mad anguish of young wives who strain their babies to their breasts and try in vain to find comfort for their breaking hearts.

Yet all this may fail to stir us because it is so far away. Look, then, at the baby in your home; his soft skin, his tender flesh, his little hands and feet, his mouth and eyes. Think of bearing and raising him only to be torn to pieces in a battlefield; think that every soldier dead or dying was once tender and helpless like him. Try to fancy the horror of soft human flesh pitted against the steel of projectiles, the rain of leaden bullets from musket and machine gun, the fury of bomb and bayonet. This is war. General Sherman found the only right word for it. War is hell.

And while we write, nearly two million men, almost equally divided into two hostile armies, are facing one another on the fair, fragrant fields of Europe, each group to hurl death to the other, while a grim fleet of death-dealing warships prepares to dash forth and meet the attack of other warships waiting, while the armies of bomb-throwing airships make ready for their murderous flight.

Nor does the horror cease when the war is done. Far and wide will stretch the desolate fields; the vacant chairs of home circles will call out through the years for the dear ones dead; poverty, hunger and fear will follow; maimed bodies and sightless eyes will remind neighbors and strangers of the havoc of nineteen fourteen.

Nineteen fourteen! Nineteen centuries since Jesus was born!

Let God Finish

AMONG the things that vex the thoughtful mind is our sense of the imperfection of our efforts in many ways. Our brighter plans are rarely carried to satisfactory completion; our bravest efforts fall far short of our high ideal; our noblest aspirations, as we approach them, seem to recede until they are well-nigh inaccessible. Incompleteness is, in some sort, apparently inevitable to all the greater experiences of human life. But this is in itself a sign of progress. Our existence here is a training-school, where each successive lesson, if rightly learned, is a step forward.

At the entrance to the library of Cornell University is placed a tablet to the memory of a gracious woman who proposed and planned a great work there, but whose generous design was defeated by her untimely death. The tablet bears this beautiful inscription:

> The good she tried to do shall stand as if 'twere done:
> God finishes the work by noble souls begun.

Indeed, no man "finishes." Jesus, while on earth, said, "I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do"; and on the cross he said: "It is finished." And so it was—the work of man's redemption by his "obedience unto death," and the laying of the cornerstone of the kingdom of heaven on earth was accomplished. But the upbuilding of his church and his kingdom became our task, and it has been all through the centuries going forward in the hands of those who serve him. In that high case, as in every other, God himself will finish the work which the generations of his people have so earnestly striven to accomplish. To him will belong the glory of full completion. We may prepare the soil and sow the Gospel seed, but he alone gives the harvest.

The Rise in Food Prices

TAKING the war in Europe as a pretext, the speculators in foodstuffs and the wholesalers and retailers in combination with them, have contrived to force up the prices of the necessaries of life to a degree that is criminal. Almost every article of the long list of domestic supplies is held at extortionate figures. Meats, vegetables, eggs and poultry, flour, wheat and sugar, all share in the general rise. Even the producers are in league with the movement, farmers included. There is no attempt to justify such a course; indeed, there can be none, as there is no shortage anywhere. Attempts by certain Western packers to create an artificial shortage by holding back cargoes were quickly abandoned when prosecution threatened.

Congress has taken up the question of high food prices and there may be an investigation. But while we wait for congressional action, the harm will have been done and the manipulators at the markets will have reaped their harvest at the expense of a defenseless public. In New York City the municipal authorities have put the matter in the hands of a citizens' committee, who will hunt up the price-boosters and secure their punishment under the criminal law as conspirators. Every community has a right to protect its members against an evil which takes toll from a majority of the articles that go to the provisioning of the average household, but bears most heavily on the poor man's table. It is a time for housewives' leagues, consumers' societies and citizen committees to act.

Looking Ahead

OUR thoughtful contemporary, The Independent, makes the observation that the beginning of the present war marked the close of ancient history. This may prove true in several ways. Not only will it be very likely to remodel the map of Europe and readjust the relative standing of the nations, but it may also bring to an end the costly traditions of vast standing armies and monstrous fleets. If in the course of the war it should develop that the supreme power hereafter is to be the control of the air, and that dirigible and aeroplane are destined to supersede battleship and cruiser, it will certainly be a wonderful transformation.

Greatest of all will be the change that must inevitably come in the world's enlightened estimate of the value of war. When the blood and treasure have been spent to exhaustion, when the last gun has been fired, the last mine exploded, the last fortress razed, the last fleet rendered helpless, then let us hope there will come such a universal revulsion against war that the heart of the world will be struck through with the conviction that war is the most wicked of all man's follies, the most wanton of his crimes, the most futile of his many efforts to adjust by brute force what could and should have been set right by reason and just laws. May that day soon come! And when it does dawn at last, then the old world will be glad to renounce forever the costly and perilous pomp of militarism, and the nations will be ready to join in solemn compact, binding themselves to compulsory arbitration for a long period. Rehabilitation after this war will take more than one generation. A hundred years of compulsory arbitration under international law would be a long step toward ushering in the age of peace—that blessed time toward which the expectant and hopeful eyes of the Lord's people have so long been turned.

It may be the will of God to bring about his own purposes through this tribulation. "The way of man," said the prophet, "is not in himself." Rulers may make war and armies may march; but the issues rest with the Almighty.

The "Moratorium"—What It Means

COINCIDENT with the closing of exchanges and the general business disturbance caused by the European conflict, the unfamiliar word "moratorium" has frequently appeared in the cable despatches, puzzling many readers. It is an old legal term derived from the Latin word moratorius (delay), and is defined in common law as an emergency act of legislation authorizing a debtor or a bank to suspend payments for a given period. In view of the general monetary stringency in the Old World, many nations have adopted the moratorium authorizing an extension of payments for a limited time, each nation in its proclamation stating the period of its use. It has never been of such widespread application as now, although even to-day there are nations involved in the great struggle which do not apply the moratorium, but make their business adjustments on reasonable grounds, giving due allowance for existing conditions.

Mrs. Woodrow Wilson's Funeral

THE funeral of Mrs. Woodrow Wilson was held in the East Room of the White House on Monday afternoon, August 10, and was marked by extreme simplicity. The body in a gray casket on which was placed a single eath of flowers, the tribute of the President. A autiful array of floral pieces sent by friends and mirers from all over the country was banked high ind the coffin. The service, consisting of prayer d readings from the fourteenth chapter of John d the fifteenth chapter of I Corinthians by Rev. . Sylvester Beach, pastor of the First Presby- ian Church of Princeton, and Rev. J. H. Taylor, stor of the Central Presbyterian Church of Wash- gton, was brief but very impressive. The Presi- nt and his three daughters sat near the casket in e historic old room. With them were only mem- rs of the immediate family and intimate friends, embers of the cabinet and delegations represent- g the Senate and the House. Both houses of ongress adjourned, and all government depart- ents were closed for the afternoon. All flags in e city were at half mast. After the ceremony e official delegations left the White House, and en the President and his family in four automo- les behind the hearse formed the funeral cortège, hich slowly moved down Pennsylvania Avenue d to the Union Station. Thousands of people ood in the driving rain with bowed heads as the ournful procession passed. The journey from ashington ended the following afternoon when e body was committed to the ground in her old me town of Rome, Ga. Death is no respecter of rsons. If he had been he would have passed the hite House by, for Mrs. Wilson was a woman of ch worth and usefulness that she could be poorly ared; and after having been elevated to the ftiest social position in the land it seemed espe- ally cruel for death to change her countenance and nd her away. The contrast between the bridal enes, with the beauty and the fragrance of the ange bloom and the nightshade and the cypress, ems so great. Death cares no more for the palace the ruler than for the cellar or garret of poverty the city slum. Mrs. Wilson's funeral was irra- iated by the light of the Gospel and the faith she nd the whole family had in the reality of the other fe. They carried her body to her home in the outhland, but she told her family she was going to er heavenly home, and her companion and children new full well that they were not taking her to her esting-place, but only the raiment she wore, the ouse she inhabited. The whole nation is in sym- athy with President Wilson and his family in this upreme sorrow, and unites with him in the belief f Christ's words:

In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. John 14: 2.)

Street Sweepers Receive Medals

THE other day in New York City the street sweep- ers received unusual recognition when seventeen f them received medals of honor at the hands of Mayor Mitchel, who said: "You represent hard, hon- st work without the incentive that stirs the fire- nen and police to unusual efforts.' For the first ime the Board of Aldermen has ordered that all treet sweepers shall have two weeks' vacation with ay. It is a good sign of true democracy that a reat city through its chief magistrate gives ac- nowledgment to the value of perhaps the humblest lepartment in the municipal government. Its rela- ion to honest toil, to the comfort and general ealth of the community, cannot be over-emphasized. These medals and vacations are tributary to a bet- er service and to future promotions, reminding us f the reward given to service in humble matters hus referred to:

Well done, good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful ver a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: nter thou into the joy of thy lord. (Matt. 25: 23.)

Searching Wealth of Croesus

PROFESSOR BUTLER of the archeological department of Princeton University returned recently from a six months' search for the fabled riches of Crœsus in Asia Minor. He superintended the excavations of the ruins of Sardis, where the palace of Crœsus, the richest man of the early ages, and his treasure chest are supposed to be buried. Many relics of interest and value were unearthed, and the expedition was regarded as successful, though the riches of Crœsus are yet undiscovered. Crœsus was counted the richest man in olden times. Referring to him Solon, the lawgiver, said: "Call no man happy until he is dead." This reference was singularly applicable, as his son was killed while hunting, his kingdom was taken away from him by Cyrus and he himself was condemned to be burned, which sentence, however, was commuted. There is a strong probability that if the palace of Crœsus shall be found it will be discovered that his wealth had been appropriated by his conquerors. Whether the treasures shall or shall not be found, Professor Butler and those in similar tasks are discovering the richest treasures of thought, throwing new light upon the doings of the past, and aiding greatly in the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures. The spade has proven an invaluable witness to the divine authority of the Bible. Solon's commentary on the riches of Crœsus, and the uncertainty of them now after a burial of about 2,500 years, call to mind these words:

Wilt thou set thine eyes upon that which is not? for riches certainly make themselves wings: they fly away as an eagle toward heaven. (Prov. 23: 5.)

A Veteran School Teacher

DAVID NELSON CAMP, of New Britain, Conn., recently presented his sixtieth annual report as chairman of the Library Committee of the New Britain Institute. He is the active superintendent of schools of that town, although he soon celebrates his ninety-fourth birthday. He has been engaged in some form of educational work for seventy-seven years, having begun as an assistant teacher in Durham Academy in 1837. In 1846 he organized the Connecticut Teachers' Association. He has been chairman and director for many years of the Connecticut Missionary Society, and active in many other associations of an educational and religious character. This veteran's life has run almost parallel with this republic, and with the world's greatest material progress. It has witnessed a large number of the inventions that have multiplied the conveniences of civilized living throughout the world. It has witnessed the greatest progress in popular school education the world has ever known, and has had a practical part in that progress. There were but 200,000,000 Christians in the world when his life began, and he now sees the roll of over 400,000,000 Christian adherents, and has had a practical share in this phenomenal advancement of the church. This vigorous old man in his efficient service reminds us of what was said of the vigorous old age of Moses:

And Moses was an hundred and twenty years old when he died: his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated. (Deut. 34: 7.)

Work for Heart Convalescents

THREE thousand men and boys suffering from heart strain or cardiac trouble entered New York Hospital last year. Of this number, 1,500 did not recover and the remainder are given but a short time to live. The majority of deaths were traced to the fact that the invalids after treatment have to return to their hard manual labor, overburdening the already weakened heart. A new form of philanthropy is the providing of a mild form of occupation for such patients. The work selected by a group of public-spirited people in New York is the making of flower boxes and pots. Most of the cardiac patients are at least twenty-five years old and have done work that required heavy lifting and exposure to all sorts of weather. To return to these vocations usually meant death. The factory for the making of the flower pots and boxes has been located at the convalescent home, and there the patients can earn a fair wage with light work, and have a fair chance for a return to health. It is too bad that so many are compelled by circumstances to follow dangerous and unhealthy employments. What a beautiful benevolence it is to care for those who are affected with trouble of the heart, the fountain of physical life! Such action suggests the care thus enjoined with reference to the heart, the fountain of spiritual life:

Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life. (Prov. 4: 23.)

Heroic Rescues in Accident

WHEN a passenger train collided with a motor car in a wreck near Joplin, Mo., on August 5, thirty-eight people were killed and two score injured. The horror of the catastrophe was somewhat lightened by the acts of heroism performed by the rescuers. W. M. Drury, of Webb City, Mo., with his wife and three children was aboard the motor car. He was only slightly injured. Quickly removing himself from the wreckage which covered him he began a search for his family. One by one he brought them from the car, crawling on his hands and knees through the fire which was rapidly consuming the débris. Later, although his face and body were covered with blisters, where his clothing had been burned away, he crawled back into the wreckage and rescued three other persons. J. J. Lauderbach, of Joplin, crawled through a window and saved nine persons pinioned within the wreck. There is scarcely a catastrophe of any kind in this country where there are not these evidences of genuine heroism, revealing the better side of human nature and furnishing a symbol of those who risked their own health and lives in saving those who are perishing in the débris of sin. One of the greatest heroes in rescue work was Paul, who said:

But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself. (Acts 20: 24.)

Confession from Guilty Conscience

A YOUNG man walked into the office of a justice of the peace in a New Jersey city the other day, and announced that he had come to confess a crime. He had tried to hide it, but his guilt prevented sleep, and drove him at last to reveal all. It was a crime of a very serious nature, involving murder, arson and insurance swindling. The guilty man for weeks had striven to forget his crime, but, he declared, "I almost went crazy, so I decided to confess." How deceitful is the human heart, and how desperately wicked it is! The universe, however, is on the side of virtue. Crime has in it an irresistible element of self-revelation. There are so many circumstantial evidences ready to cry out against murder. The handkerchief, the button, the cap, the weapon left at the scene of the tragedy, the footstep in the moistened earth or snow, the fingerprint on the wall, are all ready to testify against the one suspected. There are inward tendencies toward the revelation the crime. The guilty eye, the nervous movements, the contradictory statements, and the torturing conscience are witnesses against the criminal. The story calls to mind the deadly remorse Judas had in causing the betrayal and death of Christ:

And he cast down the pieces of silver in the temple, and departed, and went and hanged himself. (Matt. 27: 5.)

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD ORGANIZED. On August 7 the senate confirmed the appointment of Paul M. Warburg of New York and Frederic A. Delano of Chicago for the Federal Reserve Board, thus completing the list of members. Considerable opposition had developed against the nomination of Mr. Warburg, and the vote stood 58 for and 11 against. The five appointed members were sworn in on August 10, and received from Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo their commissions signed by the President. Mr. McAdoo then congratulated the board and the country upon the financial condition of the government and the national banks. He stated that the importance of the Federal Reserve Board is not yet fully realized, and expressed the belief that the new system will prove to be a bulwark against financial disaster in this country, and an instrument of great benefit to the people.

NEW YORK'S COMPENSATION LAW MEETS SNAGS. Charging that some employers discriminate against married men with families and men who have not passed satisfactory physical examinations on the ground that in case of accident compensation to such men would be considerably larger than to others, organized labor is attacking a ruling of the commission which, they claim, gave rise to that impression on the part of employers. A strike of 16,000 employees of the General Electric Company is threatened because of that company's alleged discrimination.

NEW HAVEN SUBMITS TO GOVERNMENT. The civil action begun by the United States Government to dissolve the vast transportation system known as the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, has been ended by the renewed agreement of that organization to readjust its affairs in strict compliance with the Sherman Anti-Trust Law. Upon approval by the United States District Court of the agreement now entered into, the civil action will be abandoned. Criminal prosecution of directors involved in the alleged illegal deals made by the road in the stocks of competing companies will not stop, however, the Special Federal Grand Jury expecting to take up the cases in September. The individuals named as defendants include some of the best known men in the financial world.

BILLIONS IN INTERNATIONAL COMMERCE. A recent report of the United States Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce gives the total value of the world's trade in 1913 as $40,000,000,000, the commerce of 75 countries and political groups being the basis, the aggregate imports amounting to $21,000,000,000, exports $19,000,000,000. The United States is shown to have bought about 10 per cent. of the goods exported by other nations, and to have sold 11½ per cent. of the merchandise imported by them. Great Britain proper is credited with a total foreign trade of $5,530,000,000, imports being about half. Germany has a foreign trad aggregating somewhat over $5,000 000,000, of which imports are prac tically 50 per cent. The figures fo France are approximately one-hal those of Germany; those for th United States show a total of $4,277 000,000, of which our imports amou to $1,793,000,000, exports $2,484,000 000. Of the nearly $700,000,000 ex cess in exports over imports, food stuffs shipped to foreign markets pla a large part, although this country i increasingly importing foodstuffs fro other countries, especially beef, grain and oils.

AGREEMENT NEAR IN MEXICO. The news of the Mexican situa tion August 1 was that Provisional President Carbajal had left Mexic City for Vera Cruz, and the Constitutionalists were preparing to occupy th city and take over the government b peaceable methods. The date for th entry is not yet fixed, but Federa forces are preparing to evacuate an 5,000 Constitutionalist troops are at nearby post. General Carranza ha already begun to make up his cabinet Rumors continue of strained relation between Carranza and Villa, but an early settlement of Mexico seems to b near at hand. The American battleship fleet is scheduled to leave Vera Cru September 1, and our land forces will evacuate that city immediately a legally constituted government is recognized at Washington.

POST OFFICE EMPLOYEES AND CIVIL SERVICE. The House, sitting as a Committee of the Whole, on August 7 passed an amendment to the Railway Mail Pay Bill removing all post office employees from the Civil Service and permitting their appointment in future by the postmasters. It is predicted, however, that the amendment cannot pass the House when in regular session.

HARVESTER TRUST MUST DISSOLVE. The government's suit to dissolve the International Harvester Company resulted in a decision by the United States District Court, August 12, that the corporation must dissolve into at least three independent concerns within ninety days, or the court will entertain an application for the appointment of a receiver, unless an appeal to the Supreme Court acts as a stay. The decision against the $140,000,000 corporation was dissented to by one justice. The methods of the corporation since 1902 are found to have been in violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust law, but in the main fair and just to smaller competitors. No over-capitalization was found, but some acts incidental to the expansion of the corporation into a monopoly controlling 85 per cent. of the agricultural machinery business in this country were condemned. Cyrus H. McCormick, president of the corporation, declared that an appeal will at once be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. The decision appears to commend the corporation's morals and rebuke its methods.

WAR

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

THE cave men fought with their knotty fists,
And clubs that were tipped with stone;
With heads held high, and with fearless eye,
They guarded their rights alone.
They hacked at beasts that were huge and fierce,
That prowled where their stores were piled,
And they died at last, and their spirits passed,
While the War God looked and smiled.

Long ages passed, and the archers came,
With arrows and pliant bows;
They crouched in lines 'neath the mountain pines,
And slew as the reaper mows.
And all the spears of the armored knights
Flashed bright as a shining sea;
And people died and their spirits cried,
While the War God laughed in glee.

They fight to day, and the bullets new
Are shaped like a needle fine;
And cannons roar on the ocean shore,
While blood flows red like wine.
The airships flutter against the sun,
To shoot at the frightened earth,
And birdmen die in the heavy sky,
While the War God shouts in his mirth.

Questions and Answers

J. O., Dassel, Minn. Is a person really a Christian who, though professing Christianity and contributing to the support of the Gospel, ignores the doctrine of returning good for evil, and seems ever ready to avenge an insult or injury?

Your question is unfortunately worded. It is always difficult and dangerous business to try to decide who of our acquaintances are Christians and who are not. In fact we are specifically commanded in the Bible not to do that. It is always easy to misunderstand the motives of others, to fail to take account of weaknesses or twists of intellect, to forget matters of environment or training and countless other matters that make God the only safe judge of character and action. Many professing Christians who appear to be quick to resent injustice may do so from an overdeveloped sense of justice. They cannot tolerate unfairness, not so much because it is directed against themselves as just because it is unfair; and what looks like revenge may be an instinctive feeling that injustice should be punished. But the message of Christ and his apostles is very plain. We must return good for evil; we must love those who are unjust to us; we cannot leave in our souls any desire for revenge. We all need a fresh baptism of love, love that will not want to avenge wrong, love that grieves over the sins and weakness of others, love that longs to help everybody, love that is slow to judge.

Subscriber, Carlsbad, N. M. The word "paradise" is one of wide application. It has been used in various terrestrial senses and also in the celestial sense. Its figurative application to the heavenly world is chiefly used to denote the happiness of the righteous or the pardoned in the future state. Among the Jews themselves, the Talmudical writings contain frequent reference to paradise as "the immortal heaven" to which the spirits of the just are admitted immediately after their liberation from the body. Thus, the book Sohar speaks of the earthly and the heavenly paradise, the latter excelling the former as light excels darkness. It was in the acceptation of the current Jewish phraseology of New Testament times that the expression was used both by our Lord and his apostles: "To-day thou shalt be with me in paradise"; "He was caught up into paradise"; "the tree of life is in the paradise of God." (Luke 23: 43; II Cor. 12: 4; Rev. 2: 7.)

A Subscriber, Lancaster, Pa. The selling plan you mention is clearly based on a misrepresentation, and is, of course, wrong. Aside entirely from religious principles, the laws are constantly becoming more strict, and those in existence more strictly enforced, concerning the obtaining of money under false pretenses. But when the principles of Christ are considered, one's duty becomes still clearer. In dealing with a customer it is always sinful to make misrepresentations. This principle is coming to be recognized, even in purely business circles and on the mere basis of profits, as the best in the long run. Deceptions will sooner or later be discovered, and then the buyer who has been deceived will go elsewhere.

J. W., Chicago, Ill. In I Cor. 11: 30, are we to understand that physical weakness, sickliness and sleep are meant, or is it to be interpreted in a spiritual sense? Prominent Bible students in our church interpret this as meaning physical weakness, sickness and death.

The chapter, as verses 20 to 34 show, is in the nature of a censure on disorders in the Christian assemblies, love-feasts, etc. It was unbecoming and sacrilegious to come to the Lord's Supper merely to gratify physical appetite. At the love-feast which preceded the Supper, there were, in Paul's opinion, excesses which, as one commentator remarks—"made a true celebration of the Lord's Supper (during or after it) with due discernment of its solemnity, out of the question. Hence the love-feasts were afterwards disjoined from the Lord's Supper, and in later years were forbidden by a church council." They were a relic of pagan days. Having these conditions in view, we see that Paul in verse 30 had two things in view: (1) The excesses in eating and drinking tended to physical trouble and even serious sickness, and continuance in such practices shortened life; and (2) these indulgences were a serious barrier to spiritual growth, and made a mock of the church's most sacred ordinance.

Mrs. J. H. W., Muscatine, Iowa. Antinomianism is the heresy which teaches that since Christ kept the whole moral law for all his followers they themselves are free from its requirements. It is strange that earnest students of the Bible should have been led away into this error in the face of such passages as the sixth chapter of Romans, the first part of the eighth chapter, the whole Epistle of James, and the whole body of Christ's own sayings. The heresy began early in the history of the church, was taught again in Luther's time by Agricola, and broke out in later eras. One of its most notable and victorious antagonists was John Fletcher, who is mentioned in the paragraph you quote. His Checks to Antinomianism have been referred to as so complete and powerful an attack on this heresy as to have killed it for all time. So far as we know there have been no serious outbreaks of it since his day. We are curious to know the sect referred to in your paragraph, as we know of no present-day Antinomians.

Old Subscriber, Albany, N. Y. You will find the causes leading up to the present war set forth in the last two issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. In addition, it may be explained that Russia has an eye to the expansion of its seaboard; Austria has similar ambitions and wishes to secure more seacoast territory on the Adriatic and the Ægean; France longs to recover her two lost provinces, Alsace and Lorraine, and Germany needs new colonies for her rapidly growing population.

Student, Beaumont, Texas. The place and time of death of Jude, the brother of James, are nowhere positively stated. Nicephorus says he died a natural death in Edessa, while a Syrian tradition declares he was martyred in Phœnicia, and still another states that Persia was the scene of his martyrdom, and that he was slain with arrows. Eusebius quotes a tradition of Hegesippus that two of Jude's grandsons were carried to Rome in Domitian's time, but as the persecution was nearing a close their lives were spared, and they returned to their spiritual labors in Palestine.

A. S. G., Cass, W. Va. The episode related in Judges 15: 3-6 describes the retribution which Samson devised with a twofold purpose: (1) to punish his wife and her kindred for her faithlessness, and (2) to inflict loss on the Philistines. It occurred during the dry season, when crops were ripe. The Philistines regarded the wife and her relations as the cause of their misfortunes, and Samson, by his lawless device, turned the fury of popular indignation against her and her people, causing the Philistines themselves to become his avengers.

P. K. C., Fort Davis, Tex. 1. Paul was three times at Troas (see Acts 16: 8, II Cor. 2: 12, and Acts 20: 6.) The last time he seems to have arrived on a Monday and "stayed seven days," which included the Jewish Sabbath and the Lord's Day following. Verse 7 indicates that the Christian observance of the Lord's Day was already a fixed practice there, including the breaking of bread with the disciples, although this is not expressly stated. 2. The first four verses of the opening chapter of Luke's Gospel are simply a sort of an apologue or explanatory preface, addressed to Theophilus, presumably the chief magistrate of some city in Greece or Asia Minor, or (as some authorities have suggested) to a lover of the truth and the Gospel, representing under that name true believers everywhere.

C. F. W. M., Evanston, Ill., writes: The Mail-Bag brought us an attempt at a prayer as a companion to the old familiar "Now I lay me down to sleep." But as I remember that dear old prayer, it is, as all prayers should be, and the one offered us for morning use does not contain this "sweet name." May I offer one that does? It is not original with me, for I have heard, taught, and used it for many years, thinking all the while that it was quite generally known:

"Now I wake and see the light,
'Tis God who kept me through the night;
To him I raise my heart and pray,
That he would keep me through the day;
If I should die before 'tis done,
O Lord, accept me through thy Son. Amen."

Rev. P. F. Y., Hoopeston, Ill. By all means use that which can give offense to none, and which cannot be a stumbling-block to any one.

J. J. P., Salvador, S. C. Professor Leland (to whom your question has been submitted) writes: "There is nothing to show that the positions of the planets affect the weather on our earth. Old astrologers used to assert it, but there is no scientific basis for such a belief."

H. N., Bentonville, Ark. Already discussed in previous issues.

Mrs. J. W. D., Daytona, Fla. "Anno Domini" means "year of our Lord"—i. e., the year from the birth of Christ.

Reader, Antwerp, N. Y. The author of the Green Mountain Boys, a tale of early Vermont, is Daniel Pierce Thompson.

THE HYMNS YOU LOVE BEST OF ALL

WHEN THE CHRISTIAN HERALD invited its readers to co-operate with it in the proposed hymnal revision by sending us the titles of their favorite hymns, we anticipated a goodly number of responses. But the flood of letters and postals has far exceeded our expectations. They are still coming by every mail from near and far, and they will doubtless continue to come for several weeks. This popular vote on the hymns is now being classified and tabulated, and when all of our interested readers have been heard from, the result will be published in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Many of the letters reveal the fact that the desire for hymnal revision is widespread. K. A. M., San Geronimo, Calif., writes: "I believe with you that such adjuncts to our religious life and services should improve with the times. In eliminating the sentimental and poorer sort of hymns, would it not be well to give opportunity to new hymn-writers? No matter how beautiful the old ones may be, a service is apt to become mechanical when monotony rules."

"I think there is room for improvement," writes Mrs. W. L. A., Winchester, Ohio. "Our church music is not what it should be. I love the old hymns and the old music in part; but it often happens that our best hymns are set to music that does away with its sacredness."

J. E. T., Salem, Me., referring to the sentimental and pointless class of hymns (which were the subject of criticism by President Wilson some time ago and more recently by the Rev. Dr. John Thompson, a leading Chicago pastor), writes: "Modern hymnology is characterized by what Dr. Talmage used to call 'a sacred nothingness' or a 'religious doggerel.' Song books are gotten up as a money-making scheme. A popular evangelist cannot conduct a revival without a book of his own."

There are among the mass of letters many that are very touching, dealing with old-time memories with which beautiful hymns are closely associated. One letter of this class (from Dr. F. W. S., Colfax, Iowa) says: "I always place 'Jesus, Saviour, Pilot Me,' first, because it was the hymn that came to me as a prayer when the United States transport was being piloted out of Newport News, Va., with over one thousand of Uncle Sam's boys during the Spanish-American War in July, 1898, and I was one, and I realized that some of us were sailing away from the homeland never to return."

Postals for the popular hymn vote should be mailed at once by those of our readers who desire to help the movement for hymnal revision. Address them to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

DO YOU KNOW YOUR BIBLE?

Answers to questions and Honor Roll for List No. 1 will appear next week.

New Questions

Year's Series List 8. Half-year Series List 2

[The next list of questions will also be about Paul]

1. (a) What verse first mentions the new name by which Saul of Tarsus became known to his Christian associates? (b) What verse states that he was a young man when first known to the apostles? (c) During what event does he first appear, and what was his connection with it?

2. (a) In what verse does Paul state that he did not know he was doing wrong in persecuting the church? (b) In what passage does he state definitely that he did so from a sense of duty? (c) What were the charges brought against Stephen, which may be taken to indicate Paul's reasons for believing the Christians to be displeasing to God?

3. (a) What three passages in Acts describe Paul's meeting the risen Saviour? (b) Where in one of his epistles does Paul refer definitely to this vision of Christ? (c) Find a passage which indicates the thoroughness of the consecration he had to make.

4. (a) Where did Paul retire after his conversion (probably for meditation)? (b) How soon did he go to Jerusalem?

5. (a) From what city did Paul start on his first missionary journey? (b) Who accompanied him?

6. (a) In what city were Paul and his companion taken for gods? (b) From what cities did enemies come who persuaded these same people to stone Paul? (c) What verse tells of the end of their first tour and their return to the city from which they started?

7. (a) What chapter in Acts describes the council of apostles and elders at which it was decided that the Gentiles should not be compelled to keep the Jewish ceremonial law? (b) Who accompanied Paul and Barnabas as delegates to the church at Antioch, bearing the message of liberty? (c) In what affectionate and appreciative words were Paul and Barnabas referred to in the letter they carried?

8. (a) Whom did Paul take with him on his second missionary journey? (b) Where did Paul have a vision calling him to Macedonia?

9. (a) In what chapter of one of his epistles does Paul sternly rebuke a group of churches for going back to basing their salvation upon the works of the law after they had accepted the fundamental theory of salvation by faith in Christ? (b) What four things, according to a statement made in a single verse, does Paul declare Christ becomes to a believer?

10. (a) Find at least three passages in which Paul speaks of himself or those to whom he writes as being crucified or dead with Christ. (b) What did he state to be the motive, or power, that impelled him in his work?

THE GREATEST THING IN THE WORLD

*SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR SEPTEMBER 6

Upward and Downward

By Amos R. Wells, Ph.D.

IF ANY one should ask a modern business man the question the scribe asked Jesus, "What is the first commandment?" he would probably receive the answer, "Be industrious"; or if he asked a college professor, "Study"; or if he inquired of an athlete, "Be energetic"; or if he approached a lawyer, "Be just"; or if he went to a lover or a mother, "Be kind." But Jesus knew better. The first commandment must bring in God as well as man; it must relate to religion rather than character, for religion is the basis of character; and it must be founded on a proper understanding of God rather than of duty, which is a child of God.

Therefore Christ's answer was first a definition of God: "God is one." "I should like to see your God," said the Emperor Trajan to a Jewish rabbi. "No mortal eye can look upon him," the rabbi replied. When the emperor insisted, the rabbi said, "Well, suppose we begin by looking on one of his ambassadors," and bade the emperor gaze at the midday sun in a cloudless sky. "I cannot," the emperor confessed; "the light dazzles me." "If, then," said the rabbi, "you cannot endure the glory of one of his creatures, how could you behold the unclouded glory of the Creator?"

The doctrine of the oneness of God teaches us to get impressions of him from all the outreaches of his being in nature and history and mankind. Ascribe to him the loveliness of the lily, the splendor of the sunset, the sweep of the sea, the majesty of the starry sky, the tender brooding of a mother, and all the glorious qualities of Jesus Christ. You have a right to, for God is one.

Then, as soon as we really understand that God is love, love to the last fiber of his infinite being, the first commandment becomes an axiom: "Love God; love him with all your being, since he loves you with all his being."

Campbell Morgan imagines a boy bringing home a loaf of bread. "Where did you get it?" "From the baker." "Where did he get it?" "He made it." "Of what?" "Flour." "Where did he get the flour?" "From the miller." "Where did he get it?" "From the farmer." "Where did the farmer get it?" Then the boy hesitates, but at last speaks the final truth, "From God." "Then from whom did you get the loaf?" "Oh, from God!" Thus trace everything to God, as you must if you think, and he will become all in all to you, and the center of your heart's love.

The second commandment is "like" the first, is only another side of the first, the downward-looking side: "Love your neighbor; love him as yourself." You have all noted how husband and wife come to speak alike and act alike and even look alike. Love makes likeness. If you love God, you will grow like God; and since God is love, you will become a lover. Thus the second commandment is only an outgrowth of the first.

"There are two ways of lighting a dark room," wrote "Ian Maclaren": "One is to attack the darkness with candles; the other is to open the shutters and let in the light." And so there are two ways of forming a character: one is the candle way of duty; the other is the sunshine way of love. Love God, and you will at once come into right relations with all mankind.

Therefore the concluding episode of the lesson, the story of the widow's mites, is only an example of the first commandment. The woman loved God with all her being, therefore she gave to mankind all her possessions. The problem of giving is the problem of loving. That is why giving is so simple; that is why it is so hard.

Dr. Russell Conwell tells of a man in New Jersey whose daughter, for reasons that seemed good, was kept from all knowledge of him; yet he provided for her all his life, ministering to all her wants, educating her, introducing her through his money into good society, sending her to Europe, and toiling and economizing constantly for her. And they say that no man in New Jersey was happier than this father who thus cared for a daughter who did not even know of his existence. That is love, an absolutely unselfish outpouring of self for others.

* THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS for Sunday, September 6, 1914. The Great Commandment. Mark 12: 28-44. GOLDEN TEXT. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself." Luke 10: 25.

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"And he [a certain lawyer] answering said, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself."

Our Lord endorsed this answer to his question: "This do, and thou shalt live." Love looks like the past tense of live. (Drive, drove; live, love.) He who has really lived, will have loved; and he who really loves drinks deep draughts of life. The soul that by jealousy, envy, or hate is strangling its love is committing suicide. Of course we must distinguish Love in its pure essence from certain ingredients that get mingled with it, such as passion, emotion, affinity. These may follow, but in its essence love is too make another's life the pivot around which your thoughts and activities circle. This is why God says, Thou shalt love. If it were a matter of emotion, this imperative would defeat itself, and fall pointless at our feet. But we can obey it readily, when we remember that we can choose to live for Christ, in whom God gives himself to us, and that we can choose to live for another or others, even though we may not specially like them. Don't begin by trying to force your heart to feel; that will come in due course. But begin at the other end, with your strength and mind, and work backwards; always keeping an open doorway for the love of God to come in and possess you.

The Source of Love

By Arthur H. Howland

WE come, in to-day's lesson, to the heart of the Bible. And the word which we are studying brings us to the very center of life itself. Some years ago the world was thrilled by a great book. It was a very small book, written by a modest, humble man. But it stirred the church and interested the world. Its title was The Greatest Thing in the World. Probably no one who read it would have undertaken to dispute with Professor Drummond his contention that that thing is love. Drummond got all his facts from Paul; and Paul had gotten all his facts from Jesus.

Our entire modern life seems to be keyed up to a tension and planned on a schedule which makes that beautiful word almost impossible to understand. Love requires quietness; it requires thoughtfulness; it requires, at times, silence. And all these three things are difficult nowadays to get. Home life means far less than it did a few decades ago. Church life is losing its depth. We are busy enough, but we are so busy that we have forgotten what love really means—and so are forgetting what life really means.

Have you never noticed, during a summer afternoon or night in the country when you have been anxious or troubled or busy about something, that suddenly a lull has come in your activity of brain or body, a relaxation in the tension of your mind and nerves, and you have suddenly become conscious of the sweet sound of a bird, or aware of a delicious fragrance, or of a charming view? These things were present before, but you had blocked your soul against their entrance by your care for other things. At a moment like this you have realized how much you really loved your home; how much your church might mean to you; how beautiful and how kind God is. Jesus came to earth to win us back to these silent and beautiful places of soul life, where we may breathe the atmosphere of love, may see its visions and dream its dreams and get strength to do its work.

It has been pointed out many times as a remarkable thing that when Jesus was ready to go back to heaven and had arranged an important interview with the man who was to be the leader of the friends he was leaving behind, he asked him, not whether he had comprehended the messages of his Master, not whether he would promise again to be faithful, but only one question, thrice repeated: "Lovest thou me?" Jesus knew that love is the only force that would change the world and make it right, and he knew that power and skill to change the world could come only as human souls are won to his personal companionship and friendship.

This should be a very earnest hour in our Sunday school life. Every superintendent, every officer, every teacher ought to answer personally that question of Jesus, "Lovest thou me?" He should remember that the commandment to love God with all the heart is not the sixth commandment, or the fourth, or the third, or second, but the first. Whatever else we do, if we are not doing this, all is out of joint. A return of all the officers and teachers of our schools to an ardent love for God will make them able to lead their pupils to this same sweet experience. It is easy for a child to love God. Many children grow up in Christian homes loving him in a spontaneous, effortless way, which is precisely the love he longs for. The very spirit of childhood which Jesus commended as the essence of the spirit of his kingdom makes it easy for children to love God.

We shall talk with them frankly about sin and tell them that sin is what keeps people from loving God and then we shall tell them how Jesus has died to take our sins away and so bring us back to the place of love if we have wandered away from it. This should be a beautiful hour in every Sunday school.

But in teaching the lesson we must not forget the second commandment, to love one's neighbor as one's self. We said at the beginning that quietness is necessary for love. And yet the heart that truly loves would not be content to remain in quietness. The ideal church is the church which is on fire with love for God and on fire with zeal that others shall be reached and helped and blessed and saved in the name of Christ.

The church must take up the cause of those who are oppressed, of those who are sad, of those who are sick, of those who are bound. There is only one way we can prove that we really love Christ, and that is that we shall serve others for his sake. Three times Jesus asked Peter, "Lovest thou me?" Three times he commanded him, "Feed my sheep and lambs."

The lesson closes with the picture of the poor widow who gave all that she had to God, and received a commendation from the Lord, which has been given a lasting place in the world's story. It is the old truth again, of the power and the achievement of love. She loved her Lord; so she gave all she had; and her little gift has caused rivers of gold to flow into the Lord's treasury for his use.

This international lesson is studied while Europe is torn with war. Can not the Sunday schools of the world, who have found the secret of love and brotherliness, lead the nations of the world to peace and friendship? Christ has the only answer to the strifes of men. Let us speak the word more loudly and constantly than ever—LOVE.

SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS' ROUND TABLE

Conducted by FRANK L. BROWN, General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

CAN YOU SUGGEST some interesting Sunday school lesson help for a class of boys between 18 and 25, something more than questions and answers? I have mostly boys in my class, and we are a rural Sunday school.

As a starter get The Boy and the Sunday School, by Alexander, and Starting to Teach, by Eugene C. Foster, as an aid for general plans in week-day and teaching work with boys.

The new first and second year International Senior Graded lessons, which are published by a syndicate representing several large denominations, are full of good material. Scribner's, New York, publish good Sunday school graded helps for the senior years. Fred S. Goodman, of the Y. M. C. A. International Committee, has prepared short courses for young men's classes.

These courses are prepared with the idea of relating young men during these years of middle and later adolescence to life and service, by broadening the outlook into life and the world as a field for service, and by a study of those great constructive movements that have run through history and crystallized in our civilization.

The International Uniform Lessons, if rightly treated by lesson writers for these years of the later teens and early twenties, would furnish much good material for such study as you have in mind, but unfortunately many of these writers have not met the challenge of this new day with the throbbing problems that young men must face, and we must help these young people to get a vision of Christ and to know what would be Christ's attitude toward the life of to-day and then to put themselves at service.

An excellent plan to make the uniform lesson topics attractive to young people is followed by a large Bible class in the Emory Methodist Sunday school of Pittsburg. This class of three hundred is taught by a busy lawyer, but his chief life investment is his class. A card of the lesson topics for a month is distributed to each member of the class with a few live questions for discussion. For instance, on June 21: Subject, "The great refusal." Lesson text: Mark 10: 17-31.

Four topics are given for discussion.

1. Does Christ's requirement of the rich young ruler hold good to-day?

2. Is it wise for a man to let death distribute his gifts?

3. Is it possible for a man to surrender his wealth to God and yet keep it in his own possession?

4. What is the chief hindrance to your following Christ?

Three young people could lead off in the discussion of the first three questions, the class expressing their judgment after each presentation. These teachers' special opportunity comes with the last question. And no lesson should be closed without a prayer in the class that shall bring Christ and the lesson home to the heart and life.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

The Power of Prayer*

THE world had been trying to do its work many centuries before the greatest source and means of power were discovered. At first no power was known but that of muscle, muscle of man and muscle of beast. Then came the use of wind for sails and mills. We do not know when the first water wheels were used, but they probably came after sails. Water power and wind power, combined with the muscles of men and beasts, did all the world's work till a little more than a century ago, when the power of steam was found. A few years later came electricity, and we are living now in the beginning of the wonder age of that mysterious power. It is rather sad to think of the strength that has been wasted during all these centuries. Bitter and cruel drudgeries might have been saved if men had understood then the powers of steam and electricity.

Now, we find the same kind of thing true in the church and in all religious organizations. A great deal of altogether needless effort is put forth. Can you imagine how exasperated and grieved a man who understood the power of steam would feel at beholding the perspiring efforts of five hundred men to pull a train of cars and a locomotive? If the water were in the boiler and the fire kindled all ready to light the case would be still more distressing. The man who understands steam knows that all that is necessary to move the train would be to strike a match to the ready-laid fire. The five hundred men who do not know of steam and who do not believe in it continue to tug on, accomplishing nothing. A great deal of religious effort is as futile as this. We are trying every other power excepting the power of prayer. And the power of prayer is the only thing that will do the work. It is a terrible reproach to our churches that the attendance at prayer meetings has dwindled so painfully. People are willing to do every other kind of church work except to come together and pray, whereas this is the thing they ought to do, whether or not anything else gets done at all. In our Endeavor and Union meetings we are apt to give time and thought to other matters, whereas the thing of supreme importance is that we should try to learn how to pray.

Yet, after all, to speak of the power of prayer is a little bit misleading. Prayer is only the wire or apparatus that brings the power of God himself down to the human soul and to the church. The power is God. And every life and every church and every organization that wants to do God's work on earth must get God's power for the doing of that work. How shall we begin? Begin in your own heart. Begin by stopping now your excited and anxious and burdened efforts to do something for God and for the church and spend a little time, if it is not more than five minutes, in looking straight at him and thinking only of him and in asking him, not to make your way successful, but to show you his way; not to make your power successful, but to give you his own power in your life.

Only for a soul in this attitude toward God is the promise of our lesson true; "All things whatsoever ye ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive." A soul that determines to get near enough to God to find out his will will be so led and instructed that the things for which he prays will be the things that God himself desires. And his prayer will put him in such a condition that he can be led and used by the Holy Spirit in helping to bring to pass the answer to his own prayer.

When we begin to pray our first request must be that God will show us if there is anything in our own lives which is hindering the flowing of his power through us. Electricity, while it is such a furiously great power, is also very delicate in its requirements. A slight thing misplaced, the presence of a slight foreign substance, the failure of two wires to connect, even by a hair's breadth, will make unavailing the almost infinite power that would otherwise be available. So we must search our hearts and our lives to see if anything in them is preventing the flowing of God's power into us and its flowing out again in effective helpfulness.

One of the mysterious elements of prayer is that it is so amazingly multiplied when more than one is engaged. A bewildering promise is made to any two followers of Jesus who will unite to pray for a certain thing. You all know the story of the "haystack meeting," when five young students met and were led to a prayer which gave birth to the mighty movement of American missions.

If the study of this day's topic will bring the officers and members of the Christian Endeavor and the Union to their knees in humble, earnest, submissive, trustful prayer, it will mark a new epoch in the life of every society and throughout the organizations they represent.

Look up your CHRISTIAN HERALD for February 25, 1914, and read again the sermon by Rev. A. C. Wyckoff on the place of prayer in the life of the church. Talk the matter over with some of your older friends and get them to speak with your pastor about it. He will be delighted to learn that some one is beginning really to be interested in prayer. Make your society a praying society; make your church a praying church and things will begin to happen in your neighborhood that you have long been wishing for.

Lofty Expectations*

THERE is a singular harmony between both the young people's meeting topics for this Sunday and the Sunday school lesson. We all like to believe that the Holy Spirit guides the men and committees who assign these topics, a work that must be done months in advance. So it seems a beautiful, a divinely appointed thing that in these days of dreadful war news the Sunday schools of the world should be called upon to study Love, and the great Christian Endeavor and Baptist Young People's Societies to study Prayer. Now the Epworth League is considering for its Rally Day "A Song of Lofty Expectations." Could there be any better way of getting ready for the fulfilment of these lofty expectations in the face of the world's great need than by pondering, with desperate earnestness, the truths of love and prayer?

Much suggestive material for this meeting will be found in the notes on the Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. topic and the Sunday school lesson.

You notice that the key thoughts of the two psalms assigned for our special Epworth League study are God and the church. Only as God is allowed to abide in the church and make it the channel of his power will its work in the world be done. The Epworth League is part of the church. "Its help cometh from the Lord, who made heaven and earth." He will keep our League from stumbling (verse 3), from exhaustion (5 and 6), from evil (7), from errors and from defeat (8). If we live in the faith of this 121st Psalm the joys of the 122d shall be ours continually.

SARAH PERKINS AND THE MONEY TRUST

at her with polite scorn and uttered one word: "Well?"

Sarah noted the subtly modulated tone; but this time she did not flush. She drew herself up a little straighter and nipped her words a little more sharply:

"I have studied all the histories of politics and diplomacy and economics. I have toiled faithfully over the many, many schemes which brilliant statesmen have devised to prevent war. But I have never found one as good as my father's. It will work against Russia as well as it did against Micky Maguire."

Lord Riggleston smiled a most superior, indulgent smile. It was the entirely good-natured smirk of a seasoned diplomat who, having been ill at ease in dealing with a person who might be a genius in disguise, discovers that there is no disguise, no genius, but only a very ordinary, simple-witted young lady before him.

"The old way of trying to stop a fight was to exhort the fighters to love each other. That is sentimentalism. And it works only if the fighters happen to be swayed by sentiment. Unfortunately, though, the very people who are most likely to fight are those who are least likely to be influenced by soft words. Hence the new and rational way of stopping a fight. It is to remove either the cause or the motive or the means of fighting.

"Micky's sand pit was the cause of our childhood fights. We were all deprived of admission to it, and the fighting ceased. The Balkan peninsula is Russia's sand pit. Then let us exclude her from it forever.

"Can we do this by sending an army? No. That would keep her out only so long as our army was stronger than hers. How then? Why, by—"

"Mr. Chairman!" Lord Riggleston interrupted suavely, "might I suggest that, in view of the distressing news just received from the Balkans, we proceed at once to a consideration of definite ways and means—"

"Mr. Chairman!" Sarah Perkins exclaimed, as she unfolded a little piece of paper. "I am quite in sympathy with Lord Riggleston's proposal. And, as I have the floor, may I not present my own plan for preventing further bloodshed in the distressed Peninsula?"

Lord Riggleston threw up his dainty hands and almost wailed. The French delegates shrugged their padded shoulders. Only Old Harms grinned and sang out, in a most unparliamentary tone: "Go ahead, little girl. Sic 'em!"

"Those Americans!" groaned the junior British delegate.

"You have the floor." The chairman bowed dejectedly to Sarah.

"Thank you!" cooed Sarah sweetly. Then she began to read the little slip of paper. . . .

Hot and cruel is the Paris sun in the doldrums of mid-July. The white stones of the house fronts fling their reflected fire at the wayfarer, and up from the glaring pavements flickers the writhing gas that men, in more seasonable times, call air. In the meager shade of a scorched horse-chestnut tree in front of the offices of Rochefort & Cie., Boulevard Faurot, a wretched gendarme wilted.

The door of Rochefort & Cie. opened. A plump, red-cheeked little gentleman in dustless black and a stiff white collar waddled forth bareheaded, gazed down the boulevard.—and shivered!

In fact, his teeth chattered!

Anxiously the senior member of France's oldest and most influential firm of foreign investment brokers squinted through the shimmering solitudes of the highway. He twitched his soft, manicured fingers in some strange distress. Then, from a near tower boomed the twelve of high noon.

"Too late! Too late!" the little gentleman wailed and clutched at his sleek, scant hair. And, as the cry escaped him, there came a roar from around the corner of the nearest side street. A black streak shot, like a leaping leopard, into the blazing stretches of the boulevard; whirled in a sharp, cyclonic curve up to the curb—

A limousine halted beside the astonished gendarme. The door was flung open with a savage thrust from within. And forth leaped a huge blond beard, a bullish frame, and two flashing pale eyes.

"My aeroplane ran into a nasty storm over Cologne. Delayed us three hours!" the new arrival snapped, as he clutched M. Rochefort's arm and hustled him into the office. "Now to business!"

"It's too late, your Excellency! Too late! There's nothing to be done!" sobbed M. Rochefort, in a panic-stricken whimper.

"What's this rubbish?" the visitor sneered. "Too late for our loan? Pouf! It's never too late for Russia, my dear Rochefort. Now come! We must have the first fifty million roubles advanced before sunset. You know what has broken loose. Those Bulgars have killed nine hundred of our best infantry officers. They've blown up eighty garrisons, eleven temporary arsenals, and—worst luck of all—they've absolutely shattered every railway bridge from the Danube to the Adriatic.

"We need two hundred million roubles to re-establish ourselves, to repair the railway." The Russian talked on irresistibly. "And half of it must be paid over at once. We have vast quantities of food and ammunition to buy. These heavy unforeseen losses, you know—"

"I tell you, it is too late," insisted Monsieur Rochefort, and once more he shivered. "Did you not read the new foreign loan law? I sent you a copy last week—"

"I've been too busy, down in the seat of war," retorted the Russian. "And, anyhow, why should an Archduke bother over a mere law? There's nothing your politicians can write on paper, my dear Rochefort, that can interfere with Russia. Now—"

"I dare not give you a franc, your Excellency!" Monsieur was whining now; for the Archduke Vladimir was piercing the little gentleman with a murderous glance. "At noon to-day—that was not ten minutes ago!—the new law went into force. From this hour forth, nobody in France may lend money to a foreign power, either for equipping a military expedition or for paying off old war debts, or for carrying on any operations connected with the waging of war other than civil war."

"So I read in the newspapers!" remarked the Archduke coolly. "But what of it? These silly petty politicians! You and I can dodge them, as we've done many a time before. You say all war loans are forbidden? Very well! I, the Archduke Vladimir, come to you as a private citizen. I own eight million acres of timber and mineral lands in Siberia. I wish to borrow money to—mm—let us say, to build a lumber railway through the tract and to open a hundred mines. I shall need fifty million roubles at once, and another fifty millions within six months." The Archduke grinned sardonically. "If you wish references as to my character and financial standing, I'm sure any commercial agency will favor you—"

"Ah!" sighed the French banker dismally. "We might have done that yesterday—or even this morning, your Excellency. And allow me to assure your Excellency that the firm of Rochefort & Cie. will gladly advance any sum your Excellency may ask for the development of those eight million acres. But—under the new law, we must go through certain most embarrassing formalities."

"Eh! For a private loan?" the Archduke snapped.

"Allow me to read a section of the accursed law, your Excellency." Monsieur Rochefort whipped a thin document from his coat pocket. "Here! Paragraph 14."

"14. All foreign loans, private as well as public, shall be registered at the Bureau of Foreign Loans, in the Treasury Department, Paris. And the lenders or their agents shall deposit with the said Bureau the mortgages, collateral securities, or other liens delivered by the borrowers."

"Read on," commanded the Archduke in a terrible voice.

"15. All mortgages, collateral securities and other liens deposited by foreign borrowers shall be forfeited to the French Government, in case the moneys advanced against them by French lenders or their agents shall have been expended for the purchase of armaments, ammunition, or any other military or naval supplies, or for the prosecution of any military or naval campaign.

"16. All exportations of bullion gold and silver shall be executed through the Bureau of Foreign Loans. And the Treasury Department is herewith empowered to prescribe such regulations as shall guarantee that all such bullion exportations are made exclusively for the balancing of international commercial accounts. Provided only that the expense of supervision shall be defrayed entirely by the Government, and that bullion shipments be not delayed unduly.

"17. All bullion gold or silver exported through any other channel than the Bureau of Foreign Loans shall, if found, be confiscated; and shall revert to the French Government. And neither the consignor nor the consignee shall have any redress, unless there shall be forthcoming clear proof that the shipment was made in simple error.

"18. All lenders or their agents shall submit affidavits of the intending borrowers regarding the amount of the loans they seek and the purposes to which the loans shall be expended. The ambassadors, ministers, consuls, or consular agents of the French Government shall verify the expenditures of such loans at the place of expenditure and shall report at regular intervals upon the same. All such reports shall be strictly confidential; and no information in them shall be made public except upon the order of the Committee of Finance of the Chamber of Deputies."

"Stop!" thundered the Archduke, and his huge fist crashed down upon the banker's table viciously. "Does all this mean that I can't even get a private loan from you unless I deposit security and tell how I am going to use the money?"

The banker nodded.

"And then you take the securities to this new-fangled Bureau of Foreign Loans? And there they stay until I have repaid the loan?"

"Correct," said Monsieur Rochefort.

"And your diplomatic corps will watch me to see how I spend it? And if I turn it over to our great and noble Czar for the suppressing of the Balkan uprising, your charming Bureau will quietly pocket the first mortgage on my eight million acres and leave you, the lender, high and dry, eh?"

"Your Excellency keenly perceived the diabolical ingenuity of the law." Monsieur Rochefort bowed deeply. "I regret to say that it is ironclad. How many, many nights have I and my colleagues pried at each joint in its armor! And we have found no weak spot in it. Would you know why? The reason is very simple.

"This law places the entire risk of the loan upon the lender. It makes

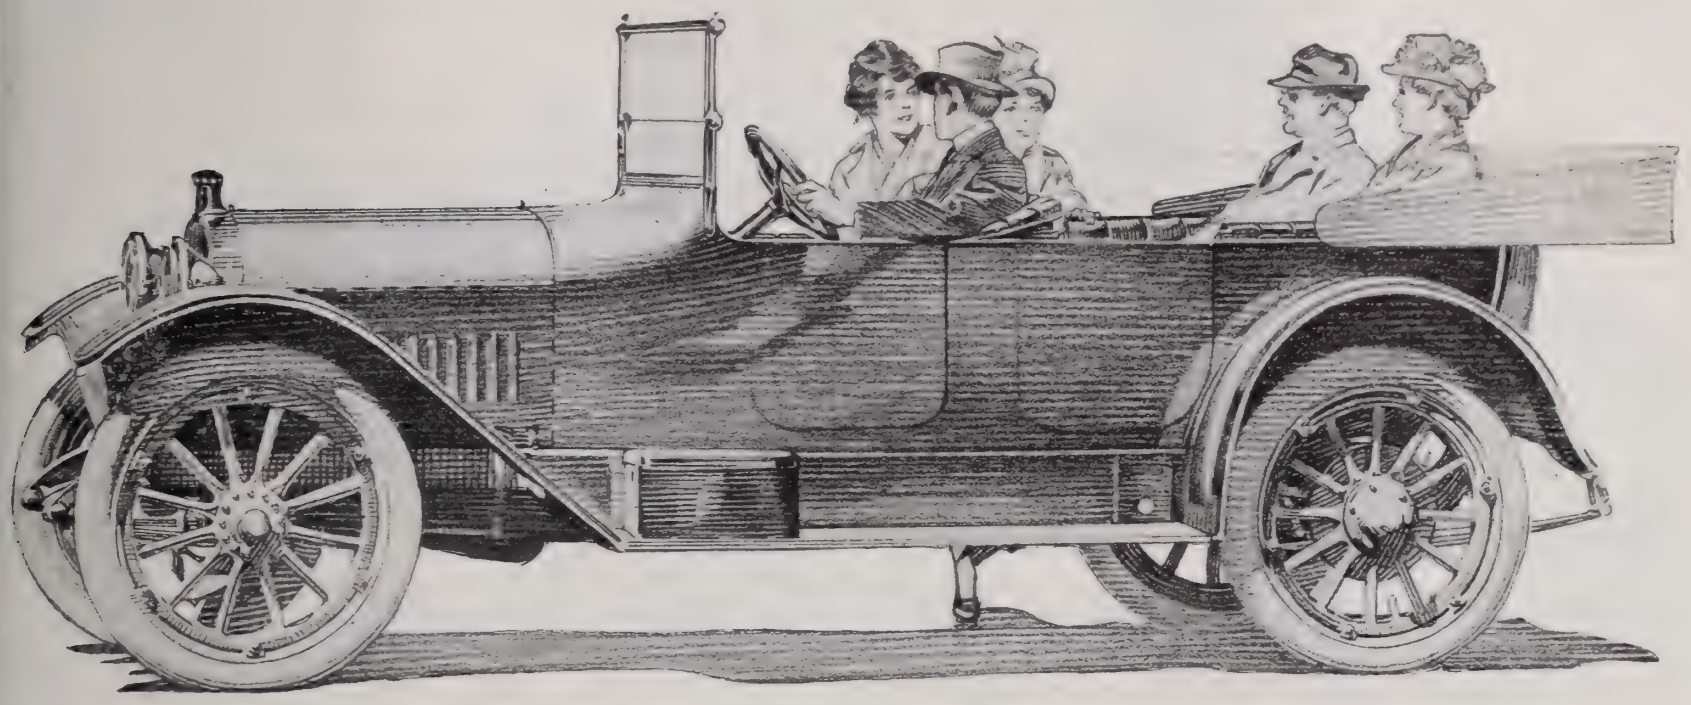
1915 Hupmobile

Car of the American Family



$1200

Complete

For the third time the Hupp Motor Car Company has produced a car which will prove immeasurably superior, we believe, to any that assumes to compete with it.

The first Hupmobile 20 made for itself, and held against all rivalry, an immense following, at home and abroad.

The "32" put the Hupmobile into another class, and surpassed the "20" in world-wide popularity.

This new Hupmobile bids fair to eclipse them both, as the very utmost a motorist can desire.

A highly specialized, individualized, Hupmobilized motor car, which gives you, we believe, more service and comfort for your money than you can find if you comb the market a dozen times over.

Listen to the details:

Specifications

More Power

Motor, 3⅜-inch bore by 5½-inch stroke; cylinders cast en bloc, with water jacket space between barrels; valves 1½-inch clear diameter, mushroom tappets, with special shape cams, very quiet; valve spring chamber closed by oil-tight cover, so that contacts are made in an oil bath. New shape combustion chamber, larger valves and larger cylinder bore produce more power. Multiple disc clutch, with thirteen 13-inch plates.

New Type Carburetor

Horizontal type bolted directly to cylinder block. Gas passage between cylinders, so that intake manifold is heated its entire length, assuring complete vaporization of even the heaviest gasoline.

Improved Oiling

A system already highly efficient made still better. Pressure feed from fly-wheel to main bearings and connecting rod bearings; cylinder walls lubricated by mist from crankshaft.

Modern Ignition

Ignition from storage battery, with automatic spark advance. Type rapidly being adopted by progressive engineers.

Single Unit Electrical System

Generator and starting motor combined, driven by silent chain from front end of crankshaft. Supplies current for starting, ignition and lighting. Makes motor non-stallable. Westinghouse 12-volt system.

Lower Wheelbase; More Room

Wheelbase, 119 inches; tires, 34 by 4 inches. Roomy five-passenger body; 2 inches more leg-room in front, 7 inches more in tonneau; full tufted upholstery; concealed door hinges, flush handles. Front springs, 37 inches long, practically flat; rear springs, semi-elliptic, 52 inches long, swung under axle; springs self-oiling. Brakes, 14 inches in diameter.

Left Steer, Center Control

Model 32

Complete with electric starter and lights, demountable rims, oversize tires, 33x4; tire carrier at rear..... $1050

With regular equipment of top, windshield, gas lamps, etc., but without special equipment noted above, $950. Prices, f. o. b. Detroit.

Price in Canada, $1,230, f. o. b. Windsor, including electrical and other special equipment noted above.

Speedometer, starting and lighting switches mounted flush in center of cowl board. Speedometer drive from transmission.

Non-Glare Dimmer Headlights

Hupmobile design. Upper half of headlight glass corrugated. Kills reflector glare, complying with many city ordinances and giving full illumination on road. One bulb in headlights, dimmed at will through resistance in switch. No side-lamps.

Equipment and Other Details

16-gallon gasoline tank in cowl; rain-vision windshield, fixed uprights, lower half adjustable for ventilation. One-man type top, attached to windshield. Crowned fenders, with flat edge and without beading. Tail lamp, exclusive Hupmobile design, illuminates license plate and entire width of road for considerable distance behind car. Nonskid tires on rear; demountable rims; carrier at rear for spare rim and tire. Lighting and ignition switches controlled by Yale locks. Speedometer. Robe rail, foot rail and cocoa mat in tonneau. Color: blue-black with maroon running gear.

Price, f. o. b. Detroit, includes complete equipment.

Price in Canada $1,400, f. o. b. Windsor, with complete equipment.

Improvements

Longer wheelbase
More room
Improved body
Improved upholstery
More power
Larger bore
Larger valves
Better carburetion
Improved combustion chamber
Special quiet cams
Valve tappets operating in oil
Improved motor lubrication
13 clutch plates
Intake manifold water jacketed
New type radiator
Improved steering
Easier clutch operation
Improved starting and lighting
Non-stallable motor Improved ignition
Left drive
Larger pedal pads
Rear springs semi-elliptic
Longer front springs
Springs self-lubricating
Larger wheels
Larger gasoline tank
One-man type top
New windshield
Transmission speedometer drive
Lock on ignition and lighting switches
Automatic spark advance
Throttle lever on steering wheel
Ignition and lighting switches on cowl board
Exclusive non-glare dimmer headlights
Exclusive design tail light

"This is Van Camp's"

Any boy—even blindfolded—can pick out Van Camp's by the taste.

He may never have seen them—never tasted them before. But serve them with others and say, "Choose the best," and he will always choose Van Camp's.

So with boys' fathers. You can never satisfy men with old-style baked beans after they know Van Camp's.

Please make the test. If these new-time beans so excel the old you surely want to get them.

VAN CAMP'S
PORK & BEANS BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE
Also Baked Without the Sauce

10, 15 and 20 Cents Per Can

The difference lies in mealiness, in nuttiness, in tang. Van Camp's are whole and mellow. None are crisped, none hard, none broken. You know that right baking has made them digestible.

That baking is done by super-heated steam under pressure, without the steam touching the beans.

The tang is due to the sauce we bake into them. It has sparkle and zest. One can never forget it.

The result is a dish that's unique. It bears no resemblance to our boyhood beans, nor to beans of today baked like them.

It comes to you ready-baked. It ought to be as welcome to you as to those you serve.

Let it prove itself. If the can you buy fails to meet expectations, your grocer will refund your money.

him personally responsible for the lawful disbursement of the loan in the foreign country. The government acts as a bonding company does when it insures an employer against the possible defalcation of a cashier. It is the cashier who gives bond, and it is the bonding company that supervises his behavior.

"You must know, your Excellency," the little banker extended a conciliatory hand, "that Rochefort & Cie. would gladly advance you all you ask. But"—up went two helpless shoulders—"our clients will not let us! We have baskets and baskets of letters already from them. They all say: 'Take no chances with foreign loans. Put our funds only in first-class foreign industrials and municipals.' And to protect ourselves against appalling losses we, in conjunction with all other large French banking institutions, have resolved to establish direct supervision over our large foreign borrowers. Our own agents shall see that our funds are not imperiled by being spent for war or anything connected with war."

"Your infernal demagogues!" raved the big Russian. "They've ruined a magnificent loan business for France! I'll have to go to London now. The Englishmen will have rich pickings for the next ten years. We've planned a great campaign. We shall raise two billion roubles—"

"Oh dear! Haven't you heard?" Monsieur Rochefort gasped, and dropped his jaw oddly. "It will do you no good to go to London. At noon to-day this identical law went into effect throughout the British empire!"

There was a terrible silence in the office. The Archduke's great blond beard quivered, and beads of sweat stood out upon his wide, fair brow. But it was not the heat of the day that brought them; for the fan-chilled office was as cool as an October night.

"I dislike going to Berlin." The giant spoke slowly and with pain. "Those Germans don't like us. They'll make us pay eight per cent.—or maybe more—"

"At noon to-day," droned the Frenchman lifelessly, "this identical law went into effect in Germany and also in the United States. In France, Great Britain, Germany, and the United States," he echoed, eyeing the wilted gendarme through the window. "The four money-lenders of the world. Outside of them there is not free capital enough to finance your Balkan war for more than a month or two. I am afraid, your Excellency, that your great country would do well to withdraw from the bloody peninsula and put your armies to work felling trees instead of men, and planting wheat instead of hatred. Do that, and the coffers of the world will open wide to you."

"What devil's scheme is this?" screamed the outwitted Slav, and his brutish fingers taloned the air. "What enemy of Russia plotted this international conspiracy? Tell me, that I may slay him with my own hands."

"It was all done by an American school teacher named Sarah Perkins, at a special conference at The Hague last month. The Americans have pensioned her for life, as a reward for this ingenuity. She—"

"May heaven strike her down dead!" raved the Russian.

"Heaven has done worse than that!" The banker wagged his head solemnly. "The woman has gone crazy. She is spending all her pension money—Oh hee! hee!—how do you suppose, Excellency? Buying a sand pit in a little lost village in Illinois and erecting a marble statue there to her father and an unheard-of barbarian named Miqué Maguire! I know it. A Paris sculptor is doing the work. He showed me the drawings."

"Saints in heaven!" screamed the Archduke to himself, all of a sudden. "I must send word to our generals to stop their campaign! We're out of cash—and where more will come from?—Have you a wireless here?"

He staggered into a little rear room. Somebody set the ether crackling, while the autocrat dictated feverishly. In a few minutes, he reeled out, bade a hysterical adieu to the banker, and wavered into the street. At the curb he halted, flung up his ape-like arms to the brazen, withering sky, and shrieked hoarsely: "Five hundred years of war and scheming brought to nothing! The ancient dreams of the Romanoffs shattered! And by a Yankee school teacher! Ar-r-rgh!"

He flung himself into the limousine, and vanished down the boulevard in a whirlwind of parching dust.

"This heat!" muttered the gendarme. "It has fried the poor Monsieur's wits!"

"No, mon ami!" The banker glided up beside him and looked down the thoroughfare. "It was not the heat. It was Miss Sarah who—as the Americans say it—cooked poor Vladimir's goose."

What You Want to Know

WHAT you want to know about the Saxon car is what it ill do under the conditions n which you would use it.

You know the price is right nd you can appreciate, from he illustration, the beautiful, tylish, distinctive looks of he car. But what will it do?

Over 6000 Saxons are now n use in all parts of the coun- ry and under all kinds of con- litions. We think the best way to tell you what the Saxon will do for you is to let thers tell you what it has done for them. Below we give you the testimony of some of these Saxon users. Some one of them is giving his car just the service you would give yours.

No Pennsylvania Hills Too Difficult

Mr. Myers of Franklin, Pa., says, 'The hills in Venango and Clarion Counties are very bad but there is no road too difficult for the Saxon. In spots the clay was 14 inches deep but we ran the Saxon out with its own power, although the wheels were lit- erally solid with clay."

W. F. Vorous of Green Bay, Wis., writes, "I would not trade my Saxon for anything on four wheels at any- where near the price. I have satisfied myself the car will give the service."

William P. Call of Pikeville, Ky., says, "My Saxon is simply giving great service climbing our roadless hills, going through creeks and sand and rock valleys. I drive my Saxon right over places where other cars 'buck.'"

Upkeep 16c per Day in Michigan

W. P. Hansley of Calumet, Mich- igan, special officer for the Calumet and Hecla Mining Company, says, "I use my Saxon in my work and for pleasure trips, too. It climbs the hills that some of the big cars simply can't negotiate. And it has cost me so far six- teen cents a day to run it, and I have averaged over 30 miles per gallon of gasoline. My wife and I expect to drive out to the fair in it next summer."

E. A. Brodie of Burlington, Ver- mont, tells of running to Enosburg, a distance of fifty miles, "and I never went off high gear once, yet the run was made in the dark and during the hardest rain and wind storm the coun- try has ever experienced. My Saxon works like a $3,000 car."

Remarkable Economy on Georgia Roads

The Glover-White Mercantile Com- pany of Rome, Ga., uses a Saxon for doing canvassing work in neighboring counties. They write: "We have run our Saxon about five or six thousand miles, and have just put on one new outside casing. The car has been driven by inexperienced drivers; how- ever, the cost of upkeep has been less than one-half of the cost in running other runabouts."

They don't always have the best of going in Kansas and Oklahoma, but F. W. Bickel of Alva, Oklahoma, writes, "I drove my Saxon from Wichita, Kansas, to Alva, Oklahoma, through deep mud and during a heavy rain, but I made over 15 miles per hour on high and kept to the course while passing large cars running on low and skidding from side to side."

248 Miles on 7 Gallons in Indiana

H. V. Smith of Marion, Indiana, writes, "I am glad to tell you that I reached home from Detroit in fine shape. I made the 248 miles on seven gallons of gasoline. And I had to ford a river where the water rose to the radiator. But I came through O. K. and this ride convinced me that the Saxon will do anything any other car will and a little bit more."

Dr. N. B. Reeser of Newville, Penn- sylvania, writes, "My Saxon is doing fine. I use it in all my practice and certainly like it. I get 33 miles per gal- lon of gasoline over the worst roads."

M. E. Clifton of Unity, Ohio, says, "I did not once make a gear shift from high to climb any hills or pull through sand, and there is certainly plenty of sand on the route."

Howard V. O'Brien, editor of The Trimmed Lamp, Harbor Springs, Michigan, writes, "The Saxon is be- having mighty well up here in spite of there being nothing but hills—steep hills and sandy hills at that. It has aroused very favorable comment."

Guy E. Duell of Tolono, Illinois, tells us "The riding and steering qualities and the way the Saxon sticks to the road surprise every one."

T. M. Taylor, Randolph, Nebr., says, "You have a fine motor in your car."

Climbs Missouri Hills on High

C. A. Krumstick of Washington, Missouri, says, "The Saxon does won- derfully on high and pulls hills on high gear that larger cars fall down on."

Dr. W. A. Gott of Washington, Illinois, writes, "Now we ride more in my Saxon than in my big car."

Wonderful Records in Public Tests

On July 4 a Saxon completed a coast to coast trip of 3,389 miles over the Lincoln Highway in 30 days, crossing the Alleghanies, the Rockies, the Sierras, the wide stretching plains and the Great American Desert, aver- aged 30 miles to the gallon of gasoline.

Then on May 16, 100 regular stock Saxon cars in as many towns all over the country made non-stop runs of 200 miles each, averaging 34.53 miles per gallon of gasoline—less than half a cent a mile for fuel, less than one- fourth cent a mile per passenger.

Thus the Saxon has proved conclu- sively both in public tests and in the sterner grind of service in 6,000 users' hands that it will average greater mileage daily, day in and day out, at less operation cost than any other car in the world.

High-Priced Car Features Built into the Saxon

The Saxon is the lowest-priced car in the world of similar specifications and capable of performing similar service.

The long stroke motor of special Saxon design gives almost the power and flexibility of a "Six," and even when running at low speed the "pull" is velvety smooth.

The Saxon has a dry-plate clutch. Cars costing $2,000 and more use this clutch, too.

The body is hung low, the lines are after a beautiful French mode which gives the Saxon a most distinctive, smart appearance.

There's plenty of space inside where room means comfort. The seat is plenty wide for two big people.

The Saxon, because of its cantilever spring suspension—a new feature in American cars—clings closely to the highest crowned roads and makes the Saxon a supremely easy riding car even over rough roads.

Instead of "cool as a cucumber," motorists are saying "cool as a Saxon." For the honeycomb radiator (finest type known) with its large cooling surface keeps the Saxon motor perfectly cool.

The Saxon sliding gear transmis- sion is declared by engineering prac- tice universally to be the only really correct type.

Isn't This Commonsense?

If a Saxon will carry you 1,000 miles on $5 worth of gasoline, why invest in a car that eats up $15 worth in the same distance?

If a Saxon requires only $1 worth of lubricating oil in 1,000 miles, why drive a car which uses $3 worth?

If a Saxon tire costs $10, why pay $50 for a big car tire which will last only one-third as long?

Finally, if a Saxon at $395 will go as far as any other car; if it will do what any other car will do and do it with equal comfort, why buy a car which costs two or five times as much to begin with and two to five times as much every day you run it?

These are facts too vital to ignore.

Ride in the Saxon To-day

The Saxon is ready—waiting for you. Don't put off the many and varied pleasures of motoring any longer. Think of the price—consider the upkeep cost, and then investigate the Saxon. If you can possibly do it to-day take a drive in a Saxon. Our nearest dealer will be glad to give you this opportunity.

ANSWERS TO FINANCIAL QUERIES

G. M., NEW JERSEY. The Copper Handbook refers to Butte Exemption Copper Company: "Letters returned unclaimed from former main office at Butte, Silverbow County, Mont. Company dead."

C. F., OHIO. (1) Western Ohio Railway Company first mortgage 5s, due November 1, 1921, are, we believe, an excellent investment so far as safety goes. We doubt, however, that there would be a very well established market for these bonds in case the holder desired to sell. The present Western Ohio Railroad Company has taken over the Western Ohio Railway Company, and guarantees the payment of interest on the bonds. (2) We can offer no quotation for Troy Wagon Works Company stock. Write to Geiger-Jones Company, Canton, Ohio.

J. W. B., OHIO. It would be exceedingly difficult for us to give a comprehensive list of American corporations which have been financed by foreign capital and whose security issues are now largely owned in Great Britain or in other foreign lands—corporations such as "breweries, railroads, insurance companies, steamship lines, etc." We might say, however, a part of most all of the security issues of great American corporations are owned in Europe. The London Stock Exchange and the stock exchanges in Paris, Berlin, Antwerp and St. Petersburg all have departments for the buying and selling of certain American stocks and bonds. We know of no American corporation that is exclusively owned in Great Britain or elsewhere in Europe, with the possible exception of a few oil companies engaged in producing oil in the San Joaquin Valley, California.

F. L. D., COLORADO. You state that you have $2,000 for investment, and ask us to recommend about a dozen safe 6 per cent. investments. We suggest the following:

	Due	Denomination	Price	Yield
Alton, Granite & St. Louis Trac. 5s	1944	$1,000	87½	5.95
Carolina Power & Light First 5s	1938	1,000, 500	90	5.80
Central States Electric Corp. Coll. 5s	1922	1,000	90	6.30
Chicago City Ry. 1st Mtge. 5s	1927	1,000	Mkt.	4.85
Detroit Edison Co. 1st Mtge. 5s	1933	1,000	103½	4.80
Huntington Land & Imp. Coll. G 6s	Serial	1,000	100	6.00
Interborough Rapid Transit 1st & rfg. 5s	1966	1,000	99	5.08
Laclede Gaslight Co. St. L. & Ext. 5s	1934	1,000	100½	5.00
Middle West Utilities Coll. 6s	1916	1,000, 500, 100	98½	6.75
No-Edison Elec. 1st Cons. Gold 5s	1927	1,000	100¼	5.00
Montana Power Company First & Rfg. 5s	1943	1,000, 500, 100	94½	5.40
Spokane & Inland Emp. R. E. first & Rfg. 5s	1926	1,000	91½	6.00

You may obtain any of the above securities from the investment banking firms whose advertisements appear on this page.

E. H., KENTUCKY. Pay-as-You-Enter Car Company preferred stock is quoted 14 cents on the dollar. We do not regard the stock as an investment.

M. M. A., OHIO. The preferred stock of the Winona Interurban Railway is regarded as a speculative issue, one that we would not recommend to our readers. The company's current liabilities reported for 1913 are $127,167 as against $101,912 in 1912. The profit and loss account for 1913 is $160,830 as against $91,263 in 1912. We see no immediate possibility of this company's paying dividends on the stock outstanding.

A. S. E., PROVIDENCE, R. I. The Amalgamated Mining and Oil Company became hopelessly bankrupt a year or more before A. L. Wisner and his partner, J. J. Meyers, were convicted of fraud in connection with the flotation of the company. The stock is worthless.

L. S. D., NEW JERSEY. (1) The bonds of the defunct New York Central Realty Company are said to be worthless. (2) W. E. Cooper, the president of the company, has been convicted in the United States District Court at New York for misuse of the mails in promoting the sale of the bonds.

J. C., MICHIGAN. After safety, which should always be the investor's first consideration, the next thing to look for in an investment is the degree of its marketability. We always caution our readers to assure themselves that the security they propose to buy possesses an assured market, either through some recognized stock exchange or through the banking firms which originally brought out the issue. Every investor may need to convert his investments into cash. If he has purchased unsalable stocks or bonds he cannot do this.

MRS. A. N. W., NEW JERSEY. Industrial Savings and Loan claimholders will receive another dividend this fall, unless the present plans of Mr. Benjamin D. Haight, deputy superintendent of the Banking Department of the State of New York, fall through. Mr. Haight tells us that dividend checks will probably be mailed to the creditors late in the autumn.

J. S., PENNSYLVANIA. Mr. H. C. Newland, secretary of the National Railroads of Haiti and president of the West Indian Development Company, 55 Wall Street, tells us that, owing to the revolution which has been going on in Haiti for more than a year, no constructive work has been done on the railroad, and that the stockholders of the development company have been officially informed as to the conditions existing. We have been unable to find any market whatever for the shares of the West Indian Development Company. There are no shares of the railroad company outstanding in the hands of private investors. The stock is all owned by the development company.

S. W., MASSACHUSETTS. You state that you have two Western Pacific first mortgage 5 per cent. bonds, bought some years ago at $980 each and two Denver and Ric Grande first and refunding 5 per cent. bonds bought at $950 each, and ask us if you ought to sell them before the values show a greater shrinkage. Inasmuch as the latest quotation for these bonds represent a loss to you of about one-half of the amount you originally expended should you sell, we believe you can afford to take chances with the future and hold for better prices.

F. D. McB., NEW MEXICO. International Educational Publishing Company stocks are quoted by Wall Street brokers who handle this class of securities, as $30 bid for preferred; $18 bid for common.

E. C. R., WEST VIRGINIA. (1) By all means accept the firm's offer. The firm stands well. (2) A $1,000 Brooklyn Borough Gas general mortgage 5 per cent. 40-year gold bond will be as safe an investment as you need look for. The company is said to be earning nearly three times the yearly interest on all its outstanding bonds, or nearly five times the interest on the outstanding $500,000 general mortgage bonds after prior deductions.

MRS. C. P. H., NEW YORK. Nothing in the present financial situation justifies your fears for the safety of your $12,000 on deposit in four different New York Savings banks. Nothing will be gained by removing your money "to store it in a safe-deposit vault until the war is over." It would be quite a different matter, however, if you should withdraw your funds to buy good bonds. After the New York Stock Exchange reopens, and the machinery of the buying and selling of securities once more settles down to a relatively normal pace, there will likely be exceedingly attractive investment opportunities presented to buyers who possess the cash necessary to take advantage of the offerings. But don't take your money from the banks to hoard it. That would be as wasteful as it would be unnecessary.

G. W. K., WYOMING. The Carbonate Gold and Silver Mining and Milling Company is reported in Smythe's Obsolete Securities, "dead; stock worthless."

E. H., RHODE ISLAND. We suggest the following two $100 bonds for your investment: Virginian Railway Company first mortgage 50-year 5 per cent. gold bond, 1962, at par; Twin State Gas and Electric Company, three-year 6 per cent. notes at a price to yield 6½ per cent. A $200 investment in one each of these issues will give you an average yield of about 6 per cent.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

STILL the war in Europe rages and still the thought of the horrors and agonies of it hold first place in the minds of God's people. Many prayer groups are petitioning heaven to bring the cruel conflict to a speedy end. Let all the members of the Prayer League, their churches and their friends pray that, whatever is to be the outcome of the strife, the struggle itself may be brief. God's plans will not be permanently thwarted. His will shall be wrought out. Let us pray that these days of tribulation may be shortened and peace dawn speedily.

A subscriber from Milo, Me., writes: "On October 22, 1897, God wonderfully healed me in answer to the prayer of several earnest Christian friends united with my own. This was after nearly six years of hopeless helplessness. I was made perfectly well and strong immediately, and was led to claim it through reading Psalm 103: 1-14. Later an injured eye was healed. In December, 1911, God healed me of serious indigestion after three years of suffering. I was led to claim this through reading Malachi 3: 10. If we do our part, God always does his." E. M. G. writes from Moorehead, Miss.: "Prayer has been answered for us in a wonderful way, in healing, and in financial matters." A Reader from Kingsville, Pa., writes: "I wish to acknowledge that God answered my prayer to spare my mother's life during a very severe illness."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

Mrs. L. A. B., Merriam, Ill.; Mrs. E. A. H., Seeley, Calif.; A Reader, Sayre, Okla.; V. S., Long Beach, Calif.; E. B., Redlands, Calif.; E. A. D., Parsons, Kan.; Mrs. W. S. LESS MEAT

Advice of Family Physician.

Formerly people thought meat necessary for strength and muscular vigor.

The man who worked hard was supposed to require meat two or three times a day. Science has found out differently.

It is now a common thing for the family physician to order less meat, as in the following letter from a N. Y. man:

"I had suffered for years with dyspepsia and nervousness. My physician advised me to eat less meat and greasy foods generally. I tried several things to take the place of my usual breakfast of chops, fried potatoes, etc., but got no relief until I tried Grape-Nuts food.

"After using Grape-Nuts for the cereal part of my meals for two years, I am now a well man. Grape-Nuts benefited my health far more than the medicine I had taken before.

"My wife and children are healthier than they had been for years, and we are a very happy family, largely due to Grape-Nuts.

"We have been so much benefited by Grape-Nuts that it would be ungrateful not to acknowledge it."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Over 21,000 Physicians would answer "Yes"

WHEN day after day you have felt your strength slowly ebbing—and day by day grown more discouraged at your failure to get relief from "tonics" and "bracers"—it is but natural that you look with scepticism upon Sanatogen's claims, and ask yourself—"Will it really give me back my strength?"

Fine words can never convince you—but what of the overwhelming fact that lies back of Sanatogen—the written commendation of over 21,000 physicians?

Any of them—all of them—would doubtless tell you that Sanatogen can help you—will help you. For already they have written us how, watching case after case, they know that Sanatogen rebuilds impoverished nerve cells, enriches the blood, regenerates digestion and uplifts and re-enforces the entire system.

And when with that you couple the grateful testimony of the hosts of people who have received a new joy in living from Sanatogen's beneficial aid, the conclusion is inevitable—Sanatogen will give you back your strength!

Sanatogen is sold by good druggists everywhere in three sizes, from $1.00 up.

The Right Reverend the Bishop of Southampton writes:

"It gives me pleasure to bear my testimony to the value of Sanatogen as an invigorating tonic and restorative. It is undoubtedly beneficial."

La Mignon No. 24A 1600 — Silk Poplin Dress. This advance style at the showings of Fall styles in New York was conspicuously popular. The tunic overskirt is the feature which so strongly influenced the Fall modes. The dress is made of shimmering lustrous Silk Poplin and is trimmed with collar, vestee and cuffs of a fine embroidered net. Long sleeves, kimono armholes, corded belt of Poplin with cleverly placed bow. In Navy Blue, the fashionable Mahogany or a lovely Wisteria. Sizes 34 to 44 bust. Also for misses and small women—14, 16 and 18 years. State size and color. $5 dress, Prepaid. $5.98

The Varenka No. 24A 1601 — The Charles William Stores Dress Special. The Russian Tunic, recently introduced in Paris, was immediately adapted throughout Europe and soon became the style most decidedly in evidence here. We have selected the best example for our opening announcement. For it, the leading material for Fall was selected—a lovely Wool Crepe. The trimming is a striking Roman Stripe Corded Silk—the dominant note in all modish gowns to-day. Fashionable set-in kimono sleeves; smartly designed cuffs; vest of rich effective lace over net. Navy blue or golden brown; sizes 34 to 44 bust. Also misses (small women), 14, 16 and 18 years. State size and color. $5 dress, Prepaid. $3.98

The Waldorf No. 24A 1300 — This fine white voile waist is lavishly trimmed, both front and back, with richly embroidered bands, alternated with creamy Shadow Lace. The collar is of Organdie—one of the most tough, fine of all materials. The three-quarter sleeves are finished with a beginning frill of the Shadow lace. White only. Sizes 32 to 46 bust. Give bust measure. $2 waist, Prepaid. $1.00

The Broadway No. 24A 1301 — Made of a charming Brocaded washable Cotton Crepe with trimmings of Pique. The Pique collar is in great demand abroad. Notice the collar; the use of French veining at seams; Pique buttons; deep pointed cuffs. White only. Sizes 32 to 46 inches. Give bust measure. $2 waist, Prepaid. $1.00

The Manhattan No. 24A 1302 — This waist shows an unusually desirable combination of the latest style and the most fashionable material—Embroidered Organdy. The collar is the new semi-roll style. The front panel is joined to the waist by means of fine beading. Lovely crochet buttons. The new deep cuff is of Lawn. Remarkably well made through-out and a marvel at the price. In white only. Size 32 to 46 bust. Give size. $2 waist, Prepaid. $1.00

The Romany Belle No. 24A 1303 — On Fifth Avenue, where the best dressed women of New York are seen, the most costly costumes show Roman striped effects. This soft Satin Silk has a lovely deep blue background with stripes of red, green, yellow and black. Three-quarter kimono sleeve finished with band of Embroidered Organdie, which also makes the collar and vestee. Pearl ball buttons. Brown or blue ground with Roman stripes. Sizes 32 to 46 bust. Give size and color. $2 waist, Prepaid. $1.00

The Barbara No. 24A 1700 — This charming wash dress at an astonishing low figure. An extra fine Galatea. The collar and yoke are trimmed with red and white embroidery. The buttons and piping are red also. Notice the Peplum, the latest New York style. A practical point is the full-length back closing. Tan or blue with same jaunty red trimming. Sizes 6 to 14 years. State color as well as size. $1.50 dress, Prepaid. $1.00

The Tom Sawyer No. 4A 599 — An excellent model of fine twill, all wool, fast color Blue Serge, or a twill Cheviot in Grey or Tan Mixture. The coat is the Norfolk model with yoke and box plaits and full number of pockets. The fact that each suit has two pairs of trousers really doubles the wear. Sizes 6 to 16 years. State size. No. 4A 599, Blue Serge (trousers lined), No. 4A 501, Tan Twill Cheviot (trousers unlined), No. 4A 500, Grey. $5 Suit, Prepaid. $3.98

Special Offer

WOMEN who are particular about the niceties of dress know how helpful is Ivory Soap in keeping fresh and clean the small but easily soiled items such as edgings, ribbons and gloves.

They use it freely, as often as necessary, for they know that even its continual use cannot injure the finest fabrics. And they do not hesitate to give this weekly or semi-weekly renovating their personal attention, for cleaning with Ivory Soap is an interesting, easy, simple pastime—not a tiresome, inconvenient, complicated task.

It is impossible for Ivory Soap to do anything but cleanse gently, safely and pleasantly because it does not contain the harsh materials that make ordinary soaps injurious and troublesome. Ivory is pure, high grade soap—nothing else.

To Wash Chamois Gloves

Put on the gloves and clasp them. Wash with tepid water and Ivory Soap. Rinse in clear, tepid suds and let the gloves dry on the hands. When dry, draw them from the cuffs down, on the wrong side, and turn the fingers afterwards.

To Wash White Silk Gloves

Wet thoroughly in cold water, rub gently with Ivory Soap and pat in the hands, holding gloves under water. Rinse in clear, cold water and dry in a dark room. The work should be done at night.

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

IN EUROPE'S WAR ZONE

THE war in Europe is still to receive its name. It might be called the Secret War. It may be called World War. But even if the ter terrible appellation shall imately be given it, secrecy, the f characteristic of the war's ly stages, will give the conflict distinction among the wars of tory. Only yesterday the old ter of warfare had its supreme mplification. The conquering la and his cohorts waited, it is d, upon the command of the blicity man before advancing the fray. The moving picture nera, the pencil of the re-rter, had to be ready for action fore Mexico's soil could trem-under the rush of contending s. It was the old order of rfare going out in a blaze of ory. The morrow was to see a ew order, a grim, silent, acid-e method of warfare, begin; a hidden warfare, nacing, horrible, terrifying.

ANTWERP, THE EMERGENCY CAPITAL OF BELGIUM, NOW UNDER SIEGE

They say the secretiveness thrown up like a ite-fence about the movements of the hostile rces is intended to prevent the plans of one army coming known to the generals of another. News blished in Paris concerning French forces one y can be spread out like the report of a spy be-ore the German general staff the next, or for that natter, the same, day. Hence, etcetera.

'CROSS COUNTRY MARCH OF BRITISH TROOPS

But is that the whole explanation? Remember hat the armies now confronting each other in Europe were mostly shanghaied into service. Peonage and not patriotism urges on those millions of arm-hands and iron-workers and office men. The all to the colors was really the call to the collars. f it happened, it was not stated in the press, that he armies marched forth with banners flying, bands playing and the populace frantic with enthusiasm. True, the professional soldiers may have engaged in some such old-order tomfoolery; but not so the men whose little children were dragged from their arms by police-soldiers; not so the husbands who returned home from the shop at night to be halted at their doors and marched away ere their wives could clasp them once again. Such men marched out not at all. They were thrust into cattle cars and shipped out. They were congregated at huge recruiting camps, they were quickly uniformed, they were armed and fed and thrown into companies and regiments and corps, and thus they entered the field of glory.

Let me not libel Europe. There were exceptions to this program. But from this time onward the press of America is going to print some things that have gotten out through that spite fence of secrecy, and the conviction may form in the minds of many that that wall was erected as much to keep the outside world in ignorance of the character of this war, as to keep generals in ignorance of each other's plans.

This war was sprung on the world, and only now have we begun to get back our breath. We have sat with mouths hanging open, our eyes glued to the daily record of new accessions to the roll of battling kings, of new formations of huge armies preparatory to the carnage, of new guesses as to the hour of the one great world-shaking clash. But as the fatal hour delayed, we have begun to recover our poise, our eyes have wandered from the mammoth headlines to the smaller type and have lighted surprised on items tucked away here and there that seemed to have escaped the censors. Those items increased in number, grew into columns, into pages; until at last we are reading the real secret of the war, the things that it were best indeed to keep hidden, if governments were to have their way unhindered by the protests of outraged humanity.

In the present war the vast majority of the soldiers were at work in the shops and the fields and the stores of their country when the summons came. They were the flower of the industrial world. Upon them depended the harvest of foodstuffs, the raw material for the mill, the finished product of commerce. Upon them depended the prosperity of their country—and the happiness of its homes. They were at work, serene in the protection of their governments. They were for the most part men who knew something of national affairs, and rejoiced at the progress of which they were a part. They slept in peace at the close of each day's work, for was not all the world at peace? They awoke each morning to face a new day of toil and saving and domestic contentment. Their children were their pride. Or they looked forward to the day when wife and children would be theirs. They basked in the sunshine of the Christian era, and thanked God the day of war was ended.

What could they know, these workers, of the deep things of state? How could they guess, these producers, that their rulers were sore pressed to find markets for the nation's industry, and were obliged to plot and plan, to strike hands with other rulers, to watch for the opportunity to open up new channels of trade? And how could they know that their sturdy strength was the great reserve force that their rulers relied on to uphold the government in its plots and plans, its triple alliances and its triple ententes?

Suddenly, so suddenly there was no chance to ask questions, the call to arms crashed like the herald of doom upon the homes of the land. Five nations, then a sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, became armed camps. The press was silenced, communication with outside nations was subjected to rigid censorship, the truth was suppressed. Foreigners escaped only by dint of superhuman effort, and often at the risk of their lives. With them escaped the facts that will enlighten the outside world as to the true character of this war. And in the breach thus made have come other facts, facts of the battlefields and of the seas. And as these facts multiply, the world will perceive why the publicity man, the news correspondent and the camera were barred out of the field of action as pests.

"We saw French soldiers try to pull a German out of a train window, while he clung to his two little babies which he was trying to get into Switzerland." That is one statement by an eyewitness of scenes on the eve of war, Rev. Frederick Lynch, delegate to the Church Peace Congress that was in convention at Constance, Germany, and then in London. "We saw all the young men and boys being driven like sheep into pens to be sent off to kill men they did not know and against whom they had no quarrel," writes Dr. Lynch in the Christian Work and Evangelist. He tells of men going crazy and being bound with rope, when torn suddenly from their helpless families. Let Americans try to imagine such a situation in their own land. Suppose yourself to be suddenly commandeered by your government into the ranks of the army. An officer and a squad with loaded guns come to enforce the order. You have a half-hour, if lucky, to speak your last farewells. You must drop your affairs right there: your support of the family must cease: no question of sickness of your little child, no anguish of your wife, no speechless misery of your aged mother, will avail for another moment's delay. Your rights as a man are nil. Your years of labor and planning are put to naught. Your wife and children, who until this moment have looked upon you as their protector, must see you driven away like some animal for the market, while they are left to face life alone. You can't imagine it, of course; but try, for that has been the lot of hundreds of thousands in Europe since war was declared by Austria on Servia. Go further and try to include most of your neighbors in the picture. Or if you think you and they are outside the reservist class, think of those of your townspeople who, if European conditions prevailed here, would be amenable to the call to the colors, and try to imagine how you would feel if they were undergoing such an experience right before your eyes. And if you succeed in conjuring up such a vision as shall make you want to shout—then hurrah for War!

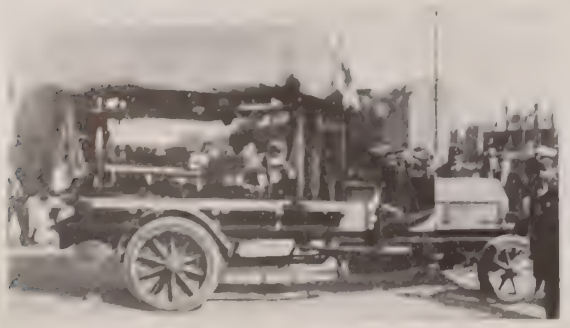
But I apologize for interrupting Dr. Lynch. "We saw Germans yank a Russian and his wife out of a train, and so frighten the wife that her little baby could not nurse for two days. We saw swarms of Germans trying to get out of France with their poor wives and babies, with no one to help and with French soldiers jeering at them and threatening them." Who, in the light of such statements, will undertake to estimate the misery caused by the mere "call to the colors"? And what shall follow upon the prosecution of the war; what homes forever dismantled; what countless women and children forever laughless; what hosts of boys turned back on their way to the school, to take up men's burdens—a land without boys!

What about the field of war? Belgium is that field. From the northeast they came pouring in, those men who were to become beasts, their claws ready. From the southwest they rushed headlong, hundreds of thousands. From the west they came, red-coated and fierce. From her own heart they poured to defend their country, of all the battling hosts the bravest and noblest. Belgium, thou wert little among the nations; but thou art become great! Stainless thy banner lifts against the red skies. To thee and thee alone belongs glory in this war! But pause. Is Belgium guiltless? Did Germany violate a neutrality that was real; a neutrality de facto as well as de jure? It is too bad to spoil a good apostrophe to valor—but fairness (or rather ignorance of all the facts) compels the question.

Yet, ah, the homes of Belgium. A mother, her little ones, a trembling old man, all fleeing along the highway and trundling before them a wheelbarrow bearing what they had snatched of their household things: thus are the humble homes of Belgium reduced. Left behind are the keepsakes, the familiar furniture, the things sacred by daily association. Left behind forever are the emblems of domestic love and peace. And Belgium's inoffensive households are fugitives upon her highways seeking doubtful refuge in her conquered but wealthy cities. Small wonder a high wall of secrecy was erected about the operations of this war of the Age of Altruism!

Yes, we shall read much of this phase of the war now, and the thunder of the guns before Antwerp, and at Waterloo and Namur, and about Strassburg, will be hard put to drive out the cries of the fatherless children and the sobs of hopeless wives. Stories that will come of wondrous charges by whole regiments who fall before the steady rain of steel into which they plunge, will be robbed of their thrill by stories of whole villages reduced to beggary. The vision of a hundred thousand men massed opposite another hundred thousand, every man determined to die where he stands rather than give ground to the enemy, will have to compete for attention with the vision of empty streets and silent workshops, where, but a month ago, two hundred thousand men were massed in honest and friendly industrial competition. And every victory heralded far and nigh will be flanked by the specters of want and woe, the statistics from the capitals of Europe of those who are being fed by charity.



FIELD MOTOR AMBULANCE

The outstanding events of the week closing Monday, August 24, were the surrender of Brussels to the Germans, and the formal declaration of war on Germany by Japan. The advantage appears to be with the German arms at the moment, though the allies, particularly the French forces, have been able to inflict some severe reverses. The surrender of Brussels is described as a strategic move by the Belgians, who could have gained nothing by holding the capital, and would only have sacrificed the lives of many of the inhabitants, but by retiring upon Antwerp may expect to detain from the general line a percentage of the German forces who have already, according to reports, begun a siege of that almost impregnable fortified city. The general engagement to which all these other movements have been preparatory is thought to have begun, extending for some two hundred miles along the French frontier between Belgium and Germany.

FORAGING SQUAD RETURNING TO CAMP

The week opened with the startling news of Japan's action against Germany still the principal subject of public interest. The German colony in China, Kiauchau, is on the coast, directly west of Japan. The possibility of hostilities extending beyond German territory and involving China, and also stirring up the many nearby islands of the Pacific owned by the contending nations, even causing complications that might involve the United States in the Philippines and Samoa, made Japan's action a matter of widespread concern. Premier Okuma assured the nations, and especially the United States, that Japan positively had no territorial aspirations in China, and that Kiauchau would be restored to China if seized by Japan.

It was apparent as the week progressed that Germany had no intention of complying with Japan's demands, namely, that the German war vessels in Eastern waters be withdrawn or disarm, and that Germany evacuate Kiauchau without conditions or compensation. The ultimatum expired on Sunday, August 23, and on that day, according to the despatches appearing in Monday's press, the Emperor of Japan declared war on Germany, and ordered immediate commencement of operations by land and sea. It is said the Japanese displayed enthusiasm upon receipt of the announcement, but by no means to the extent which roused the country when war was declared on Russia. The administration at Washington in accepting Japan's assurances garding her intentions, outlined this governme understanding of the matter in a way tantamon a notice to Japan that any departure from course that country had laid down for herself mi prove unacceptable to the United States, parti larly if it should affect the preservation of the c mercial interests of all the Powers in China.

Thus another nation is actively involved in war. Italy is also apparently about to declare its on the side of France. This is the only deduct possible from the news reports, which may not, h ever, correctly reflect the attitude of that count Nothing more has been heard of the alleged mands upon Italy by Germany and Austria t that country should come to the support of other two members of the Triple Alliance. Holl is reported as in an attitude of defense. A h war fund has been raised, and it is stated that whole country, excepting Amsterdam, will be floo in the event of an invasion by Germany. T country's forces are mobilizing, and extraordin measures are on foot to concentrate and support inhabitants. The entire war strength of Switz land, estimated at three hundred thousand men, already mobilized as a precautionary measure. is stated that the frontiers are strongly guard and all preparations made to preserve neutrality

Despatches had not made the surrender of Br sels appear inevitable. AMERICAN TOURISTS LEAVING WAR ZONE

DEATH OF PIUS X

THE death of Pope Pius X occurred early Thursday morning, August 20. A sinking spell the afternoon before and the ringing of church bells as a signal for special prayers gave rise to the report that the venerable Pontiff had died, and the premature news was flashed to all parts of the world. The announcement of the death in Thursday's papers was therefore generally expected.

The Pope had been ill but a comparatively short time, and only the morning prior to his death the press despatches attributed his confinement to a simple cold. The cause of death is given as an acute bronchial affection that spread to one lung, aggravated by heart weakness, and deep grief over the war in Europe. As the pontiff's condition grew rapidly worse, oxygen was administered and every effort made by the Vatican physicians to defeat the malady.

One of the last acts of Pope Pius X was to exhort the Catholic Church to pray for the early restoration of peace in Europe. A conclave of sixty-six cardinals will elect his successor within ten days, unless unable to assemble because of the war. Four Italian cardinals are mentioned as probable candidates: Serafino Vannutelli, Gotti, Ferrari, and della Chiesa.

Giuseppe Sarto (Pope Pius X) was born June 2, 1835, his family being simple peasants of Italy. He was an apt pupil in the parochial school, and advanced rapidly in scholarship, becoming a parish priest at thirty-two, a canon at forty-one, a bishop at forty-nine, a cardinal at fifty-eight, and Supreme Pontiff August 4, 1903, at the age of sixty-eight. He retained his simplicity of tastes and desires throughout his career, and was ministered to at the last by two of his sisters, whom he had early installed near the Vatican.

The Pontificate of Pius X

WHEN Giuseppe Sarto, Bishop of Mantua and Patriarch of Venice, acceded to the papal authority in the Roman Catholic Church on August 4, 1903, the world witnessed the spectacle of a person of humble antecedents rising to great power and dignity. The public gazetteer has not been able to discover among the ancestry of Pius X any one of greater distinction than his grandfather, who was a soldier in the papal army under Gregory XVI.

Moreover, the reputation which Cardinal Sarto had gained as a faithful priest and a reforming bishop were calculated to arouse the hope that a new era might dawn for the Papacy with his "coronation," on August 9, 1903—an era in which the Pope would confine his official activities to the work of a Christian bishop or pastor content with teaching his spiritual household the blessed truths of the Divine Word, and with guiding its members jointly and severally in the ways of godliness. It was certainly wished that he would not meddle in the affairs of states. The unsophisticated observer might have been led to cherish this hope the more, because the election of Pius X was effected with comparative ease. The cardinals in conclave required only seven ballots to agree on him as their choice, in preference to his only two formidable competitors, Rampolla and Gotti, and the vote which elected him—fifty-five out of a possible sixty—gave him a very comfortable majority. This could be interpreted as an indication that the good qualities which had reached the public ear concerning the Bishop of Mantua had readily commended him to his colleagues as a trustworthy leader, and that he would have their loyal and zealous support in pursuing without change—except that of a larger sphere of influence—his supposed policy of being chiefly, if not solely, a faithful priest.

As a matter of fact, quite another thing was proven by the elevation of Cardinal Sarto to the Pontificate, viz., that as regards the administration of a particular Pope, it makes little difference who is elected to that office. After all, it is the Curia which determines papal action and the general papal policy. The talk about the Pope's independence and autonomy, the picture which represents him to his devoted children as sitting in solemn meditation and prayer and framing his resolves with the aid of the Holy Spirit—all this is pretty myth to be instilled in the minds of the faithful for their edification. The observer of the true inwardness of events in a cardinals' conclave knows that no one has the slightest chance of being elected Pope who does not promise to be a serviceable tool in the hands of the dominant party in the Roman Catholic Church, the Jesuits.

Nomen est omen, runs a Latin saying. There is truth in that: names do occasionally foreshadow events. As I write, there lies before me a document inscribed Syllabus of Pius X. I look twice to make sure that there is no mistake. Yes, it is Pius X, not Pius IX. Does this circumstance convey a hint that the Pope who died at the Vatican August 20, 1914, succeeded Pio Nono in more than the name? It verily does. As one hurriedly recalls leading events in the pontificate of the late Pope, one is inclined to regard the tenth Pius as a reincarnation of the ninth.

There is the encyclical Editæ sæpe, in commemoration of the Borromeo centenary (June 23, 1910), the publication of which was forbidden in Germany, because of the ruthless attack it made upon the Reformation. The Catholic Encyclopedia, with a wise caution, puts it "Reformist Modernism," and claims that the Borromeo Encyclical was only misunderstood by those foolish Germans.

There is the decree Lamentabili sane exitu (July 3, 1907); this is the syllabus of Pius X, a condemnatory catalogue in sixty-five propositions of heresies that touch the Roman Catholic dogmas of the inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, of Jesus and the apostles, of the sacraments, and of the primacy of the Bishop of Rome. One might see a good purpose in this decree—and such a purpose has been pointed out even in Protestant circles—because the decree seems to be directed against the subversive, faith-destroying activity of higher critics. But the scope and aim of the entire document is a reassertion of Roman teaching on these matters, in the spirit of Roman infallibility and Roman intolerance.

So is the encyclical Pascendi Dominici gregis (September 8, 1907) and the Motu proprio Sacrorum Antistitum (September 1, 1910), which places Modernism, as viewed by Rome, under the papal ban, and suggests the creation of "censors" of books containing the pernicious doctrines of the Modernists, and of a "Committee of Vigilance."

There is the Allocution of December 15, 1905, and the encyclical Gravissimi officii of August 10, 1906, which nullifies for Catholics the French law which established the separation of church and state as the future policy of the French Government.

There is the encyclical Ad illum diem (February 2, 1904), which buttresses the immaculate conception of the Virgin and enjoins devotions to her.

Last but not least, there is the infamous decree Ne temere, which has been reviewed before in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, both as regards its rulings and its workings.

It is not easily possible to crowd into a brief pontificate of eleven years more events, all indicative of the same spirit as that which gave the Roman Catholic Church the first syllabus, and the Marian dogma, and the papal infallibility. Pius X had not chosen his official name in vain: he has been, in a pronounced form, the heir and advocate of the policies of Pio Nono.

It is, of course, not to be expected that any Pope would change, in any essential point, the acts and decrees of his predecessors. In fact, this idea is utterly precluded since the publication of the encyclical Pastor Æternus of July 18, 1870, which makes the acts of the Popes in the discharge of their official functions irrevocable, and the policy once adopted by them irreversible. But it is possible that a Pope, by his personal affability, by temporizing accommodations, or by the application of the famous principle of tolerari potest (that is, "the evil may be tolerated," of course, for a season) can mitigate in a measure the rigor of Vatican aggressiveness. Leo X by those measures succeeded quite well in making a great part of the world forget what his predecessor had asserted as the divine right of the Papacy, and as the permanent program of the Curia, though even he did not retract a word, but reiterated fully, only in a minor key, the whole gamut of the destructive principles which Protestants had heard his predecessors utter. (See THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S article on "Jerusalem, Rome, Washington," vol. 35, p. 736.)

Pius X was in no instance a Leo X. The Catholic Encyclopedia lauds him for "paying no attention to the counsels of short-sighted opportunism," and for "firmly refusing his consent to the formation of the associations cultuelles." after the disestablishment of the church in France (Vol. 12, p. 139.)

The "reign" of the former Pius ended disastrously to the Roman Catholic Church. While the decree of infallibility was being read amid a thunderstorm that was passing over the city of Rome, the forces of Garibaldi were beating against its gates. The sovereign pontiff had raised himself to the pinnacle of papal glory in one moment, and was hurled to the lowest depth of papal degradation in the next. For with the incoming of the forces which established the new Italian monarchy and a free Italy the Pope was shorn of his temporal possessions, and has ever since—Pius X was no exception—acted the absurd rôle of the "prisoner of the Vatican," refusing to recognize the Italian Government, and maintaining the decree Non expedit, which forbids Catholics to make use of their political franchise. The moderation of this law by the late Pope, who allowed Catholics to take part in certain elections, only helps to make its existence more odious.

The "reign" of the latter Pius has not improved the fortunes of the Vatican. France has annulled the ancient Concordat, Spain and Portugal have taken steps to nullify the influence of papal prerogatives which had been upheld for centuries. Germany, Belgium, Great Britain, Austria have served notice that the Ne temere decree shall not be put into operation among their subjects. In the view of U. Benigni, who writes on Pius X for the Catholic Encyclopedia, the brightest spot on the earth for Vaticanism is the United States; for he says: "The Catholic hierarchy has greatly increased in numbers during these first years of the pontificate of Pius X, in which twenty-eight new dioceses have been created, mostly in the United States, Brazil, and the Philippine Islands." As another comforting fact he mentions that the government of Turkey had sent an ambassador to Pope Pius X. Outside of these events there has been nothing but tumult and confusion in the pontificate of Pius X, ever since the dismissal of Secretary Rampolla and the installation of Merry del Val. We in the United States still remember the hilarious "Roosevelt episode," which was a typical case of the blundering work of the ruling spirit at the Vatican.

A great deal has been made of "the program" of Pius X, which was declared in his first encyclical, and which is reported to have been on his lips in his dying moments.

On the basis of Eph. 1: 10, it was stated to be the intention of the new Pope "instaurare omnia in Christo," that is, as our English version has it, "to gather together in one all things in Christ." We have been told of the measures of Pius X to promote the pious devotions of Catholics, to increase their attendance at Holy Communion, to insure a speedy First Communion of children, to foster catechetical instruction, to improve the character of sacred music, to enhance the solemnity of eucharistic congresses, to regulate the removal from office of parish priests, to codify the Canon Law, to simplify the work of the various "congregations," i. e., standing committees, through which the Curia does its work, etc. We have no criticism to offer in this place on the creed of Catholics. We may deplore teachings which create erring consciences, but we would jealously guard the rights also of erring consciences, and of every man, to formulate his religious faith even by the uncertain light which he has chosen for his guidance. Pius X is before us in this review, not as the pastor of his Catholic flock, which we had hoped he would be, but solely as the teacher and ruler, by presumption, of all men. Viewing him thus, upon his own premises, we can say that he has been a consistent advocate and champion of the claims of the Papacy, and that he has bent every effort toward the realization of those claims. He has reasserted the magisterium fidei of the Roman Pontiff, that is, the Pope's right

CHRISTIAN MANHOOD

A SERMON BY REV. HENRY M. COUDEN

CHAPLAIN OF CONGRESS

"Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure." Phil. 2: 12, 13

PERHAPS the most critical time in a young man's life is when he comes to choose a vocation, yet it is not difficult if life is viewed from the higher standpoint. For instance, if God is my Father, then he is the Father of all men, and if he is the Father of all men, then all men are my brothers. What I engage in as a life-work has not only to do with my individual interests, but with the interests of all men. I am to serve God in the working out of his plan by serving humanity.

We have studied the past to little purpose if we have not seen that an overruling providence has shaped and guided the destiny of men and of nations. God has poured out his influence, man has been susceptible, the result is their combined efforts. Your vocation then should be in accordance with the divine plan.

We say the minister is called of God to preach the Gospel, and that is true; but I tell you that all men are, or should be, ministers of God, and all men are called to one or other of the legitimate vocations, and the man who listens will not mistake his call, whether it be agricultural, mechanical, mercantile, or professional.

The Crucial Moment

There are but two things worthy of a man, viz., service and character; and in selecting a vocation, if success is assured, these things must be kept in view. How shall I best serve mankind and build for myself a character worthy as a child of the living God? Theodore F. Seward says: "Self-giving is the law of Christian living, but self-sacrifice for its own sake is not good, and is no more pleasing to God than to human nature, but self-denial for the sake of others is Christlike, Godlike." The farmer, the mechanic, the merchant, the doctor, the lawyer, the artist, the preacher, who plies his vocation for what he can get out of it, rather than for what he can put into it, will find himself in the long run a poor lonely creature, starving in the midst of plenty, isolated in the midst of men, friendless surrounded by his own kind, and should he succeed, even from a worldly standpoint, he will surely find, as some one has said, that "getting on in this world sometimes means getting behind in the next world."

The glamour of millions may hide from our eyes a multitude of sins, but not from the all-seeing eye. The glamour of pen or brush or chisel may hide from our eyes a multitude of sins, but not from the all-seeing eye. God measures men by the motives which prompt action, and the test in the last analysis is the strength of one's character.

Go with me, if you please, to the garden of Gethsemane: the feet of the disciples had been washed; the Last Supper had been eaten; the moonbeams fell soft through the gnarled olive-trees; the flowers exhaled their sweet perfume; the birds were all asleep—the disciples too, even those chosen to watch—but the Master was in the throes of agony; the stripes ordered by Pontius Pilate, even the tortures of the cross, were not to be compared with the agony of the moment. "O God, my Father, let this cup pass from me!" But that was not to be. It must be drained to the bitter dregs. He might have passed out of the garden alone, and sought refuge in the wilderness, and forever after lived the life of a recluse. Had he not healed the sick, unstopped deaf ears, opened blind eyes, raised the dead, and taught the most sublime principles that ever fell from human lips? All that might have lived for a time, and it may be would have passed into history. Nevertheless his life would have been a failure without that last heroic act, which makes his life divine and brings millions to his feet in adoration. And so it must be with us all. You will have your Gethsemanes, and they will be the test of your character. It matters not what your calling may be; it matters not whether men call it high or low, provided it be a call, and your heart all the while be beating in unison with the great heart of God. It matters not when death comes to this body. It matters not how death comes to this body, if the soul be marching on. Take care how you choose; take care what you choose. If your calling be to the uplift of humanity, pull out the throttle and go at full speed. You will be safe. But if it is to your own aggrandizement, no matter what or who you hurt, better reverse the engine, or it will carry you sooner or later to disaster.

New Fields of Service

The goal for all should be Christian manhood. There is a vast gulf between the first man that lived and wrought upon the earth, and the highest type of Christian manhood of our day, but the chasm widens between the highest type of Christian manhood in our day and the Jesus of Nazareth. If, therefore, you want an example, you must look beyond the Christian men and women about you to the Master. Let this be your motto: "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect, but I follow after, if that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus."

Here is the earnest for which every true man longs. What did Jesus Christ leave as a legacy to the world? The great principles he enunciated, the works of his hands, and a sublime example. Every man, therefore, should strive to leave something to the world, something that shall add to the sum of human happiness, an idea, a thought, a discovery, an invention, an act, a deed sublime. Who can estimate the value of the wedge, the screw, the lever? Who can estimate the value of the principle suggested by the falling of the apple, transmitted by thought and effort to the world? Who can estimate the value of the application of steam and electricity to the ingenious contrivances of men? Who can estimate the value of printing and its application to the higher needs of mankind? The man who discovers a law for this disease or that, is a benefactor. The man who discovers a law for the larger application of justice, is a benefactor. The fields are not all explored. There is still room for original thought and effort. You may enrich the world by original thought and research, heal the sick, unstop deaf ears, open blind eyes, and raise the dead, just as surely as the Master did. You cannot, however, do this alone. You must work with God. In other words, you must work in accordance with his laws, for of him and through him are all things.

High Aims

"To believe," some one has said, "that God's hand is guiding us, although we cannot see it, or be distinctly conscious of it, is the foundation of true spiritual development. To believe that everything depends upon God and yet act as if everything depended upon our own efforts, is the true and only way to establish what may be called a divine individuality in our souls."

"Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God," is a sublime utterance. To comprehend is one thing, but to make it real is quite another, and can be done only by a surrender of one's self to the exigencies of the moment, to the burning needs of the hour. "He that findeth his life shall lose it, and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it."

The world needs men, strong, pure, brave, noble, self-sacrificing men, men who regard home, religion, country, as theirs to defend and keep sacred. Home, however, is not a pile of bricks and mortar. Home is the center of all the purest and sweetest affections of the heart. Religion is not a church, a creed, a ritual. It is God, duty, destiny. Country is not the Constitution, the Flag, except as these represent the sacred rights of men. The sanctity of the home depends upon the sanctity of our religion, and these in turn depend upon the sanctity of our government. For these we ought to live, for these we should be willing to die.

Build for yourself a home, and make it the dearest spot on earth; keep your religion sacred, and never forget that you are a child of God, and that to him you owe love and obedience. See to it that you are indeed a citizen of your country, and that means much. It means you are to be a patriot because you love your home and regard your religion as sacred, for it is your government which secures these from desecration. Eternal vigilance is not only the price of liberty, but it is the price of everything that is worth having.

Ambassadors of God

It is a splendid thing, a glorious thing, to die for one's country on the field of battle, amid the roar of shot and shell; but it is a more glorious thing to live for one's country, three hundred and sixty-five days in the year; to live a full-fledged Christian citizen, discharging faithfully and fearlessly every duty devolving upon him. Never lose sight of the dignity God has conferred upon you. The Psalmist sings well and soars high in the realms of eternal truth. "What is man that thou art mindful of him, and the son of man that thou visitest him? For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honor. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet."

The stars yonder go whirling and glittering in space to their appointed courses, because they can not help it. The flower springs by the way, buds, blossoms, and exhales its fragrance, because it can not help it. The bird builds its nest and rears its young, because it cannot help it. But man, made in the image of God, a free moral agent, gifted of heaven with the power of choice, is lifted infinitely above all things else, and invested with a dignity sublime. In our text Paul strikes at the root of things. "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling. For it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure." God is, or should be, the silent partner in every calling of life.

Young men, young women, thank God that you were born and reared under the benign influence of the Christian religion, the best of all religions, that you are living in the opening years of the twentieth century, the best of all centuries; that you are citizens of the United States of America, the best of all governments, and go forth with brave and manly hearts to your appointed destiny, and never lose sight of the fact that under God each man is the architect of his own fortune; "that peace is stronger than war;" that harmony is sweeter than discord; that mercy is more potent than hate or revenge; that good is more enduring than evil; that pessimism invites defeat, while optimism insures victory; that Love, the crown of all humanity, will outlast the stars and live on forever in immortal youth.

GLORIA REDIVIVA

By Arthur D. F. Randolph

GOD'S mercy on the tumults of this day.
May He who holds secure within his hands
The nations of the world stretch forth and stay
This bloody warfare of our Fatherlands.

Quench thou the flame that feeds upon the lust
Which love of power and brutal conquest brings
Through war and bloodshed—humble in the dust
The hearts of rulers, emperors and kings,

That they may learn in this new day and hour
No strength of arms and navies ever can Prove love of country—but the greatest power
Of nations is the brotherhood of man.

So usher in the dawn, thou King of kings,
Of that great day when wars shall cease and when
The battle cry of every nation rings
With song of peace on earth, good will toward men.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, September 6. Mark 6: 38; Matthew 14: 18, and Luke 9: 14. "How many loaves have ye? go and see. Bring them hither to me. Make them sit down by fifties in a company." The banquet in the wilderness! In the very preparation of it our Lord teaches the disciples a most valuable lesson. He could have summoned thousands of ravens to bring the necessary victuals for the occasion. His angels would have gladly supplied the wants of his guests. He could have bid the stones become bread and the rock yield water. But no! He chooses to make the provisions at hand serve the present need. What his disciples had considered altogether insufficient he makes to be more than sufficient. In quick succession follow his orders for the start of the meal. The Lord asks a blessing. The disciples arrange the guests in groups, and the serving commences. The Lord has opened his hand to satisfy the desires of his large company. Imagine the feelings of the disciples while this feast was going on and there seemed to be no end of supplies. We can almost hear them whispering to one another, as they pass from group to group: "What do you think of this? O fools and slow of heart that we were, not to comprehend the resources of the Almighty! O Lord, forgive us our unbelief, and let us never despise the day of small things."

MONDAY, September 7. John 6: 12. "Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost." Our Lord is fairly covering the disciples with confusion for their lack of faith. The repast is finished. Everybody has declared himself satisfied. A full meal has been served every guest out of the little supply. The Lord is still dividing portions out of the original five loaves and two fishes. So rapidly the rations have been coming out of his hand that his bounty has run far ahead of the guests' appetite. When the disciples come back from their rounds for the last time to announce "Nobody wants any more!" there is still a great pile of food. And now Jesus teaches the disciples another lesson. Waste and prodigality often follow in the wake of God's abundant blessings. Men understand the meaning neither of poverty nor wealth. The Lord instructs his disciples to gather the remaining food in their wallets. His superfluities in blessing are to be reminders of the original benefaction, and are therefore to be sacredly regarded and kept for future use. God's lavishness is not waste, except men make it such. The abundance of one day, or week, or year, must make us not spendthrifts, but economical and provident stewards of the goods he has bestowed on us. God sometimes supplies our need in advance, and our want is often guilty want, for which we have no excuse to offer.

TUESDAY, September 8. Matthew 14: 27. "Be of good cheer; it is I; be not afraid." After the feeding of the multitudes, our Lord dismisses both them and the disciples. The latter he urges to make a hurried trip across the lake to Capernaum, while he retires to the mountain to spend the night in prayer. While the little boat is making its way across the waters, the disciples are rehearsing the events of the day. Their thoughts are with their absent Master, whom they surely expect to meet on the other side. But the voyage becomes very unpleasant when a contrary wind springs up, which makes their passage toilsome. As they are battling with the waves, their courage sinks. "If only the Master were with us!" they say. From his place in the mountain the eye of the Master has followed the little barge. He has watched the danger of the disciples, and when it has reached its height, a strange figure looms up alongside of the boat in the gray of the early dawn. They are terrified at beholding what they regard as an apparition. The Lord is come for their succor, and his reassuring voice "It is I" dispels their fear. This is a beautiful illustration of the truth that the Lord is near to his children in trouble. From his throne he follows them in all their wandering and toil. They may think themselves forsaken in their deepest distress; but he is with them, though they may fail to recognize him. They may even mistake his help for a new danger, until he fully reveals himself to them as their great Friend by his reassuring word.

WEDNESDAY, September 9. Matthew 14: 29-31. "Come. O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" It was a sublime faith that prompted impulsive Peter to cry: "Lord, if it be thou, bid me come to thee on the water." Peter's conditional request was not meant to express doubt in the personality of the Lord who had just revealed himself to the disciples. Otherwise the Lord would have rebuked him. Peter spoke from the fulness of his joy at knowing the Lord near. He regarded all danger as past, now that the Master was at their side. The mad waves and the furious storm had no terrors for him any longer. He was sure that he could walk on the water, if the Lord would let him. It was a beautiful sight, this undoubting confidence in the single word of Christ: "Come." But all is changed in a twinkling, as soon as Peter ceases to think of the mighty power that was supporting him in the joyous exercise of his great faith. When he looks into the onrush of the billows and hears the fierce howling of the wind—when he beholds only this terrifying spectacle and thinks of nothing else than his danger—he gasps, and is drowning. He has let go of the unseen hand that is there to bear him up. With a despairing cry he sinks, and the Lord has to catch him out of the jaws of death and reprove him for the shameful failure of his confidence. Many have started out like Peter to do really great things in the kingdom of the Lord, but have quit in the effort. Let him that standeth take heed lest he fall.

THURSDAY, September 10. John 6: 26, 27. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Ye seek me, not because ye saw the miracles, but because ye did eat of the loaves, and were filled. Labor not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life, which the Son of man shall give unto you: for him hath God the Father sealed." With a mysterious rapidity, the boat of the disciples had completed its voyage and made its landing at Capernaum, after Jesus had entered it. The people whom our Lord had fed on the other side hurry to Capernaum, when they find Jesus and the disciples gone. "How did they get across the lake? Surely, another miracle has happened!" With such thoughts they come into the Lord's presence. Now, to these miracle-mongers Jesus addresses the famous discourse on the Bread of Life. He shows them that they had missed the true import of his miracles, if they admired only the inexhaustible resources of his strength. They made out of Jesus a Saviour who was good for the flesh. They were bread-and-butter disciples. Jesus loathes the admiration of this thoroughly worldly and selfish crowd, and tells them that all their zest and hurry is for a very poor purpose, as long as they do not recognize in him the message whom the Father in heaven has accredited by mighty works as the Provider of that meat which is to feed the souls of men, of that imperishable food which fits the partaker for the life eternal. In a former discourse he spoke of himself as the "water of life," and called himself the Son of God. The claims which he set up on that occasion he now reiterates, and speaks of himself as the Son of man. Christ according to both natures, as God and man, is the Lord who has redeemed us.

FRIDAY, September 11. John 6: 29. "This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent." "Labor," the Lord had said to the crowds that had been attracted to him by the loaves and fishes. That word struck a congenial chord in their hearts. Oh, yes, we must work, work, work, to get to heaven. This word "labor" represented the central dogma in their creed. Had they not worked? Why, some of them imagined they had done works in excess of what was demanded of them. Accordingly, they are curious to know what work Jesus can mean that they must do to please God. That must certainly be a grander work than any they had so far attempted in obedience to the ceremonial laws and traditions. Christ tells them that God wants them to do only one thing: believe in him whom God has sent. More than this God does not ask of them. If they do this, all other works will follow; if they fail to believe in Christ, all their works will not help but will harm them. But is faith a work? Does not Paul place faith in direct opposition to works? Faith is not a work like fasting, prayer, or any observance of the law. Faith is a divine work in us, which the Holy Spirit accomplishes by the Gospel. Man does not produce this work, and yet it is man that believes. Where faith is, there is life and activity: the mind grasps, the will appropriates, the affections cherish the blessed grace of God in Christ Jesus. Faith is never dead but active, and in this sense it is a work. Though the believer cannot originate this work either wholly or in part, yet he performs it by the Holy Spirit. Nobody believes for him. And this faith saves, not because of what it is in itself, not because it is such an excellent achievement of the human mind, but because of what it holds: Jesus Christ, the end of the law for righteousness.

SATURDAY, September 12. John 6: 32, 33. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Moses gave you not that bread from heaven; but my Father giveth you the true bread from heaven. For the bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world." The men who a minute ago had been ardent admirers of the Lord are now in danger of becoming his scurrilous critics. He had depreciated the miracle of the loaves and fishes, because they had misapplied it. They now ask him to give them a better evidence that he is the Messiah than he had given them by feeding the multitude in the desert. They insinuate that what Christ had done was not such a great thing after all: Moses had done a greater thing when he procured manna for the Israelites for forty years. Christ had just asked these people to do the one great work of God, viz., believe in him. Now, they ask him to do the one great work that would make them believe. The Lord in his reply reiterates his charge that their conception of God's doings for man is gross and carnal. Moses was not the giver of the manna, but Moses' God. Nor had the manna been the true food which heaven supplies for the famished souls of men, but the great Prophet of the future of whom Moses had spoken to his people, Jesus, is the true manna. He, too, is come down from heaven; he is of divine origin; he, too, is a direct gift from God, which God bestows not on one small nation, but on the entire world of sinners; he, too, preserves the life of the people. Moses' miracle pales into insignificance when held against the unspeakable gift of God, his dear Son, who is the bread which the weary spirit of sin-burdened mortals craves. This bread drops continuously upon this earth by the preaching of the Gospel, and feeds the pilgrims of faith on their journey through to the heavenly Canaan.

(From an Old Woodcut)

"THE ROCKET'S RED GLARE, BOMBS BURSTING IN AIR"
(From Old-time Drawing by F. O. C. Darley)

WHERE KEY LIVED
Washington, D. C.

ON a narrow strip of land extending into the Patapsco River from the city of Baltimore is located what remains of old Fort McHenry. One September day in the year 1814, from the mouths of well-aimed British guns came a deadly fire of shot and shell and bombs, over four hundred of which seriously embarrassed the handful of loyal Americans stationed there under the command of Lieutenant Colonel George Armistead. Because of the distance of the enemy, he was unable to return the fire, and for twenty-five hours the fierce cannonade continued. But when the morning of the 14th of September dawned the inhabitants of the city beheld the old flag still floating in the gentle Southern breeze.

Confined on the Minden as a prisoner of war was an American patriot, anxiously awaiting the cessation of the bombardment and fearful lest his countrymen might not be able to withstand the awful assault. His name was Francis Scott Key. His friend, Dr. William Banes—whose house had been used by the British officers as their headquarters—had taken occasion to seize some of the worthy subjects of the crown when, in abandoning his home, they attempted to carry off booty. For this patriotic act Dr. Banes was himself taken prisoner and carried off to the English fleet in the harbor.

Key's loyalty to Dr. Banes resulted in his own arrest. All night he paced the deck of the Minden, unable to see whether the flag on the fort had been hauled down, but knowing that as long as the firing continued the banner was still at the top of the staff. At length the cannonading ceased. The dawn came. With eager eyes Key and his friends peered through the early morning haze and their hearts pulsated with inexpressible joy as they saw that "the flag was still there." Stirred by devotion to his country and overflowing with gratitude for the favorable outcome, Key jotted down a few lines on a scrap of paper, completed the verses on his way to the shore, and soon thereafter gave to the world the immortal song, "The Star-Spangled Banner," which has been adopted as the national anthem.

The city of Baltimore is planning on September 6 to 15 to celebrate the one-hundredth anniversary of that stirring event in our nation's history. Officially it is called the "National Star-Spangled Banner Centennial." Sunday, September 6, will be "Patriots' Day," with patriotism as the theme in the churches. Sacred concerts will be given in the various parks, and it is expected that Vice-President Marshall and Speaker Champ Clark will make addresses. September 12 will be "Star-Spangled Banner Day," when a duplicate of the banner that floated on that memorable day one hundred years ago will be escorted through the city to Fort M Henry, followed by an address by the President the United States. In the evening a special displ of fireworks, with a reproduction of the bombar ment of the fort, will be arranged. On Sunda September 13, "Peace" will be the theme; and Tuesday all who desire may make a pilgrimage the birthplace of Francis Scott Key on the origir Key Manor, "Terra Rubra," near Pen-Mar, Mar land, and also to the burial place of this illustrio man in Mount Olivet Cemetery, where, in 1896, beautiful monument was erected by the Key M morial Association of Frederick, Md.

At the Smithsonian Institute in Washington t original Star-Spangled Banner has been reverent treated by the skilled hands of Mrs. Fowler, Boston, who had charge of the restoration of t 175 trophy flags of the war of 1812 now in t Naval Academy at Annapolis and for which Co gress appropriated $30,000.

The Fort McHenry flag measures 29 by feet, and has fifteen stripes, each two feet wi It is said to be the large flag ever unfurled in actic

The Fort McHenry mi tary reservation in the ci of Baltimore consists about 34 acres and was a quired by the government 1794 and 1836. For ma years the officers' quarte the store-houses, and t old fort itself have be abandoned by the gover ment and allowed to f into decay. By act of Co gress Baltimore has be authorized to take posse sion of the reservation f the purpose of repairin improving and beautifyi it as a public park, to open to all the people.

DENOMINATIONAL NOTES OF SPECIAL INTEREST

LAST YEAR THE Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America sent out 118 new missionaries, the largest number ever engaged in the history of the mission, making a total of 1,155. The present war trouble in Europe, however, have prevented the sending of money abroad and the sailing of missionaries, and Rev. A. Woodruff Halsey, one of the secretaries of the board, states that work abroad is alarmingly hampered. There are at present over 150 missionaries at home

THE ANNUAL MEETING of the American Board of Foreign Missions will take place in Detroit, Mich., October 13 to 16. Dr. Joseph K. Greene, fifty years in Turkey, now in America and delivering lectures all over the country, will be one of the speakers and will describe conditions since the Balkan War. There will be a memorial service for the late Dr. Samuel B. Capen. The European war has spoiled the plans of the board to build a new hospital in Albania.

THE PENTECOSTAL CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE closed a wonderful camp meeting at Matteawan, N. Y., July 20, held in tents and bungalows. The meeting lasted ten days, and embraced all the Pentecostal churches in the State of New York. Crowds arrived on foot, in automobiles and by trains; farmers in wagons arrived as early as six o'clock in the morning. Pastors of all the different churches of the New York districts were present.

MR. R. N. BROOKS, Washington, D. C., writes: "In a recent issue you quoted from an article in the New York Times on the shortage of contributions for foreign missions during the past year, which stated that "the Southern Presbyterian Church, handling about $80,000 a year, came out nearly even." Where can the writer have obtained his figures? The Southern Presbyterian Church in the last fiscal year handled $5,086,798. Of this amount $561,179 was for foreign missions. Contributions for this cause in the preceding year were $631,069. The apparent falling off was due to the fact that an additional $120,000 had to be raised to pay off the debts of the Mission Board. The Southern Presbyterian Church, with a membership of 310,000, has set a million-dollar mark for foreign missions, and I believe it holds the banner for largest per capita contributions to this cause."

THE REPORT OF THE General Missionary Conference of 1877 gave 4,348 communicants in the Presbyterian churches of China, including Formosa, and the report of 1890 gave 12,347. The statistics of the last council, 1909, gave 44,600, not including Formosa (with 3,345), and the present data justify an estimate of more than 63,000, of which 60,000 are joined together in nineteen presbyteries and six union synods, and all are united in one Federal Council, which will soon become a fully organized assembly as a natural development of the gradual unifying movement of the past years. The council disavows any desire to accentuate Presbyterianism in this union. Local groups are free to unite with other branches of the Church of Christ, where local conditions make such union advisable, and the union of the Presbyterian bodies is regarded as paving the way for a larger union.

Mexico's Clean-Up Day

THURSDAY, August 20, General Carranza made a triumphal entry into Mexico City, riding at the head of troops, and afterward reviewing the parade from the National Palace, where he was welcomed by a salute of twenty-one guns and the ringing of the cathedral bells, and the Constitutionalists—no longer rebels—are now ensconced in Mexico's capital through the courtesy of the retiring government. The inhabitants are being disarmed, Huerta's acts are being annulled, fêtes are being arranged to celebrate the change in government, everybody is happy, excepting Villa. Villa sulks in the north, and the alleged estrangement between the two leaders is the sole remaining cloud over the Mexican landscape. Presently Mexico will be reinstated in the Pan-American family, Vera Cruz will be evacuated, interrupted industry will be in full swing, foreign creditors will call on the new minister of finance, and in all other ways chastened Mexico will resume her wonted course. May her peace and prosperity have no end!

The posse rounded up the band and after an all-night wait in the woods opened fire from behind rocks and trees and fallen logs, finally dislodging the Italians with nitroglycerine and shooting them down as they ran for the open. Besides the three employees, four of the posse and the five bandits were slain.

Biggest Audience in the World

FEW people have any adequate notion of the actual extent of the moving-picture business in America. Chairman F. C. Howe, of the National Board of Censorship of Motion Pictures, gives these figures: 16,000 to 20,000 theaters daily entertain from 7,000,000 to 12,000,000 persons, an aggregate of 2,000,000,000 to 3,000,000,000 yearly. The capital invested is estimated at $150,000,000, and the public spends annually something like $300,000,000. This gigantic business has all been developed in less than ten years, and is still growing with amazing rapidity. Churches and schools are becoming well represented in it, and the moral character of the films is steadily rising to a higher standard.

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

PRESIDENT OTTO KOENIG | MANAGING EDITOR GEO. H SANDISON | SECRETARY THEODORE WATERS

God's Peace

PEACE just now seems the sweetest word in human speech. Among the nations it has become only a memory—and a hope. For the present it is lost.

While grieving over this failure of peace in the world, let us test our hearts again. Have they lost their peace, too, as Europe has lost hers? Does peace seem for us, as for Europe, a memory, or a hope, not a possession? Have our souls wandered away from the place of peace?

It may not be that we have strayed into sin; it may not be that we have strayed into false doctrine; it may not be that we have tampered with our former consecration. But this surely has happened: we have put as first in our interests, our thoughts, our purpose, something other than God. The moment we do that, even though the thing itself may be a worthy, right, or necessary, or beautiful thing, that moment we lose God's peace.

How to get back? Of all simple things in the world, that is the simplest. We can not find our own way back. We cannot, alone, even discover the things that led us away. There is only one thing to do. Stand still, and begin to talk with God. No matter how important the work is that you are doing, stop it. No matter how deep are the convictions you hold, for the moment surrender them. Tell God you are not sure of anything now, except that you need him. Tell him you are anxious now not to get certain things that you want, but find out what he wants; not to prosper in the things that you have undertaken, but to make sure that the things you have undertaken are the things he wishes done. Peace will come quickly then. Your soul will be touching God, beginning to rest upon his calmness, beginning to find itself filled with that ultimate blessing, "the peace of God." He will show us the sins and the errors that lured us from his side; he will whisper to us new secrets of abiding in him.

It is sad to think how easily the terrible conflict now rending Europe might have been avoided if the rulers of those lands had done this thing a few months ago. Peace would certainly have continued to reign in Europe if they had allowed it thus to reign in their own souls. Shall not we humble folk force our souls back into intimate and instant communion with God, lest we not only lose his peace from our own souls but destroy the peace he would give to others?

We shall face life with new courage, with new zeal, with a power hitherto undreamed of, when we begin our task again after this sweet re-bestowal of God's peace. We shall go forth, strong and steady in his strength and with his calmness, to help him continue his grievously interrupted task of bringing to every heart and to every nation throughout the world the matchless gift of his peace, "which passeth all understanding."

The War in Prophecy

STUDENTS of prophecy are pondering the present war, undecided whether or not it is to be identified with the great war of the nations—the Armageddon of Scripture. Forgetful of the admonition that the "times of fulfilment" are purposely hidden from human knowledge and are "past finding out," some of them endeavor to prove, by calculations based on the prophecies in Daniel, Zechariah and Revelation, that the year 1914-1915 is indicated as the period of great events which are to usher in vast changes throughout the world.

That portion of Revelation which deals with the "end of the age" and the dawning of a new and grander dispensation for the human race seems to possess an irresistible attraction for speculative minds. Many writers have made it the work of their lifetime, and books without number have been produced on the subject. Some of the calculations made by these students of prophecy, and especially those of Cuming, Hart, Wilde, Baxter, Wire and a few others, are of peculiar interest at the present time, when the whole world is in a ferment, with vast changes impending. The calculations of these writers on prophecy would be of tremendous import if they were based on an intimate knowledge of the Divine plan. But God's way are not as the ways of man. All attempts to penetrate the secrets of Omniscience have hitherto resulted in failure; they have demonstrated the inability of the human mind, however gifted, to grasp the problems of prophecy and to chart and date their fulfilment.

Some eighteen years ago, William A. Redding, a student of prophecy wrote a book entitled Our Near Future, which he dedicated as "A Message to the Governments and Peoples of Earth." This was in 1896. The author, in his little volume, gave his own interpretation of prophetic times, and computed that the "times of the Gentiles would end in 1896 and finally disappear eighteen years thereafter," or in 1914. Then would follow a year filled with momentous events. The overthrow of the existing order of things would then be completed and a new and beneficent order would begin.

That this greatest of all wars must have a deep significance to students of God's work must be conceded. Preceded by "famines and earthquakes in various places," it has burst suddenly upon the nations, spreading like a mighty conflagration until it has now in its grasp, involved in actual warfare, nine nations: Austria, Belgium, France, Great Britain, Germany, Japan, Montenegro, Russia, Servia; while on the verge of war there are nine other nations: viz., Italy, Greece, Turkey, Bulgaria, Albania, Holland, Portugal, Norway and Sweden. At any moment the prophetic numbers, to which so much significance has been attached, may be reached. Meanwhile, the united prayers of the whole Christian world are rising that God will shorten the period of this great affliction and that he will eventually bring out of the world-wide chaos a better humanity and a deeper and closer dependence upon his guidance in the affairs of all nations on earth.

Streets Closed! Why?

IT WAS announced in New York the other day that Police Commissioner Woods had closed a number of busy street blocks in Manhattan and Brooklyn to all vehicular traffic between the hours of 2 and 6 P.M. daily. If a lot of "practical" people were asked to guess why this had been done they would have a hard time of it. Business would have no answer to the riddle. And people have thought of New York as dominated by business.

Listen to the answer! That the children might have a place to play.

This could scarcely be more refreshing, more wholesome news. What does it mean? It means that people are beginning to realize that life is greater than gain; that childhood must be nurtured, not oppressed and exploited; that play is holy; that joy is worth safeguarding.

Could there be a more beautiful picture? New York streets, with their haste and crowds and tumults; horses and machines and cars driven madly in pursuit of trade and gain; suddenly the noise on many streets is hushed; traffic is compelled to go another way; and out upon these safe and silent streets troop the little children of the city's poor; instead of hoof and wheel, the patter of little feet and the shout of childish voices; in these streets no more heart-breaking tragedies of little lives crushed out while thoughts were busy with play; no more danger, no more anxiety, no more troubled fears; out from the stifling rooms, or from the crowded sidewalks they run into the streets that have suddenly become theirs; a great city smiles; one can fancy that God is smiling, too—while the children play.

Partisanship and the War

IT IS sound and timely counsel that President Wilson gives in his proclamation to the American people, defining the attitude we ought to observe as a nation and as individuals, on the European War. "The true spirit of neutrality," he writes, "is the spirit of impartiality and fairness to all concerned." He urges upon the press and upon those whose public utterances are a means of forming opinion, the exercise of a normal, sensible and unbiased attitude in relation to the great struggle now going on. "The effect of the war upon the United States," he reminds us, "will depend upon what American citizens say or do. Every man who really loves America will act and speak in the true spirit of neutrality, which is the spirit of impartiality and fairness and friendliness to all concerned. The spirit of the nation in this critical matter will be determined largely by what individuals and society and those gathered in public meetings do and say, upon what newspapers and magazines contain, upon what our ministers utter in their pulpits and men proclaim as their opinion on the streets."

There probably never was a war without its partisans. At such a time, racial prejudices are only too apt to come to the surface, and to find expression in praise or detraction, in boastful confidence or disparagement. But there are many considerations that make it imperative that we should not stoop to partisanship, but keep our heads, while this tremendous world-conflict is in progress. It cannot be denied that there has been a tendency among our people to form "camps of hostile opinion," a misfortune for which the press is largely responsible. Some of our foremost journals have set a bad example in this respect. Imperfectly informed concerning the great questions at issue, and accepting as conclusive wholly one-sided and biased statements of the war's progress as brought by the cables, these journals spread misinformation, creating public opinion which could not be other than prejudiced. This is what the President had in mind when he wrote that "such divisions among us would be fatefu to our peace of mind, and might seriously stan in the way of the proper performance of our dut as the one great nation at peace, the one peopl holding themselves ready to play a part of impar tial mediation and to speak the counsels of peac and accommodation, not as a partisan but as friend."

It is not only that we are not called upon to si in hostile judgment upon the governments an rulers involved in the war, but because such a attitude is altogether unworthy of Americans wh value beyond all other considerations the qualitie of justice and fair play. We should be the las people in the world to indulge in recrimination even against an enemy under such conditions; hov much more should we be guarded against destroy ing the confidence and respect of those who hav been and are our friends? With all of the nation involved we have relations of peace and friendship and we have enjoyed their esteem. In man places, owing to the exigencies of war, they hav entrusted their diplomatic affairs to our care an we are honorably bound to perform this friendl service. And should the opportunity come, as w hope it may come soon, to heal the wounds of war we, as the one great neutral friendly nation, ma have a still larger and more important duty t meet. This consideration alone should inspir every American to a due appreciation of the im portance of our national attitude being such a will not impair our influence among the nation of the globe.

Eye Hospital in India

THE benign surgeon's knife is doing its work throughout the wide world. Dr. H. T. Holland, in his report in the Indian Medical Gazette, makes this reference to operations carried on in an eye hospital at Shikarpur, North Sindh: "Between January 1 and February 15 1,330 operations were performed in that hospital—1,024 of them for cataract. The largest number of out-patients in any one day was 706; the largest number of operations 129. Quite a number of the cases left the hospital on the seventh or eighth day, and a few even on the sixth, with no sign of redness, lachrymation, or photophobia. The cases are dressed only once, on the fifth day, a great saving in time when 200 or 300 eye cases have to be attended to at one time." It is not very many years since persons afflicted with cataract were left without remedy to blindness till the day of their death, and now, under the progress of Christ's civilization, little short of scientific miracles are wrought, reminding us of the Great Physician who gave sight to the blind as he gave spiritual vision to those in darkness. This is the testimony to Christ's curative power:

One thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see. (John 9: 25.)

Sudden Death

THREE thousand persons were packed around the bandstand in Fort Greene Park, Brooklyn, recently, when Benjamin Wechsler was conducting the afternoon concert. An especially attractive number had been rendered and there was loud applause. Wechsler moved to the edge of the stand, bowing to the applause. He sat down, and in an instant several of the musicians were at his side. He had collapsed from apoplexy, and had fallen from his seat to the floor of the bandstand. When the doctor from the Cumberland Street Hospital arrived, the man was dead. It is no new thing for Death to push himself into scenes where his presence seems especially unbecoming. He selected the time when there was the most entrancing earthly melody amid general popular favor to strike down the leader, hush the sound of the viols and bring sorrow to the players and the audience. In large cities, death is so constant and in so many instances so sudden that the living barely halt from their transactions, and often do not take to heart deeply enough the great lesson which ought to be considered and which is expressed in this saying:

Be ye also ready: for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh. (Matt. 24: 44.)

English Duchess Becomes Nurse

AN ENGLISH peeress, the Duchess of Sutherland, was placed in charge of the French Red Cross work in Brussels. She was in Paris when war broke out, and a call was given for help in Red Cross work. She hurried to Brussels, organized her staff, and, dressed most simply in a white gown and close-fitting cap, superintended the work of transforming one of the salons of the cercle artistique into a hospital for the wounded soldiers. This beautiful act calls to mind the condescension in the mission of Him who stooped from heaven to earth to bind the wounds, to heal the sick, and to save from pain and death, of whom it is said:

Though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich. (II Cor. 8: 9.)

Eclipse of the Sun

THERE was an eclipse of the sun on August 21. In the west of Europe, including the British Isles, the eclipse was only partially visible, but in Russia the eclipse was total. At New York the eclipse was partial, and began at sunrise, half past five o'clock, and lasted almost thirty minutes. The total eclipse was seen about midday from a track about one hundred miles broad, which crossed eastern Europe from the northwest coast of Norway to the Crimea and came to an end in Persia. Dozens of European and other astronomers invaded Russia with their instruments. Professor David P. Todd of Amherst College and others arranged to ascend in aeroplanes in order to solve the mystery of the corona of the sun by means of a camera. In parts of the war zone the sun for a while refused to shine upon the horrible scenes of blood, reminding us of the time when the sun turned his face away from the crime of the ages, the cricifixion of our Lord:

And it was about the sixth hour, and there was a darkness over all the earth until the ninth hour. (Luke 23: 44.)

PANAMA CANAL OFFICIALLY OPENED: DREDGES REMOVING SLIDE DURING CONSTRUCTION

THE United States Government officially opened the Panama Canal to the commerce of the world on the 15th of August, at which time the steamship Ancon, which is owned by the United States War Department and leased to the Panama Railroad, passed fully laden through the canal. All of the seventy-four regular officers and men aboard the Ancon appeared in spotlessly white uniforms, and the ship itself glistened with new paint, over which fluttered signal flags and the ensigns of all nations. On the jackstaff was the flag of the United States. In conformity with a promise made by Colonel Goethals, the flag of the American Peace Society fluttered from the foremast of the Ancon. Beneath her decks, however, were two huge pieces of artillery, which are destined to form an important part of the defenses of the waterway. The Ancon left Cristobal at seven o'clock in the morning, and reached Balboa, at the Pacific end, at four o'clock in the afternoon, having navigated the waterway in nine hours. Invitations to be guests on this official "first" trip had been much coveted, and the rails were lined with local canal officials and those of the republic of Panama, together with the members of their families, as the big steamer backed away from her berth. Colonel Goethals and Captain Rodman were on the bridge beside Captain Sukeforth, commanding the steamer. President Porras of the republic of Panama and his staff were also on board. Secretary Garrison of the War Department, which had direct jurisdiction over the construction of the Panama Canal, sent a congratulatory telegram to Colonel Goethals and to his co-laborers in the construction of the canal, which said: "On behalf of the government and the people of the United States I express to you and through you to all concerned in the achievement, the intense gratification and pride experienced to-day. By the successful passage of vessels through the canal the dream of the centuries has become a reality. A stupendous undertaking has been finely accomplished, and a perpetual memorial to the genius and enterprise of our people has been created. The fully earned and deserved congratulations of a grateful people go out to you and your co-laborers." The canal will be of untold advantage to the commerce of this country and of the world. It will also be a new path through the seas for carrying the Gospel of Christ and establishing the kingdom of God. "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth." (Ps. 72: 8.)
